GEN. PERSHING'S HOMECOMING

His Landing in New York, With a Parade of the 1st Division, the Occasion of a National Welcome

AFTER an absence of two years and about one hundred days General John Joseph Pershing returned to America on Sept. 8, 1919, victorious and renowned, to receive two days later one of the greatest receptions at the hands of his fellow-citizens that any American had ever received in the military or civil history of the United States. The whole city of New York turned out to see him riding at the head of his heroic troops of the 1st Division down the whole length of Fifth Avenue, amid scenes of unexampled popular enthusiasm.

General Pershing had sailed home on the former German steamship Leviathan, which reached American waters on Sept. 7. A multitude of various craft met him in New York Bay, and amid the din of whistle and artillery salutes he received the first earnest of his welcome home. Military officers, Congressmen, and prominent citizens boarded the Leviathan bearing greetings. An airplane circled over the big transport and dropped a welcoming letter from Mayor Hylan, in which was described the desire of the citizens "to express in true American fashion the great love and admiration which they felt for the man through whose instrumentality the magnificent achievements of our armies had been made possible."

As the transport swung into the North River those on board could see for the first time the great crowds along the riverfront hours before the General's landing was expected. When at last the Leviathan was docked at army transport Pier 4 in Hoboken, formerly one of the Hamburg-American piers, only the newspaper men and photographers were allowed to board her; these raced aboard the moment the gangplank was laid, and assailed the General in a throng. The returning soldier good-naturedly accompanied the photographers to an upper deck and allowed them to take pictures of himself and his staff. To the newspaper correspondents he said: "This welcome is overwhelming. I accept it only in the name of those brave boys of ours who went over there and fought and made our glorious victory possible." Amid loud acclamation of the waiting throngs upon the dock the General then went ashore.

This debarkation and the simple ceremonies on the upper deck of the pier were among the most impressive part of the General's homecoming. The pier was festooned gayly with the national colors. The Port of Embarkation Band, reinforced with bands from the 1st Division itself, played inspiring music from a boat moored near by. The General passed through hundreds of welfare workers, while guards of picked soldiers with fixed bayonets stood at attention. The pier house was crowded to its full capacity; a vast din arose from the escorting craft, from factory whistles, from the cheering throats of thousands outside.

WELCOMED BY SECRETARY BAKER

To a flourish of trumpets, a ruffle of drums, and sharp commands from the military, General Pershing stepped again upon American soil. Informal greetings with relatives and friends followed. General Pershing was then led to a space on the upper deck of the pier, which had been elaborately decorated. Here were chairs and a dais, upon which Mr. Baker, Secretary of War, and General Pershing took seats. Amid applause Secretary Baker said:

General Pershing: About two and a half years ago, by the President's direction, I had the honor of designating you to lead the armies of the United States in France. Today you return, your mission accomplished, with victory written on the banners of the greatest army the nation has ever had, and with the priceless foundations of liberty and freedom saved for us and for the world as the result of our participation in the world war.

The task intrusted to you required all the imagination, all the energy, and all the genius of a great commander. From the first you had the complete confidence of the President and the Secretary of War. This confidence remained unshaken to the end.

From the beginning you had all support the people of the United States could give. You and your great army embodied for them their country and their country's cause. They worked with devotion and self-sacrifice to sustain and supply you with troops and equipment. Their hearts were overseas with you and their prayers for your welfare and that of your men were constant. Doubtless the confidence and affection of your fellow-citizens were an inspiration to you in the hours of preparation and in the hours of battle, as the superb exploits of the army under your command were in turn an inspiration to our national effort.

The great victories are now won. Your magnificent army has returned. The soldiers who once marched through the thickets of the Argonne are citizens again, filled with high memories of great deeds, and carrying into life the inspiration which membership in that great company and sacrifice for that great cause engendered. Your return closes the history of the American Expeditionary Forces. The President had hoped to be here personally to speak on behalf of the nation a word of welcome. In his enforced absence he has directed me to speak it.

I bid you welcome, gratefully, on behalf of the country you have served and on behalf of the people whose sons you have led. The confidence with which we sent you away you have sacredly kept. Wherever there is a soldier or a friend of a soldier, wherever there is a lover of liberty, wherever there is a heart which rejoices at the deliverance of mankind from its hour of peril, you and your great army are remembered and loved. You return not only to American soil, but to the heart of the country.

GREETING FROM THE PRESIDENT

In the absence of Vice President Marshall, Secretary Baker read the following message of greeting from President Wilson:

My dear General Pershing: I am distressed that I cannot greet you in person. It would give me the greatest pleasure to grasp your hand and say to you what is in my heart and in the hearts of all true Americans as we hail your return to the home land you have served so gallantly. Notwithstanding my physical absence, may I not, as your Commander in Chief and as spokesman of our fellow-countrymen, bid you an affectionate and enthusiastic welcome—a welcome warmed with the ardor of genuine affection and deep admiration? You have served the country with fine devotion and admirable efficiency, in a war forever memorable as the world's triumphant protest against injustice and as its vindication of liberty, the liberty of peoples and of nations.

We are proud of you and of the men you commanded. No finer armies ever set their indomitable strength and unconquerable spirit against the forces of wrong. Their glory is the glory of the nation, and it is with a thrill of profound pride that we greet you as their leader and commander. You have just come from the sea and from the care of the men of the navy, who made the achievements of our arms on land possible, and who so gallantly assisted to clear the seas of their lurking peril. Our hearts go out to them, too. It is delightful to see you home again, well and fit for the fatigues you must endure before we are done with our welcome. I will not speak now of our associates on the other side of the sea. It will be delightful on many occasions to speak their praise. I speak now only of our personal joy that you are home again and that we have the opportunity to make you feel the warmth of our affectionate welcome.

DEEPLY MOVED BY TRIBUTES

During Secretary Baker's greeting and the reading of the President's message, General Pershing was visibly affected. As he heard the President's words "You have served the country with fine devotion and admirable efficiency," tears came into his eyes. He seemed much more moved by these tributes than when the War Secretary handed him a moment later the commission signed by President Wilson upon Congressional authority, conferring upon him the full rank of General.

A committee representing New York City and headed by William G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury, then stepped upon the platform and extended its greeting. A message from Missouri, the General's home State, was read by a special delegate, and representatives of the Senate and House delivered short addresses. Replying to all these greetings, General Pershing said:

Fellow soldiers and friends: If this is to be continued, I believe that before many days are passed I shall wish perhaps that the war had continued. To say I am happy to be back on American soil would merely be to waste words. I am overwhelmed with emotion when I think what this greeting means.

Mr. Secretary, you have been extremely complimentary in your references to my part in the war. The part of which you speak is only one, because of the united effort of the nation. The army depended on the morale of the people, and the morale of the American people was never shaken. The American people faced its task with a courage and enthusiasm it would be difficult to describe.

I trust that those we left behind will receive the attention of a grateful people and that those graves we left over there will be decorated and kept clean and eternal in the minds of the people at home so that those places where they are buried will be a place to go and learn patriotism anew.

I wish to thank the President for his confidence in me since he elected me Chief of the Army, and I thank you, Mr. Secretary, for your confidence in me. This has made my task easier.

AMID MANHATTAN THRONGS

From the Hoboken dock, General Pershing and his staff, accompanied by the welcoming officials, were taken by water to the Battery. From there all the way to the City Hall great throngs in the buildings and on the streets cheered the General's passing. Battery Park and Bowling Green were packed. The air was white with scraps of paper thrown from the windows of tall buildings. Women waved, men cheered and doffed their hats, while cries of "Pershing!" came from every side. Flags fluttered. Two airplanes manoeuvred above and swooped low over the heads of the crowd.

AT THE CITY HALL

When the General's automobile reached the City Hall the Governor and the Mayor stood waiting on the steps. City and State officials shook General Pershing's hand, while the crowd sent up a great cheer, and the military men and their escorts disappeared within. Two by two they ascended to the Aldermanic Chamber, where Mayor Hylan, on behalf of the city, formally became host to General Pershing and his staff during their stay in New York. The Mayor read an address welcoming the General and other officers of the American Expeditionary Forces, reciting their chief victories and continuing:

Our schools will teach Young America of our unselfish participation in the world war and our armies' magnificent achievements. They will be told how the horizon of the world was darkened when the long night set in of awful carnage which drenched Europe in an ocean of blood and threatened civilization with extinction. They will be told how war-ridden and despairing Europe turned appealing eyes to our shores for aid and how American loyalty sprang into instant life and from Alaska to the West Indies came shouts of devotion and pledges of help. Our schools will tell our children how America repaid to France the sacred debt for the aid of Lafayette in our early struggles for independence, and how the flags of the Allies were entwined in a common cause for the relief of the downtrodden and oppressed of all lands and for the preservation of liberty and civilization. They will tell of the peerless American soldier—the soldier whose heart beat joyously with the spirit of freedom, who tugged impatiently at the leash to engage in fierce encounter, and who fought with unsurpassed courage in the trenches, in the forests, and on the open plains, knowing no fear and appalled by no danger, only counting the hardships of the war as blessed opportunities for the manifestation of America's benevolence and humanity.

They will tell how one American General, with wonderful power over men, by personal and moral courage, clearness of judgment, vigor of action, and genius as great as the exigencies of war ever summoned, led the armies of America to triumphant victory.

When these deeds are recounted the hearts of our children will beat with quicker pulse, and in the innermost recesses of their souls they will pledge holy allegiance and devotion to our noble country, which today, in addition to its unparalleled prosperity and dominant position in the Old and New Worlds, possesses that peerless embodiment of military genius, preserved through all the vicissitudes of the greatest war in history, General John J. Pershing.

GENERAL PERSHING'S RESPONSE

In answer to the Mayor's greeting, General Pershing said in part:

The personal compliments that you have paid to me, Sir, are far greater than my humble services deserve. To receive at your hand the freedom of this great metropolis, which we all claim as ours and which we love so well, is in itself a peculiar distinction. The circumstances that prompt this action have their foundation on foreign battlefields, where American manhood gloriously fought for the principles of right and justice.

Today our minds are filled with the thrilling incidents of these fields. Eager to serve the cause, filled with confidence in their own superiority, our young American Army passed out through your gates on their way to their mission across the seas. Your enthusiasm for them and the warm hospitality you gave them and your godspeed as they sailed away added new courage for their task.

When they returned home the victorious welcome of your people has spoken louder than words the gratitude of the nation for duty well done. * * *

New York City's attitude has been accepted everywhere, at home and abroad, as that of the whole people, and your acts have always encouraged the Allies and have always disheartened Germany. Out of your patriotism, your support, and your confidence in our success there has grown up between the people of this city and our citizen army a mutual affection that makes for better citizenship, an affection that will grow with time and become a lasting souvenir in the hearts of all those that learn to know and to love you.

General Pershing's second day in New York was crowded with new events embodying the efforts of all, young and old, to voice personally the city's official hospitality. Cheering crowds followed him wherever he went; he received thousands of telegrams inviting him to attend all kinds of functions and to visit scores of other cities of the Union. The chief event of the day was a reception given him on the Sheep Meadow in Central Park, to which great numbers of people thronged, and where 50,000 school children, waving a small forest of American flags, raised cheers in childish voices as Pershing called them "the future defenders of our country." Other activities were apportioned between visits on relatives, a reception by the Elks, of which organization General Pershing is a member, and a visit to the theatre, where he met with a rousing reception.

THE PARADE

The culminating feature of the General's visit to New York was the great parade down Fifth Avenue on Sept. 10, at the head of which he rode on horseback. It was the population's first opportunity to greet General Pershing and the men of the 1st Division personally and to show them that it remembered the part they played in the smashing drives at Toul, at Cantigny, at Soissons, at St. Mihiel, and at the Meuse and Argonne. It was likewise the first appearance in New York of "Pershing's Own," that regiment of stalwart veterans picked from the first six regular army divisions in France, which paraded as Pershing's escort in Paris and London. Altogether more than 25,000 fighting men were in line.

By a special proclamation the Mayor had declared the day a national holiday, and the whole population was out to witness the passing of the marching hosts. All along Fifth Avenue from 107th Street to Washington Square they stood, many deep, kept in place by 7,000 policemen; hotels and private buildings filled specially constructed stands with closely packed spectators; every window was crowded, and the surging throngs early occupied every point of vantage. From all these points, as well as from the reviewing stand and the seats that flanked it from Eighty-fifth to Seventy-fourth Street, the cheers swelled into wild outbursts of greetings, shoutings of Pershing's name, the ringing of bells, the rattle of raucous "crickets," a formidable body of sound undertoned by the pealing of church bells and supplemented visually by great showers of confetti, long, trailing paper streamers, and clouds of paper snow. A group of army airplanes from Mineola flew up and down above the long, white avenue, echoing to the rythmical tread of the soldiers, who wore upon their heads the flat trench helmets of the fighting force in France, and whose closely aligned bayonets gleamed like silver rain.

The whole route was gay and colorful with flags and bunting. Most colorful, most picturesque of all, was the way Pershing, the members of his staff, officers and men of lesser rank, all the long line of marchers, were pelted with flowers. At times Pershing rode over stretches of asphalt carpeted with laurel. At others roses and simpler flowers rained about him. Again some enthusiast, high above him, would toss a single blossom, perhaps to fall almost at his feet, perhaps to drop far behind him.

Even where the crowds were least dense, Pershing was kept at almost continual salute by the tributes volleyed at him from both sides of the avenue. Both when he reached the stands and when he was below Fifty-ninth Street, from which points the crowds increased, it was impossible for him to acknowledge a tithe of the applause.

AT THE REVIEWING STAND

From the stands built by the Mayor's Committee of Welcome to Distinguished Guests, stretching for five blocks on either side of the main entrance to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, where the official reviewing stand was built, Pershing was hailed with the most impressive amount of noise. There sat many thousands of relatives of men in the 1st Division, eager to show their affection for the commander.

In the official stand itself Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, General Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff of the Army; military and diplomatic representatives of allied nations, Governor Alfred E. Smith, Mayor John F. Hylan, and other well-known men beamed and saluted, and women smiled and waved and blew kisses as the General passed.

Nowhere did the pageant catch the popular fancy more fully than it did before St. Patrick's Cathedral, where the General dismounted to receive a bouquet of American Beauties from a Knights of Columbus war worker, a pretty girl whom he rewarded with a kiss while the crowd cheered. Then he crossed the avenue to shake hands and chat a moment with Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, who stood with local church dignitaries in a stand in front of the Cathedral.

Perhaps the most solemn incident of the parade was the passage of its leading figure and the little cavalcade behind him through the Victory Arch, at Twenty-third Street, at salute in memory of the dead. The General's colors were dipped, and the band which followed not far behind passed through with muffled drums.

Arrived at Washington Square, General Pershing and his staff wheeled into Washington Square North, watched for a moment the passage of the picked escort regiment, and then, dismounting, hurried in automobiles to the Waldorf, where, for the most part unknown to the passing troops, they viewed, rather than reviewed, the parade.

In the evening General Pershing and his staff were honor guests at a great dinner given to them by the City of New York, at which Rodman Wanamaker, Chairman of the Mayor's Committee, presided. Speeches were made by Secretary Baker, Mayor Hylan, and the General, who expressed keen appreciation of the city's hospitality.

Just before going to the dinner General Pershing left his hotel and hurried to Central Park, where a great throng had assembled on the Mall to attend a concert in his honor given by the New York Symphony Orchestra. His welcome there equaled those which had characterized his every appearance.

AT MADISON SQUARE GARDEN

On the eve of his departure for Philadelphia and Washington, General Pershing addressed about 10,000 former service men and women, members of the American Legion, in Madison Square Garden. The message that he sought to impress upon the assembled Legion members was to cherish and foster the lessons of patriotism that have been brought home to the American people in the last two years. A special tribute was paid by him to the part played by devoted American women, including "the mothers and sisters, who," he said, "by their prayers and their love from this side gave us encouragement."

The General's last day in the city was taken up by many visits, including a motor trip to Oyster Bay to greet the members of the Roosevelt family.

General Pershing left New York on Sept. 11, at 8 o'clock in the morning. Notwithstanding the early hour, he was attended by great throngs of men, women, and children all the way to the Pennsylvania Station. The din of good-byes was incessant until the train disappeared into the railway tunnel on its way to Philadelphia.

On the following day General Pershing rode in an automobile over several miles of Philadelphia's chief thoroughfares. Multitudes lined the streets and crowded the grand stands. At Independence Hall he reverently saluted the Liberty Bell and delivered an address, in which he said:

It fills me with deep emotion to be on this sacred spot. It seems, however, especially fitting at the conclusion of the war, which was fought for the same principles declared by the signers of the Declaration of Independence, * * * for here is the Cradle of Liberty, here is where we come to drink from its fountain, to imbibe anew the lessons of patriotism.

IN WASHINGTON

The same day the General arrived in Washington. Thousands cheered his name, bugles saluted him, children tossed flowers beneath his feet, soldiers stood rigid at salute as he passed before them, and the Vice President of the United States thanked him in the name of the nation for the distinguished services he had rendered. Crowds thronged the station, cavalry horses pawed and curvetted in the station plaza, the red and white guidons snapping in the wind-swept air. Airplane motors roared and droned overhead. The familiar tall and well-knit figure descended from the last car, and was greeted warmly by Secretary Baker and General March. Escorted through cheering crowds, he proceeded to the President's Room, where Vice President Marshall stepped forward and in the name of the President and the nation paid General Pershing this tribute:

You are not only welcome to the capital city of your own Republic, but you are welcome back to the land of your nativity. Your Commander in Chief bids me in his behalf, and in behalf of the American people, to greet you.

It is a glad duty to be inadequately performed, for human expression has not yet found the way to voice in language the deeper and finer sentiments of our natures. Perhaps you can gain some slight conception of the real joy with which we hail your homecoming when I tell you that you occupy the most unique position ever guaranteed to a man in arms in all the world's history.

Unnumbered and unremembered conquerors have returned from foreign lands bearing, chained to their chariot wheels, the writhing human evidence of conquest and supremacy over alien people. To you it has been vouchsafed to lead the greatest expeditionary force of all time through perils at sea, perils of land, and perils of air, to the ultimate accomplishment of your country's purpose and your heart's desire. You come rather in meekness and humility of spirit, saying to the great American people that as the Nazarene died to make men holy so their sons have died to make men free. You, their surviving commander, come back to us with no evidence of loot and conquest, but with the triumphs of the soul and spirit of liberty and law, to assure us that the cause in which they have died was a sacred cause.

In the name of my countrymen and my President, I salute you. Hail the patriot, farewell to the conqueror, and yet again, hail.

THE GENERAL'S REPLY

It was evident that General Pershing was deeply moved. His face was stern and set and he looked straight forward into the Vice President's eyes while Mr. Marshall spoke. Once the muscles of his face twitched and he choked behind his firm lips. When he replied to the Vice President, he removed his cap, and held it upon his arm.

"My friends," he said, "this is indeed a welcome that fills me with emotion impossible to express." Turning directly to the Vice President, he said:

I thank you, Sir, for what you have said as representing the President, whose constant confidence in me has been a strength that gave me courage to do in the best way all I thought my country would have me do.

I want to thank the American people. And I want to praise especially the American women who have watched and prayed that we might return in victory and to whom we owe more perhaps than any one else.

I want to thank the President, the Congress, and the Secretary of War for their splendid support.

Then the General and his staff walked to where the automobiles for the party were waiting. General Pershing was taken to the Shoreham Hotel in Vice President Marshall's open touring car, a contrast to the gleaming, new, olive drab army limousines into which his staff climbed. Led by motor cycle policemen, the cavalry clattered away, the General's car following and the staff coming behind. In the rear was a long train of cars containing members of the Citizens' Committee. Along the whole route, which led up Pennsylvania Avenue, up Fifteenth Street, and to the hotel, there were cheering crowds.

LAST OF THE WAR PARADES

A great parade, which was reviewed from the White House, and in which General Pershing shared honors with the 1st Division and the composite regiment known as "Pershing's Own," took place on Sept. 17. It was the last public appearance of the American Expeditionary Force as a fighting organization. The procession traversed the same route over which the Grand Army under Grant and Sherman had passed in its final march before being mustered out fifty-four years before. The event of 1919, like that of 1865, was an inspiring sight and a landmark in American history.

The procession moved from the Peace Monument, at the foot of Capitol Hill, up Pennsylvania Avenue to Fifteenth Street, and through two blocks of that main highway to where Pennsylvania Avenue begins again. At this point a great arch had been erected, an arch of triumph, and through this the troops marched into that portion of the avenue that passes the Treasury Department, the White House, and the great granite structures of the State, War, and Navy Departments. At Seventeenth Street, just beyond the White House, General Pershing left the line and walked to the White House stand, accompanied by the officers of his staff, to join the Vice President and the others of the reviewing party.

Grouped around the General and the Vice President in the reviewing stand were public officials, diplomats, and soldiers. On one side were Newton D. Baker, the Secretary of War; General Peyton C. March, Chief of the General Staff, and Rear Admiral Jones of the navy. On the other side were William Phillips, Acting Secretary of State; Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury; A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Acting Secretary of the Navy. Near them were M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador, and his wife, and diplomatic representatives of the allied nations. Groups of British and French officers in uniform were seated near.

One section of the long stand, which covered most of the space between the two main entrances to the White House grounds, was filled with Senators and Representatives and members of their families, and a host of Government officials and others of prominence. Behind General Pershing were the members of his staff and high ranking officers who had served with the American armies in Europe during the world conflict.

THE THANKS OF CONGRESS

General Pershing was formally received and thanked by Congress at a joint session on Sept. 18. It was the twenty-sixth time that Congress had bestowed the thanks of the nation upon a soldier.

When the General and his staff appeared in the House members of Congress and their guests on the floor and the filled galleries hailed him with long applause. There was handclapping and shrill cheering. The General and his staff marched to the well of the Chamber, and before he seated himself he turned and bowed to the audience. He appeared to be slightly nervous and his nervousness increased as the proceedings progressed and the praise began to flow from the spokesmen of Senate and House. But he smiled frequently and laughed when the speakers injected a touch of humor into their remarks.

Senator Cummins, as President pro tempore of the Senate, acting in the absence of Vice President Marshall, told the General what the nation thought of him and the soldiers and the war. Then Speaker Gillett of the House added his appreciation. In doing so he brought a broad smile to the General's face when he said that it was thought proper that a "few homely words should be said by the representatives of the people." Then ex-Speaker Clark of Missouri formally told the Commander of the Expeditionary Forces of Congress's action in extending its thanks, and presented General Pershing to the assemblage as "Exhibit A, showing forth to the world what sort of men Missouri grows when in her most prodigal of moods."

GENERAL PERSHING'S SPEECH

In reply the General delivered the first set speech he had made since his arrival. After acknowledging with emotion the honors bestowed upon himself and the men who had fought under him, he continued:

The might of America lay not only in her numbers and in her wealth, but also in the spirit of her people and their determination to succeed at whatever cost. While every man who went to France courageously did his part, behind him were millions of others eager to follow, all supported by a loyal people who deprived themselves to sustain our armies and succor our allies. Whether billeted in French, Belgian, or Italian villages or in the camps of England, our young men have left behind them a standard of frankness, of integrity, of gentleness, and of helpfulness which will give the other nations of the world a firmer belief in the sincerity of our motives.

The benefits flowing from the experience of our soldiers will be broadly felt. They have returned in the full vigor of manhood, strong and clean. In the community of effort men from all walks of life have learned to know and to appreciate each other. Through their patriotism, discipline, and association they have become virile, confident, and broad-minded. Rich in the consciousness of honorable public service, they will bring into the life of our country a deeper love for our institutions and a more intelligent devotion to the duties of citizenship.

To you, gentlemen of the Congress, we owe the existence and maintenance of our armies in the field. With a clear conception of the magnitude of the struggle, you adopted the draft as the surest means of utilizing our man power. You promptly enacted wise laws to develop and apply our resources to the best effect. You appropriated the fabulous sums required for military purposes. Many of your members visited the armies in the field and cheered us by their interest and sympathy. You made possible the organization and operation by which victory was achieved.

Throughout the war the President reposed in me his full confidence, and his unflinching support simplified my task. The Secretary of War made repeated visits to the front, and I am deeply grateful for his wise counsel. Under him the various staffs, bureaus, and departments, with all their personnel, are deserving of especial acknowledgment for the ability with which their problems were met. The officers and soldiers who served at home are entitled to their full share in the victory. There existed a unity of purpose between our Government in all its branches and the command of the troops in the field that materially hastened the end.

TRIBUTE TO NAVY

Our navy performed a brilliant part in transporting troops and supplies and in maintaining our sea communications. The army was convoyed overseas with the maximum of safety and comfort and with incredibly small loss. In this arduous service the generous assistance of the seamen of Great Britain deserves our lasting appreciation.

A special tribute is due to those benevolent men and women who ministered to the needs of our soldiers at home and abroad. The welfare societies maintained by a generous public gave us invaluable aid. In our hospitals the surgeons and nurses, both permanent and temporary, served with a skill and fidelity that will ever be worthy of our grateful remembrance.

Business and professional men abandoned their private interests and gave their service to the country. Devoted men, women, and even children, often in obscure positions, zealously labored to increase the output of ships, munitions, war material, and food supplies, while the press and the pulpit stimulated patriotic enthusiasm.

Our admiration goes out to our war-worn allies, whose tenacity, after three years of conflict, made possible the effectiveness of our effort. Through their loyal support and hearty co-operation a general spirit of comradeship sprang up among us, which should firmly unite the peoples as it did their armies.

The cheerfulness and fortitude of our wounded were an inspiration and a stimulus to their comrades. Those who are disabled should become the affectionate charge of our people, whose care they have so richly earned. Let us, in sympathy, remember the widows and the mothers who today mourn the loss of their husbands and sons.

Our hearts are filled with reverence and love for our triumphant dead. Buried in hallowed ground which their courage redeemed, their graves are sacred shrines that the nation will not fail to honor.

The glorious record made in the fight for our treasured ideals will be a precious heritage to posterity. It has welded together our people and given them a deeper sense of nationality. The solidity of the republic and its institutions in the test of a world war should fill with pride every man and woman living under its flag. The great achievements, the high ideals, the sacrifices of our army and our people belong to no party and to no creed. They are the republic's legacy, to be sacredly guarded and carefully transmitted to future generations.

After an informal reception in the Speaker's office General Pershing went to the House press gallery, where he was received by the correspondents. After being told by Gus J. Karger, Chairman of the Standing Committee of Correspondents, that he was in the hands of his friends, he said:

It is very gratifying to be in the hands of one's friends and to know that one may speak out of the fullness of one's heart. But having with a great deal of embarrassment and perturbation just said a few words to the joint session, I am sure you would not expect me to say anything further.

I am, of course, very much touched by the honor that the American people, through their representatives, have bestowed upon me, but I feel that I am only the instrument through which they have expressed their satisfaction of what our armies have done, and in no way is it to be accepted as personal.

It is a great pleasure to meet the real representatives of all of the American people, and I am glad also to know that they are my friends.

It was officially announced later in Washington that General Pershing would retain the title and duties of Commander in Chief, American Expeditionary Forces, for the time being, and that headquarters would be established for him in the old Land Office Building, famous as the centre of the draft machinery during the war. All the records of the overseas forces were to be concentrated there, and General Pershing, with a small staff made up of the officers associated with him in France, would be ready to answer any call of Congress for information. The possibility of a vacation had been waived by General Pershing himself.

The Senate and the Peace Treaty

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 20, 1919]

THE debate in the United States Senate on the ratification of the German Peace Treaty, which had begun in an informal way on July 14, reached its first definite phase on Sept. 10, when the Committee on Foreign Relations reported the treaty to the Senate with thirty-eight amendments and four reservations, recommended by a majority of the committee. The report was signed by nine Senators, including all the Republican members of the committee except Senator McCumber of North Dakota. On Sept. 11 the dissenting Democratic minority submitted its report, signed by six Democratic Senators. Senator Shields, a Democratic member of the committee, did not sign the minority report.

Both reports were the outcome of two months of more or less bitter debate, with the lines of cleavage mainly between the Democratic Administration supporters and the Republican opposition members, who were in the majority. During that preliminary period the treaty was the theme of almost daily speeches on one side or the other, speeches marked by increasing acrimony, and culminating in an address by Senator Knox of Pennsylvania on Aug. 29, in which he counseled the utter rejection of the Peace Treaty, declaring that it was "not a treaty, but a truce," and would mean "centuries of blood-letting."

THE MAJORITY REPORT

The majority report of the Foreign Relations Committee was as follows:

The treaty of peace with Germany was laid before the Senate by the President on July 10, 1919. Three days were consumed in printing the treaty, which was in two languages and filled 537 quarto pages. The treaty, therefore, was not in the possession of the committee for action until July 14, 1919. The report upon the treaty was ordered by the committee on Sept. 4. Deducting Sundays and a holiday, the treaty has been before the Committee on Foreign Relations for forty-five days. The committee met on thirty-seven of those working days, sitting whenever possible both in the morning and afternoon. The eight working days upon which the committee did not sit were lost owing to unavoidable delays in securing the presence of witnesses summoned by the committee. In view of the fact that six months were consumed by the Peace Conference in making the treaty, in addition to a month of work by the various delegations before the assembling of the conference, the period of six weeks consumed by the committee in considering it does not seem excessive.

These facts are mentioned because there has been more or less clamor about delay in the committee. This demand for speed in the consideration of the most important subject which ever came before the Senate of the United States, involving as it does fundamental changes in the character of our Government and the future of our country for an unlimited period, was largely the work of the Administration and its newspaper organs and was so far wholly artificial. Artificial also was the demand for haste disseminated by certain great banking firms which had a direct pecuniary interest in securing an early opportunity to reap the harvest which they expected from the adjustment of the financial obligations of the countries which had been engaged in the war.

The third element in the agitation for haste was furnished by the unthinking outcry of many excellent people who desired early action and who, for the most part, had never read the treaty or never got beyond the words "League of Nations," which they believed to mean the establishment of eternal peace. To yield helplessly to this clamor was impossible to those to whom was intrusted the performance of a solemn public duty.

COMMITTEE HAMPERED

The responsibility of the Senate in regard to this treaty is equal to that of the Executive, who, although aided by a force of 1,300 assistants, expert and otherwise, consumed six months in making it, and the Senate and its Committee on Foreign Relations cannot dispose of this momentous document with the light-hearted indifference desired by those who were pressing for hasty and thoughtless action upon it. The committee was also hampered by the impossibility of securing the full information to which it was entitled from those who had conducted the negotiations. The committee was compelled to get such imperfect information as it secured from press reports, by summoning before it some of the accessible experts who had helped to frame the complicated financial clauses, and certain outside witnesses.

As an illustration in a small way of the difficulties in securing information, it may be stated that no provision had been made to supply the Senate with the maps accompanying the treaty, and it was necessary to send to Paris to procure them. The only documents of the many asked for by the committee which were furnished by the Executive were the American plan for the League of Nations, submitted to the commission on the League covenant, and the composite draft made by experts of that commission.

The treaties with Poland and with France, as well as the Rhine protocol, all integral parts of the treaty with Germany, were obtained by the Senate prior to their transmission by the President from the documents laid before the House of Commons and the Chamber of Deputies early in July by the Prime Ministers of England and France. The records of the Peace Conference and of the conferences of the representatives of the five great powers were asked for by the committee and refused by the Executive. The committee had before them the Secretary of State, who was one of the American delegates, and a signer of the treaty, and they also had the privilege of a meeting with the President at the White House, which they had themselves requested. The testimony of the Secretary of State and the conversation of the committee with the President, published in the record of the committee hearings, have been laid before the country by the press, and it is not necessary to say anything further in regard to them because the people themselves know how much information in regard to the treaty was received by the committee upon those two occasions.

The character of the clamor for speedy action is well illustrated by the fact that it was directed solely against the Senate of the United States and its Committee on Foreign Relations. The treaty provides that it shall go into force when ratified by Germany and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, which are the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan. Great Britain very naturally ratified at once, but no one of the other four has yet acted. Persons afflicted with inquiring minds have wondered not a little that the distressed mourners over delays in the Senate have not also aimed their criticism at the like shortcomings on the part of France, Italy, and Japan, an act of even-handed justice in fault-finding which they have hitherto failed to perform.

TRADE WITH GERMANY

Perhaps it is well also to note and to consider for a moment one of the reasons given for the demand for hasty action, which was to the effect that it was necessary to have prompt ratification in order to renew our trade with Germany, for even the most ardent advocate of unconsidered action was unable to urge that the channels of trade to the allied countries were not open. The emptiness of this particular plea for haste, now rather faded, is shown by the fact that we have been trading with Germany ever since the armistice. Between that event and the end of July we have exported to Germany goods valued at $11,270,624. In the month of June we exported more to Germany than we did to Spain. In July, by orders of the War Trade Board, the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy act were set aside by the authorization of licenses to trade, and exports to Germany for the month of July amounted to $2,436,742, while those to Austria and Hungary were $1,016,518.

It is an interesting fact that the exports in June to Germany, before the relaxation of the Trading with the Enemy act, were much larger than after that relaxation, brought about by allowing licenses, was ordered, an indication of the undoubted truth that our trade with foreign countries is not affected by the treaty, but is governed by the necessarily reduced purchasing power of all countries in Europe engaged in the war. As a matter of fact, therefore, we are trading with Germany, and it is a mere delusion to say that we cannot trade with Germany until the ratification of the treaty, because in order to do so we require a new treaty of amity and commerce and the re-establishment of our consular system in that country. The United States, following the usual custom, was represented in Germany by Spain both in the consular and in the diplomatic service, after the outbreak of the war, and we can transact all the business we may desire through the good offices of Spanish Consuls until a new consular treaty with Germany has been made.

Before leaving this subject it may not be amiss to remark that Mr. Lloyd George has recently made two important speeches expressing grave apprehensions as to the social and political unrest and the economic troubles now prevalent in England. He seems to have failed to point out, however, that the ratification of the covenant of the League of Nations by Great Britain had relieved the situation which he had described. He was apparently equally remiss in omitting to suggest that prompt action by the Senate of the United States in adopting the covenant of the League of Nations would immediately lower the price of beef.

JUSTIFYING CHANGES IN TREATY

In reporting the treaty for the Senate for action the committee propose certain amendments to the text of the treaty and certain reservations to be attached to the resolution of ratification and made a part of that resolution when it is offered.

In regard to the amendments generally it should be stated at the outset that nothing is more groundless than the sedulously cultivated and constantly expressed fear that textual amendments would require a summoning of the Peace Conference, and thereby cause great delay. There will be no necessity of summoning the Peace Conference, because it is in session now in Paris with delegates fully representing all the signatory nations, as it has been for six months, and it seems likely to be in session for six months more. Textual amendments if made by the Senate can be considered in Paris at once, and the conference would be at least as usefully employed in that consideration as they now are in dividing and sharing Southeastern Europe and Asia Minor, in handing the Greeks of Thrace over to our enemy, Bulgaria, and in trying to force upon the United States the control of Armenia, Anatolia, and Constantinople through the medium of a large American army.

Still more unimportant is the bugbear which has been put forward of the enormous difficulties which will be incurred in securing the adhesion of Germany. No great amount of time need be consumed in bringing German representatives to Paris. The journey is within the power of a moderate amount of human endurance, and it is also to be remembered that Germany is not a member of the League and need not be consulted in regard to the terms of the covenant. When Germany enters the League she will take it as she finds it.

NATURE OF AMENDMENTS

The first amendment offered by the committee relates to the League. It is proposed so to amend the text as to secure for the United States a vote in the Assembly of the League equal to that of any other power. Great Britain now has under the name of the British Empire one vote in the Council of the League. She has four additional votes in the Assembly of the League for her self-governed dominions and colonies, which are most properly members of the League and signatories to the treaty. She also has the vote of India, which is neither a self-governing dominion nor a colony, but merely a part of the empire, and which apparently was simply put in as a signatory and member of the League by the Peace Conference because Great Britain desired it.

Great Britain also will control the votes of the Kingdom of Hedjaz and of Persia. With these last two of course we have nothing to do. But if Great Britain has six votes in the League Assembly no reason has occurred to the committee, and no argument had been made to show why the United States should not have an equal number. If other countries like the present arrangement, that is not our affair, but the committee failed to see why the United States should have but one vote in the Assembly of the League when the British Empire has six.

Amendments 39 to 44, inclusive, transfer to China the German lease and rights as they exist in the Chinese province of Shantung, which are given by the treaty to Japan. The majority of the committee were not willing to have their votes recorded at any stage in the proceedings in favor of the consummation of what they consider a great wrong. They cannot assent to taking the property of a faithful ally and handing it over to another ally in fulfillment of a bargain made by other powers in a secret treaty. It is a record which they are not willing to present to their fellow-citizens or leave behind for the contemplation of their children.

Amendment No. 2 is simply to provide that where a member of the League has self-governing dominions and colonies which are all members of the League the exclusion of the disputants under the League rules shall cover the aggregate vote of the member of the League and its self-governing dominions and parts of the empire combined, if any one is involved in the controversy.

The remaining amendments, with a single exception, may be treated as one, for the purpose of all alike is to relieve the United States from having representatives on the commissions established by the League which deal with questions in which the United States has and can have no interest, and in which the United States has evidently been inserted by design. The exception is Amendment No. 45, which provides that the United States shall have a member of the Reparations Commission, but that such Commissioner of the United States cannot, except in the case of shipping, where the interests of the United States are directly involved, deal with or vote upon any other questions before that commission except under instructions from the Government of the United States.

RESERVATIONS

The committee proposes four reservations, to be made a part of the resolution of ratification when it is offered. The committee reserves, of course, the right to offer other reservations if it shall so determine. The four reservations now presented are as follows:

"1. The United States reserves to itself the unconditional right to withdraw from the League of Nations upon the notice provided in Article I. of said treaty of peace with Germany."

The provision in the League covenant for withdrawal declares that any member may withdraw provided it has fulfilled all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant. There has been much dispute as to who would decide if the question of the fulfillment of obligations was raised, and it is very generally thought that this question would be settled by the Council of the League of Nations. The best that can be said about it is that the question of decision is clouded with doubt. On such a point as this there must be no doubt. The United States, which has never broken an international obligation, cannot permit all its existing treaties to be reviewed and its conduct and honor questioned by other nations.

The same may be said in regard to the fulfillment of the obligations to the League. It must be made perfectly clear that the United States alone is to determine as to the fulfillment of its obligations, and its right of withdrawal must therefore be unconditional, as provided in the reservation.

"2. The United States declines to assume, under the provisions of Article X. or under any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between other nations, members of the League or not, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States in such controversies, or to adopt economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether a member of the League or not, against external aggression, or for the purpose of coercing any other country, or for the purpose of intervention in the internal conflicts or other controversies which may arise in any other country, and no mandate shall be accepted by the United States under Article XXII., Part 2, of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States."

This reservation is intended to meet the most vital objection to the League covenant as it stands. Under no circumstances must there be any legal or moral obligation upon the United States to enter into war or to send its army and navy abroad, or, without the unfettered action of Congress, to impose economic boycotts on other countries. Under the Constitution of the United States the Congress alone has the power to declare war, and all bills to raise revenue or affecting the revenue in any way must originate in the House of Representatives, be passed by the Senate, and receive the signature of the President. These constitutional rights of Congress must not be impaired by any agreements such as are presented in the treaty, nor can any opportunity of charging the United States with bad faith be permitted. No American soldiers or sailors must be sent to fight in other lands at the bidding of a League of Nations. American lives must not be sacrificed, except by the will and command of the American people acting through their constitutional representatives in Congress.

This reservation also covers the subject of mandates. According to the provisions of the covenant of the League, the acceptance of a mandate by any member is voluntary, but as to who shall have authority to refuse or to accept a mandate for any country the covenant of the League is silent. The decision as to accepting a mandate must rest exclusively within the control of the Congress of the United States, as the reservation provides, and must not be delegated, even by inference, to any personal agent or to any delegate or commissioner.

"3. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the Council or of the Assembly of the League of Nations or to the decision or recommendation of any other power."

The reservation speaks for itself. It is not necessary to follow out here all tortuous windings, which to those who have followed them through the labyrinth disclose the fact that the League under certain conditions will have power to pass upon and decide questions of immigration and tariff, as well as the others mentioned in the reservation. It is believed by the committee that this reservation relieves the United States from any dangers or any obligations in this direction.

The fourth and last reservation is as follows:

"4. The United States declines to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the Assembly or the Council of the League of Nations provided for in said treaty of peace any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe Doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone, and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of the said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany."

The purpose of this reservation is clear. It is intended to preserve the Monroe Doctrine from any interference or interpretation by foreign powers. As the Monroe Doctrine has protected the United States, so, it is believed by the committee, will this reservation protect the Monroe Doctrine from the destruction with which it is threatened by Article XXI. in the covenant of the League and leave it, where it has always been, within the sole and complete control of the United States.

CALLS LEAGUE AN ALLIANCE

This covenant of the League of Nations is an alliance and not a league, as is amply shown by the provisions of the treaty with Germany, which vests all essential power in five great nations. Those same nations, the principal allied and associated powers, also dominate the League through the Council.

The committee believe that the League as it stands will breed wars instead of securing peace. They also believe that the covenant of the League demands sacrifices of American independence and sovereignty which would in no way promote the world's peace, but which are fraught with the gravest dangers to the future safety and well-being of the United States. The amendments and reservations alike are governed by a single purpose, and that is to guard American rights and American sovereignty, the invasion of which would stimulate breaches of faith, encourage conflicts, and generate wars. The United States can serve the cause of peace best, as she has served it in the past, and do more to secure liberty and civilization throughout the world by proceeding along the paths she has always followed and by not permitting herself to be fettered by the dictates of other nations or immersed and entangled in all the broils and conflicts of Europe.

We have heard it frequently said that the United States "must" do this and do that in regard to this League of Nations and the terms of the German peace. There is no "must" about it. "Must" is not a word to be used by foreign nations or domestic officials to the American people or their representatives. Equally unfitting is the attempt to frighten the unthinking by suggesting that if the Senate adopts amendments or reservations the United States may be excluded from the League. That is the one thing that certainly will not happen. The other nations know well that there is no threat of retaliation possible with the United States, because we have asked nothing for ourselves and have received nothing. We seek no guarantees, no territory, no commercial benefits or advantages. The other nations will take us on our own terms, for without us their League is a wreck, and all their gains from a victorious peace are imperiled. We exact nothing for ourselves, but we insist that we shall be the judges, and the only judges, as to the preservation of our rights, our sovereignty, our safety, and our independence.

At this moment the United States is free from any entanglements or obligations which legally or in the name of honor would compel her to do anything contrary to the dictates of conscience or to the freedom and the interests of the American people. This is the hour when we can say precisely what we will do and exactly what we will not do, and no man can ever question our good faith if we speak now. When we are once caught in the meshes of a treaty of alliance or a League of Nations composed of twenty-six other powers our freedom of action is gone. To preserve American independence and American sovereignty, and thereby best serve the welfare of mankind, the committee propose these amendments and reservations.

THE MINORITY REPORT

The minority report, signed by six Democrats, as presented by Senator Hitchcock, ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee, was as follows:

The undersigned, members of the Foreign Relations Committee, unite in urging the early ratification of the pending treaty of peace without amendments and without reservations.

We deplore the long and unnecessary delay to which the treaty has been subjected, while locked up in the committee whose majority decisions and recommendations were from the start a foregone conclusion. They could have been made in July as well as in September, and would have been the same.

The industrial world is in ferment, the financial world in doubt, and commerce halts, while this great delay in the peace settlement has been caused by the majority of a committee known to be out of harmony with the majority of the Senate and the majority of the people. This is government by obstruction as well as by a minority.

Our export trade already shows the undeniable effects of delay and doubt in treaty ratification and peace settlement. For the first seven months following the armistice our exports averaged almost seven hundred millions per month, but in July they fell to five hundred and seventy millions of dollars. Europe undoubtedly wants our products, but can only take them in full quantity if our financial institutions provide the credit to bridge over the period necessary to restore European industry to productivity. This private credit can not and will not be furnished as long as the peace settlement is in doubt. A public credit has heretofore carried this great balance of trade. Since the armistice was signed our Government has advanced to European Governments nearly two and one-half billion dollars, which was almost enough to cover the balance of trade during the eight months' period.

Our Government, however, has about reached the end of its authority given by Congress and will advance but little more. From now on, if we are to keep up our commerce with Europe, private enterprise must furnish the credit to cover the trade balance till European industries get started and are able to pay us with their goods. Peace settlement delays and doubts paralyze this revival. If uncertainty continues, depression is inevitable.

The claim by the majority of this committee that we have exported over eleven million dollars' worth of goods to Germany since the armistice and without a peace settlement is no doubt true. To other countries during the same period we exported over five thousand million dollars' worth. What was exported to Germany, as stated by the majority report, was practically nothing. It is only 14 cents' worth of American products for each person in Germany in seven months, or 2 cents per person per month, yet the majority report boasts of it as evidence of trade revival in spite of treaty delay.

The same statesmen gravely assure us that the figures prove that it is a mere delusion to say we cannot trade with Germany till a peace settlement is made. Two cents per month per capita is hardly trading with Germany.

AGAINST ALL AMENDMENTS

Referring to the action of the majority of the committee, we unite in opposing and condemning the recommendations both as to textual amendments and as to proposed reservations. As far as the proposed textual amendments are concerned we see no reason to discuss their character at length. In our opinion they have no merit, but whether they be good, bad, or indifferent, their adoption by the Senate can have no possible effect except to defeat the participation of the United States in the treaty. None of them could by any possibility be accepted, even by the great nations associated with the United States in the war, and none of them could by any possibility be dictated to Germany. To adopt any one of them, therefore, is equivalent to rejecting the treaty.

The suggestion of the majority report that the Peace Conference is still in session in Paris and could consider any textual amendments to the treaty made by the Senate, and that German representatives could be brought to Paris for that purpose, indicates a total misconception of the situation. The Peace Conference has acted finally upon the treaty. Great Britain has ratified; France is about to do so, and with the action of one other power it will in all human probability be in actual operation even before the Senate of the United States reaches a decision.

Moreover, the Peace Conference possesses no further power to "bring German representatives to Paris." The power of compulsion has been exhausted. Germany was told where to sign and when to sign and when to ratify, and Germany has closed the chapter by signing and by ratifying. Germany cannot be compelled to do anything more or different with regard to this treaty by being confronted with an amended treaty, whether once a month, day, or week. There must be a finality to ultimatums in a treaty by compulsion. If an amended treaty is not signed by Germany, then it is in none of its parts binding on her.

WHAT WE WOULD SACRIFICE

To adopt an amendment or to reject the treaty means that the United States will sacrifice all the concessions secured from Germany by a dictated peace. While these concessions are not as large as those which other nations associated with us secure in reparations, they are nevertheless of tremendous importance and could only be secured under a dictated peace. Among the concessions which the United States would sacrifice by the adoption of any amendment or the rejection of the treaty may be included the following:

First—Germany's acknowledgment of responsibility for the war and her promise to make restitution for damages resulting from it.

Second—Germany's promise to us in the treaty that she will not impose higher or other customs duties or charges on our goods than those charged to the most-favored nation and will not prohibit or restrict or discriminate against imports directly or indirectly from our country.

Third—Germany's promise to us in the treaty that she will make no discrimination in German ports on shipping bearing our flag, and that our shipping in German ports will be given as favorable treatment as German ships receive.

Fourth—That for six months after the treaty goes into effect no customs duty will be levied against imports from the United States except the lowest duties that were in force for the first six months of 1914.

Fifth—Germany's agreement with us that the United States shall have the privilege of reviving such of the treaties with Germany as were in existence prior to the war as we may alone desire.

Sixth—Germany's promise to us to restore the property of our citizens seized in Germany or to compensate the owners.

Seventh—Germany's very important validating all acts by the United States and by the Alien Property Custodian by which we seized and proceeded to liquidate $800,000,000 worth of property in the United States belonging to German citizens.

Eighth—Germany's agreement that the proceeds of the sale of these properties may be used to compensate our citizens in Germany if Germany fails to do so, or to pay debts which Germany or Germans owe to American citizens, or to pay American pre-war claims against Germany for property destroyed and lives taken similar to the losses because of the destruction of the Lusitania.

Ninth—Germany's agreement that she will compensate her own citizens for property, patents, and other things belonging to them in the United States seized during the war by our Government.

Tenth—Germany's agreement that no claim can be made against the United States in respect to the use or sale during the war by our Government, or by persons acting for our Government, of any rights in industrial, literary, or artistic property, including patents.

Eleventh—Germany's agreement that the United States shall retain over 500,000 tons of German shipping, seized in American ports, which must more than compensate us for shipping lost during the war.

Twelfth—We would lose our membership on the Reparations Commission, which will be the most powerful international body ever created and which will have enormous control over the trade and commerce of Germany with the rest of the world for years to come. It not only supervises the use of German economic resources and the payment of reparations, but it can restrict or expand Germany's imports and distribute much of her desirable exports, including dyes. In no way can the United States assure itself against discrimination in German imports and financial policies, unless we have a member upon this great Reparations Commission.

AMENDMENT SAME AS REJECTION

These are some, but by no means all, of the valuable concessions which the United States would inevitably sacrifice by failing to ratify the treaty. This failure would be just as complete if we adopt an amendment to it as if we rejected the treaty absolutely. In either event, we would find ourselves at the end of the war, it is true, but without any peace or terms of peace with Germany. We would have abandoned our disgusted associates and we would be reduced to the necessity of seeking a negotiated peace with an angry Germany on such terms as she would be willing to accord.

We are, therefore, without any qualifications against amendments.

We are aware that the claim has been set up that one of the proposed amendments, which relates only to the League of Nations, does not require the assent of Germany. This is based on the fact that Germany is not yet a member of the League of Nations and may not be for several years.

The answer is, however, that the League covenant is a part of the treaty, and the League, which is mentioned in many places in the treaty, has much to do with German affairs, even though Germany is not a member. Germany, in agreeing to the treaty, has assented to the provisions of the covenant, and one of the provisions is that it can only be amended by the action of the League, which has not yet started, ratified by all the members of the Council, which has not yet organized, as well as by a majority of the members of the Assembly. It is obvious, therefore, if it is to be amended in any other way, Germany's assent will be just as necessary as to any other article of the treaty.

RESERVATIONS

The reservations proposed by the majority of this committee are of such a character as at once betray their authorship. They are the work of Senators organized for the purpose of destroying the League and, if possible, defeating this treaty. Their phraseology is such as makes this purpose plain. They are in no sense interpretative reservations, to be used to make clear language in the treaty that might be considered doubtful, but they are so framed as to receive the support of Senators who desire the defeat of the treaty.

While masquerading in the guise of reservations, they are in fact alterations of the treaty. They have all the vices of amendments and the additional vice of pretending to be what they are not. Presented as parts of the resolution to ratify the treaty, they would in fact, if adopted, result in its defeat. All of them apply to the League of Nations section of the treaty. Those who oppose the League of Nations realize that it is invincible on a square fight and they hope to destroy it by this indirection.

The League of Nations has stood the test of worldwide criticism and unlimited attack. It stands today as the only hope for world peace. After all the assaults of many months its purposes and provisions stand out clearly defined, unaffected by criticism, and unyielding to attack.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

The League of Nations proposes to organize the nations of the world for peace, whereas they have always heretofore been organized for war. It proposes to establish the rule of international justice in place of force.

It proposes to make a war of conquest impossible by uniting all nations against the offender.

It is the first international arrangement ever made by which small and weak nations are given the organized strength of the world for protection.

It is a covenant between many nations by which each agrees not to do certain things which in the past have produced wars and to do many things which have been found to preserve the peace.

It is a working plan for the gradual reduction of armament by all members simultaneously in proper proportion and by agreement.

It sets up arbitration as a friendly method of adjusting disputes and inquiry when arbitration is not agreed to. In both cases it provides a cooling-off period of nine months, during which the differences may be adjusted.

It preserves the territorial integrity and political independence of each member and leaves to each the exercise of its sovereign rights as a nation.

It will save the world from wars and preparations for wars. It will reduce armies and navies and taxes.

It will help to remove the discontent with Government in all countries, by making Government beneficent and devoting its revenues to constructive rather than to destructive purposes.

It is the only plan proposed to redeem the world from wars, pestilence, and famine, the only one by which a stricken world can be redeemed from the disasters of the late war and the dangers of impending international chaos.

Those who dally and delay as they seek with microscopes to find some petty flaw in its structure have nothing themselves to propose. They have appealed to every prejudice and resorted to every desperate method of attack to destroy this great international effort to establish peace, but they suggest nothing in its place.

They denounce the public demand for energetic action as "clamor." They rail at the President, who with the representatives of many other nations has devoted months of hard work to a great constructive effort to settle the terms and reorganize the world for peace. Finally, unable to stem the tide of public demand for the League of Nations, they resort to so-called reservations in the hope that they can destroy by indirection what they have found unassailable by direct attack.

We renew our recommendation that the work of the Peace Conference be confirmed, the will of the people fulfilled, and the peace of the world advanced by the ratification of this treaty—"the best hope of the world"—even if, like all human instrumentalities, it be not divinely perfect in every detail.

SENATOR McCUMBER'S ATTACK ON LODGE REPORT

Senator Porter J. McCumber of North Dakota, a Republican member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, on Sept. 15 presented a minority report, of which he himself was sole signatory, and which embodied a scathing indictment of the majority report. At the outset of his protest Senator McCumber complained that the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations had deviated from the rule of confining a report to the objects of a measure and the reasons for proposed amendments. He continued:

Not one word is said, not a single allusion made, concerning either the great purposes of the League of Nations or the methods by which these purposes are to be accomplished. Irony and sarcasm have been substituted for argument, and positions taken by the press or individuals outside the Senate seem to command more attention than the treaty itself. * * *

The instrument is not as complete and as binding as the Constitution of a State or nation. It still leaves to each nation the right of withdrawal, and depends to a great extent upon the moral sentiment of each nation to comply with its own obligation or the enforcement of such obligation upon a recalcitrant member. It is a mighty step in the right direction. Every sentiment of justice and morality is on its side. Some of its provisions are yet crude and uncertain of application, but the whole purpose is most noble and worthy, and, as in our American Constitution, we were compelled, in order to form a more perfect union, to depend upon the right of amendment, so in this great world Constitution experience will undoubtedly necessitate many changes in order to make a more perfect instrument that will work for the benefit of humanity. All of these noble and lofty purposes have been ignored in the majority report or treated with sarcastic disdain or jingoistic contempt. To my mind such an attitude is most selfish, immoral, and dishonorable.

The final debate on the treaty amendments was scheduled to begin Sept. 23, and the Senators who had been trailing President Wilson were recalled to Washington for the struggle.

President Wilson's Speaking Tour

His Fight for Ratification of the Treaty Carried From Coast to Coast in More Than Thirty Addresses

PRESIDENT WILSON left Washington on the evening of Sept. 3, 1919, to begin a nation-wide speaking tour in behalf of the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations. In the next twenty-seven days he delivered more than thirty speeches along a pre-arranged itinerary that included a week on the Pacific Coast. His journey was an appeal to the people on existing issues. With the exception of Illinois, the home of two Senate opponents of full ratification, the President carried the contest into the native States of virtually all the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in the West who were contending for reservations and amendments.

Accompanying him were Mrs. Wilson, Rear Admiral Cary T. Grayson, his physician; Joseph P. Tumulty, his private secretary; Thomas W. Brahaney, chief clerk at the White House; Charles L. Swen, the President's personal stenographer; a staff of Secret Service men, twenty newspaper men, and photographers. The Presidential party traveled by special train.

A number of United States Senators, among them Messrs. Johnson, Borah, Reed, and McCormick, followed a few days behind the President in the Middle West and delivered speeches in opposition to the terms of the treaty and in support of amendments to the covenant of the League of Nations. They also were greeted by large audiences and were bitter in their criticisms of the President.

Mr. Wilson's first speech was delivered at Columbus, Ohio, on Sept. 4. He began by calling his tour a report to the people regarding his stewardship in connection with the Peace Conference at Paris. He told his audience that the whole world was waiting for the United States to ratify the treaty, and that the League of Nations alone could prevent the recurrence of such a catastrophe as that which had overwhelmed the world. In the evening of the same day he addressed a large audience at Indianapolis in defense of Article X., the storm centre of the League covenant.

From Indianapolis his itinerary took the President to St. Louis, Kansas City, Des Moines, Omaha, Sioux Falls, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Bismarck, Billings, Helena, Coeur d'Alene, Spokane, Tacoma, Seattle, San Francisco, San Diego, Los Angeles. On the return journey he went first to Reno, Nev., thence to Salt Lake City, Cheyenne, Denver, Pueblo, Wichita, Oklahoma City, Little Rock, Memphis, and Louisville, where the speaking ended. The return to Washington was scheduled for Sept. 30.

At every city the President was greeted by immense throngs. He found sentiment somewhat divided in his first audiences, but his eloquence everywhere produced great enthusiasm. He vigorously advocated the ratification of the treaty without any amendments or reservations, criticising in strong terms the Senators who were opposing unreserved ratification. His argument at all times was that the interests of the United States were amply safeguarded by the treaty, and that the opposition was due to partisan bias or personal rancor, or else to lack of knowledge.

DEFENSE OF ARTICLE X.

Regarding Article X. of the League covenant, one of the most bitterly contested points, the President said in his Indianapolis speech:

Article X. speaks the conscience of the world. Article X. is the article which goes to the heart of this whole bad business, for that article says that the members of this League (and that is intended to be all the great nations of the world) engage to resist and to preserve against all external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of the nations concerned. That promise is necessary in order to prevent this sort of war recurring, and we are absolutely discredited if we fought this war and then neglect the essential safeguard against it.

You have heard it said, my fellow-citizens, that we are robbed of some degree of our sovereign independence of choice by articles of that sort. Every man who makes a choice to respect the rights of his neighbors deprives himself of absolute sovereignty, but he does it by promising never to do wrong, and I cannot, for one, see anything that robs me of any inherent right that I ought to retain when I promise that I will do right.

We engage, in the first sentence of Article X., to respect and preserve from external aggression the territorial integrity and the existing political independence, not only of the other member States, but of all States, and if any member of the League of Nations disregards that promise, then what happens? The Council of the League advises what should be done to enforce the respect for that covenant on the part of the nation attempting to violate it. And there is no compulsion upon us to take that advice—except the compulsion of our good conscience and judgment.

So that it is perfectly evident that if, in the judgment of the people of the United States, the Council adjudged wrong, and that this was not an occasion for the use of force, there would be no necessity on the part of the Congress of the United States to vote the use of force. But there could be no advice of the Council on any such subject without unanimous vote, and the unanimous vote would include our own. And if we accepted the advice we would be accepting our own advice. For I need not tell you that the representatives of the Government of the United States would not vote without instructions from their Government at home, and that what we united in advising we could be certain that our people would desire to do.

There is in that covenant not one note of surrender of the independent judgment of the Government of the United States, but an expression of it, because that independent judgment would have to join with the judgment of the rest.

THE SHANTUNG ISSUE

In a speech at the Chamber of Commerce luncheon in St. Louis, Sept. 5, the President gave this explanation of the Shantung settlement:

Great Britain and others, as everybody knows, in order to make it more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of the German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should, in the case of the victory of the Allies, pass to Japan. There was no qualification in the promise. She was to get exactly what Germany had. And so the only thing that was possible was to induce Japan to promise—and I want to say in all fairness, for it wouldn't be fair if I didn't say it, that Japan did very handsomely make the promises which were requested of her—that she would retain in Shantung none of the sovereign rights which Germany had enjoyed there, but would return the sovereignty without qualification to China and retain in Shantung Province only what other nationalities had elsewhere—economic rights with regard to development and administration of the railroad and of certain mines which had become attached to the railway.

That is her promise. And, personally, I haven't the slightest doubt that she will fulfill that promise. She cannot fulfill it right now because the thing doesn't come into operation until three months after the treaty is ratified, so that we must not be too impatient about it. But she will fulfill those promises.

And suppose that we said we wouldn't assent. England and others must assent, and if we are going to get Shantung Province back for China and those gentlemen don't want to engage in for-sign wars, how are they going to get it back?

Their idea of not getting into trouble seems to be to stand for the greatest possible number of unworkable propositions. All very well to talk about standing by China. But how are you standing by China when you withdraw from the only arrangements by which China can be assisted?

If you are China's friend, don't go into the council where you can act as China's friend. If you are China's friend, then put her in a position where these concessions, which have been made, need not be carried out. If you are China's friend, scuttle and run. That is not the kind of American I am.

STEP TOWARD DISARMAMENT

Before a great crowd that packed the Coliseum in St. Louis that evening Mr. Wilson pointed out that if we did not join the League of Nations we would have to play a "lone hand," which would mean that we must maintain a great standing army. At Kansas City the next day, in addressing 15,000 persons in the Convention Hall, he further elaborated this thought as follows:

We wanted disarmament and this document provides in the only possible way for disarmament by common agreement. Observe that just now every great fighting nation in the world is a member of this partnership except Germany, and inasmuch as Germany has accepted a limitation of her army to 100,000 men, I don't think for the time being she may be regarded as a great fighting nation.

And you know, my fellow-citizens, that armaments mean great standing armies and great stores of war material. They do not mean burdensome taxation merely, they do not mean merely compulsory military service, which saps the economic strength of the nation, but they mean the building up of a military class.

At Billings, Mon., he developed this idea further:

To play a lone hand now means that we must always be ready to play by ourselves. It means that we must always be armed, that we must always be ready to mobilize the man strength and the manufacturing resources of the country. That means that we must continue to live under not diminishing but increasing taxes and be strong enough to beat any nation in the world, and absolutely contrary to the high ideals of American history. If you are going to play a lone hand, the hand that you play must be upon the handle of the sword.

The lone hand must have a weapon in it, and the weapon must be the young men of the country, trained to arms, and the business of the country must be prepared for making armament and arms for the men. And do you suppose, my fellow-citizens, that any nation is willing to stand for that?

OVATION AT SEATTLE

On reaching the Pacific Coast President Wilson was received with the most tumultuous demonstrations he had yet encountered. In the stadium at Tacoma he was greeted in the forenoon of Sept. 13 by a vast throng of 30,000 persons, and in the afternoon, at Seattle, he reviewed the new Pacific Fleet on the waterfront, and then delivered two speeches in the evening. The popular demonstration in the streets of Seattle was one of the most remarkable ever seen in this country. As the President's automobile passed on its way, those who looked back could see the crowd overflowing the police lines and following in mass formation that filled the streets and stopped all traffic. At times the police, with clubs, were able to check the onrush for a few minutes, but as soon as the police gave way the crowd moved on in the direction of the President's car, a sea of faces that hid all else from view.

The outpouring of radicals was not the only thing that made the street demonstration different from those witnessed further east. There was a feeling in the air difficult to describe—the feeling of a great throng realizing its power. It seemed as if the people were bent upon sweeping on to something they wished to accomplish, rather than out on holiday to cheer and applaud. While the people were willing to see the League of Nations get a trial and desired to see the Peace Treaty signed and out of the way, that was not the dominant note. It was a popular demonstration given to a man whom the people accepted as a leader; a man with whom they might differ on many points, but in whom many of their hopes rested.

ADDRESS AT PORTLAND

The crowds that greeted the President at Portland on Sept. 15 were almost equally large, and after moving among them all day he delivered an address in the evening in which he referred in these words to the opponents of the League of Nations:

Let gentlemen beware how they disappoint the world; let gentlemen beware how they betray the immemorial principles of the United States; let men not make the mistake of claiming a position of privilege for the United States which gives it all the advantages of the League of Nations and none of the risks and responsibilities.

A woman came to the train the other day and seized my hand and was about to say something, but turned away in a flood of tears, and I asked a standerby what was the matter, and he said: "Why, Sir, she lost two sons." She had nothing in her heart except the hope that I could save other sons, though she had given hers gladly. And, God help me, I will save other sons.

Through evil report and good report, through resistance, misrepresentation, and every other vile thing, I shall fight my way to that goal. I call upon the men to whom I have referred, the honest, patriotic, intelligent men who have been too particularly concerned in criticising the details of that treaty to forget the details; to remember the great enterprise; to stand with me to fulfill the hopes and traditions of the United States.

There is only one conquering force in the world, there is only one thing you can't kill, and that is the spirit of the freemen.

And now, let us, every one of us, bind ourselves in a solemn league and covenant of our own that we will redeem this expectation of the world, that we will not allow any man to stand in the way of it, that the world hereafter shall believe in us and not curse us; that the world hereafter will follow us and not turn aside from us; and that in leading we will not lead along the paths of private advantage, we will not lead along the paths of national ambition, but we will be proud and happy to lead along the paths of right, so that men shall always say that American soldiers saved Europe and American citizens saved the world.

TWO DAYS IN SAN FRANCISCO

President Wilson spent Sept. 17 and 18 in San Francisco, carrying the fight for the treaty into the heart of Senator Johnson's State. Regarding Ireland, Mr. Wilson declared that the League of Nations not only did not put the United States in a position where it would have to aid England in the event that Ireland sought to obtain its freedom, but went further by providing a court of the world, before which Ireland or any nation which felt that Ireland was wronged could seek the verdict of public opinion. In like manner he contended that China's best hope of full sovereignty over her own soil was offered by the League.

In the Municipal Stadium at San Diego on Sept. 19 President Wilson stood before an audience estimated at 40,000 to 50,000, the largest he had yet faced, and talked from a glass cage with electrical devices to help carry his words to all parts of the great amphitheatre. Taking for his text a statement by Theodore Roosevelt, written in 1914, in favor of just such a League of Nations as has now been embodied in the Peace Treaty, Mr. Wilson told his audience that the treaty fulfilled Republican ideals. He found sentiment in Southern California strongly in favor of the League of Nations.

"THE SIX VOTES MYTH"

At Los Angeles on Sept. 21 the President increased this impression by an address in which he gave the following explanation of the process of voting in the League of Nations:

Another thing that is giving some of our fellow-country-men pangs of some sort, pangs of jealousy, perhaps, is that, as they put it, Great Britain has six votes in the League and we have only one. Well, our one vote, it happens, counts just as heavily as if every one of our States were represented and we had forty-eight votes, because it happens, though these gentlemen have overlooked it, that the Assembly is not an independent voting body. Great Britain has only one representative and one vote in the council of the League of Nations, which originates all action, and its six votes are in the Assembly, which is a debating and not an executive body, and in every matter on which the Assembly can vote along with the council it is necessary that all the nations represented on the council should concur in the affirmative vote to make it valid; so that in every vote, no matter how many vote for it in the Assembly, in order for it to become valid it is necessary that the United States should vote aye.

Now, inasmuch as the Assembly is a debating body, that is the place where this exposure that I have talked about to the open air is to occur; it would not be wise for anybody to go into the Assembly for purposes that will not bear exposure, because that is the great cooling process of the world, that is the great place where gases are to be burned off. I ask you, in debating the affairs of mankind, would it have been fair to give Panama a vote, as she will have, Cuba a vote, both of them very much under the influence of the United States, and not give a vote to the Dominion of Canada, to that great eneregtic republic in South Africa, to that place from which so many liberal ideas and liberal actions have come, that stout little Commonwealth of Australia?

From Los Angeles the President started on his homeward journey.

Austrian Peace Treaty Signed

Ceremony at St. Germain That Ended the War With Austria, Sept. 10, 1919—The Final Negotiations

THE treaty of peace with Austria, destined to be known in history as the treaty of St. Germain, was signed in the Paris suburb of St. Germain-en-Laye, Sept. 10, 1919, after four months of negotiation and interchange of notes. Dr. Karl Renner, Austrian Chancellor, who had conducted the negotiations throughout, signed the treaty after having done all in his power to modify the original terms laid down by the Allies.

The Austrian counterproposals had been submitted to the allied mission on Aug. 6, and the Supreme Council at Paris, after a brief vacation, had set to work to draft a decisive reply. When the Austrian Chancellor returned to St. Germain after a brief absence in Vienna he was informed by the allied powers, in reference to the term "German Austria" in his recent notes, that the new State must be called "The Republic of Austria."

On Aug. 19 the Supreme Council received through Paris representatives of the Austrian Province of Vorarlberg a telegram protesting against the action of Austria in preventing Vorarlberg from laying its claims before the conference. The telegram denied the right of Austria to represent Vorarlberg, and announced that through a plebiscite taken on Aug. 10 the inhabitants of the province had decided overwhelmingly in favor of union with Switzerland.

The Austrian delegation informed the Supreme Council on Aug. 20 that it would be necessary to take the completed text of the treaty to Vienna and to submit it to the Assembly for approval before the delegates could sign it. On the date mentioned the Supreme Council appointed a committee with the special duty of answering the Austrian note concerning Austrian interests outside Europe. The American member of the committee was Mr. Dreisel. The Chairman was Jean Gout, representing France.

The council concluded its consideration of the treaty on Aug. 30, and approved the covering letter to accompany it. The complete revised text of the treaty terms was handed to the Austrian plenipotentiaries at St. Germain on Tuesday, Sept. 2. Five days only were given for Austria to accept or reject the treaty as it stood, though an intimation was given that an extension of time might be granted if Austria requested it. Chancellor Renner at once left for Vienna bearing the revised text and letter.

DRAFT OF COVERING LETTER

The treaty was presented to the Austrian delegates by Paul Dutasta, Secretary of the Peace Conference, in French, English, and Italian texts. He also handed them the allied reply to the counterproposals, with the covering letter, which was in part as follows:

The people of Austria, together with their neighbors, the people of Hungary, bear in a peculiar degree responsibility for the calamities which have befallen Europe during the last five years. The war was precipitated by an ultimatum presented to Serbia by the Government at Vienna and requiring acceptance within forty-eight hours of a series of demands which amounted to the destruction of the independence of a neighboring sovereign State. The Royal Government of Serbia accepted within the prescribed time all the demands except those which involved the virtual surrender of its independence.

Yet the then Austro-Hungarian Government, refusing all offers of a conference of conciliation on the basis of that reply, immediately opened hostilities against Serbia, thereby deliberately setting light to a train which led directly to a universal war.

It is now evident that this ultimatum was no more than an insincere excuse for beginning a war for which the late autocratic Government at Vienna, in close association with the rulers of Germany, had long prepared and for which it considered the time had arrived. The presence of Austrian guns at the siege of Liège and Namur is further proof, if proof were required, of the intimate association of the Government of Vienna with the Government of Berlin in its plot against public law and the liberties of Europe. * * *

In the opinion * * * of the allied and associated powers it is impossible to admit the plea of the Austrian delegation that the people of Austria do not share the responsibility of the Government which provoked the war, or that they are to escape the duty of making reparation to the utmost of their capacity to those whom they and the Government they sustained have so grievously wronged. The principles upon which the draft treaty is based must therefore stand.

REAPING AS THEY SOWED

The Austrian delegation have further protested against the arrangements under the treaty governing their relations with the new States formed out of the late Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. The allied and associated powers feel bound to point out that the disabilities from which Austria will suffer will rise, not from the provisions of the treaty, but mainly from the policy of ascendancy which its people have pursued in the past. Had the policy of Austria-Hungary been one of liberty and justice to all its peoples, the upper Danube States might have remained in friendly economic and political unity. As it was, the policy of ascendancy produced one of the cruelest tragedies of the late war, when millions of the subject peoples of Austria-Hungary were driven, under pain of death, to fight against their will in an army which was being used to perpetuate their own servitude as well as to compass the destruction of liberty in Europe.

Many of these peoples protested against the war, and for their protests suffered confiscation, imprisonment, or death. Many more, who were captured or escaped, joined the armies of the Allies and played their part in the war of liberation. But they are now, one and all, determined, and rightly determined, to set themselves up as independent States. They will trust Vienna no more. The policy of ascendancy has borne its inevitable fruit in the fact of partition, and it is this partition which lies at the root of Austria's troubles today.

Vienna was made the economic and political centre of the empire. Everything was artificially concentrated there. Outlying districts and railways were starved in order that the capital might thrive. The break-up of Austria-Hungary, cutting these centralized economic filaments in two, can hardly fail to inflict the severest blows upon the State of Austria and its capital. But the dissolution of the monarchy with its consequences is the direct outcome of that fatal policy of domination for which the people of Austria are themselves principally to blame.

The allied and associated powers, however, have no wish to add to the hardships of Austria's position. On the contrary, they are anxious to do all in their power to assist her people to accommodate themselves to their new position and to recover their prosperity, provided always that it is not at the expense of the new States formed out of the late empire.

ECONOMIC CONCESSIONS GRANTED

The break-up of the monarchy has given rise to many difficult problems in the relations between the new States, which, under the treaty, are its heirs. It has been recognized as reasonable that the relations between the citizens of the succeeding States should be regulated in certain respects differently from the relations between the citizens of Austria and those of the other allied and associated powers, and, in view of the observations of the Austrian delegation, the allied and associated powers, while adhering to the general lines of the treaty, have made considerable modification in its economic provisions. The property of Austrian nationals in territories ceded to the allied powers is to be restored to its owners free from any measures of liquidation or bans forbidden since the armistice, and is guaranteed similar freedom from seizure or liquidation in the future. Contracts between Austrian nationals and persons who acquire, under the treaty, an allied nationality are maintained without option of cancellation.

Provision is made to insure Austria supplies of coal from Czechoslovakia and Poland, upon which she is dependent, in return for reciprocal obligations to supply certain raw material. Outstanding questions affecting nationals of Austria which require settlement between Austria and its inheriting neighbors are to be regulated by separate conventions, and these conventions are to be drawn up by a conference to which Austria will be admitted on a footing of equality with the other States concerned. * * *

In conclusion, the allied and associated powers wish to make it clear that the modifications which they have now made in the draft treaty are final. They wish further to state that if they have not replied specifically to all the points in the reply of the Austrian delegation, it is not because they have not taken them into careful consideration, nor must the absence of any reply be taken as acquiescence or in approval of these contentions, nor must the present reply be taken as authoritative interpretation of the text of the treaty.

The text of the treaty, which we send you today, following upon that of July 20 last, which had already undergone considerable changes since the original text of June 2, must be accepted or rejected in the exact terms in which it is now drafted. Consequently, the allied and associated powers require from the Austrian delegation within a period of five days, counting from the date of the present communication, a declaration informing them that they are prepared to sign this treaty as it now stands. So soon as their declaration reaches the allied and associated powers arrangements will be made for the immediate signature of peace at St. Germain-en-Laye.

In default of such declaration within the period above stipulated, the armistice concluded on Nov. 13, 1918, shall be considered as having terminated, and the allied and associated powers will take such steps as they may judge necessary to impose their conditions.

ONE TERRITORIAL MODIFICATION

The allied powers had studied the frontiers of the future Republic of Austria from a historical, geographical, ethnological, economic, and political point of view, and, with the exception of one point, no modification had been made in regard to frontiers.

In defining the boundary of Czechoslovakia they tried to assure this State a complete system of communications, and therefore departed from the historical frontier of the crown of Bohemia to assure west and east communications of Southern Moravia, and in the Gmund region to give Bohemia a junction of the two large railroad lines supplying this province.

With respect to the frontiers between Austria and Hungary, the allied and associated powers desired to guarantee access to the sea for the Czechoslovak State and therefore provided that Pressburg should have its access to the sea assured by transit across Hungarian as well as Austrian territory.

Concessions were granted to Austria in connection with the Serb-Croat-Slovene State in so far that Radkersburg was given to the Austrians; also the basin of Marburg, in Styria, was attached to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, as previously determined. The period within which Austria is obliged to give favored-nation treatment in its commercial relations with the allied and associated powers is reduced by the treaty from five to three years.

AUSTRIA ACCEPTS TREATY

On his return to Vienna Dr. Renner presented the treaty to the Austrian Assembly. On Sept. 6 the Assembly, by a vote of 97 to 23, decided to accept and sign the treaty. It protested, however, against "the violation of Austria's right of free disposal of herself." The German nationalists voted against accepting the treaty, while some members of the South Tyrolese Party abstained from voting. The vote was taken after adoption, without dissent, of the Government's resolution of protest, presented by the Christian Socialist, Hauser, declaring that the territorial clauses of the treaty violated grossly the national claim to self-determination and the basis on which the armistice was concluded. The resolution read:

We raise once more our voices against a peace founded on brute force. As one man we decline the dividing up of our peoples into free and unfree, as is done by this peace. We further declare that the 4,000,000 Germans forced under foreign rule will for all time insist on self-determination as the only possible basis on which the modern State may be founded.

The resolution also declared that ultimate union with Germany was an absolute necessity and expressed the hope that when the hatred of the war died down this union would be consummated. It ended by placing responsibility for steeping Europe in revolution and confusion on the shoulders of the Entente and looked to the League of Nations to repair the wrong done.

Notification that Austria had accepted the treaty was made to the Peace Conference on Sept. 7 in a letter signed by Peter Eichhoff, one of the members of the Austrian delegation. He announced that the National Assembly had authorized Chancellor Renner, already on his return trip to Paris, to sign the treaty for Austria. Two documents were attached to the letter. The first, dated Sept. 6, said that the National Assembly had declared that Austria must bow before necessity. The second was a protest to the Assembly by representatives of countries detached by the treaty from Austria—Bohemians, Germans, Tyroleans, Carinthians, and others.

PROTEST FROM HUNGARY

A protest from another source came from Berlin on Sept. 6, in the form of a wireless announcing that Count Sigray, Commissary for Western Hungary, had informed the Commissary for Oedenberg, near the border of Lower Austria, in view of reported territorial clauses of the Austrian treaty giving Austria the Oedenberg region on ethnological grounds, its population being largely German, that the Hungarian Government did not recognize these clauses as having any validity with regard to Hungary, and that the Government would meet with armed force any attempt to occupy Western Hungary. The strict closing of the frontier had been ordered to prevent the Austrians from entering the territory involved.

The peace terms of the allied powers were printed in the Vienna newspapers on Wednesday, Sept. 3, accompanied by editorial expressions of protest and despair. The Arbeiter Zeitung characterized the terms as "bitter, spiteful, and unjust." It added: "The Entente is using its power in the most shameful manner to ill-treat and outrage a defenseless people with a peace based on might." The Tageblatt said: "In vain do we search for a sign of justice, regard for our utter incapacity to fulfill, or consideration for the principles of self-determination for peoples." It added that the Reparations Commission must begin its work by constituting itself a revision commission.

PREPARING FOR THE CEREMONY

Hurried arrangements, meanwhile, were being made in Paris for the signing of the treaty. The ceremony at St. Germain was deliberately planned to be much less formal than in the case of the German treaty at Versailles, because of the unstable condition of the Vienna Government, which made the speedy signing of peace imperative. The Stone Age Hall, where the first draft of the treaty with Austria was presented, was chosen again for the ceremony of signing.

On Sept. 9, the day before the date set for the signing, the Rumanian delegation to the Peace Conference announced officially that it would not sign the treaty. In answer to a Rumanian note stating that the Rumanians would sign the treaty only with reservations, A. J. Balfour of the British delegation had drawn up and dispatched a letter for the council declaring that Rumania's signature would not be accepted unless given unreservedly. In reply to this letter Nicholas Misu, head of the Rumanian delegation, handed to the council a letter saying that Rumania was unable to sign the treaty. The two principal reasons were: First, that Article 60 of the treaty tied Rumania's hands commercially and economically at a time when she required absolute freedom of action to accomplish reconstruction; and, second, that guarantees to minorities imposed by an outside power would take away Rumania's sovereignty over territories newly annexed from the former Austrian Empire.

The delegates of the new Kingdom of Yugoslavia, for similar reasons, announced that they would not sign without receiving special authorization from Belgrade. Both Rumania and Yugoslavia were given until Saturday, Sept. 13, to make known their definite intentions.

At St. Germain, in the hall of the old château which is now a public museum filled with relics of the Stone Age, the treaty between Austria and her twenty-seven enemies, minus Rumania and Jugoslavia, was signed by Chancellor Renner for Austria and by the representatives of the allied and associated powers on the morning of Sept. 10.

The ceremony was marked by a lack of formality, and also by the absence of any bitterness. On a bright, calm, warm Autumn morning the delegates motored from Paris to St. Germain, and assembled in the Stone Age Room of the château. The delegates grouped themselves around the U-shaped table. Frank L. Polk, head of the American delegation since the departure of President Wilson, represented the United States, with his colleagues, Henry White and General Bliss. Mr. Balfour, Mr. Milner, and Mr. Barnes represented Great Britain, with a number of British colonial delegates. Premier Clemenceau was on hand to sign for France. The faces of the representatives of two of the signatory nations were particularly happy, those, namely, of the Italian and the Chinese delegates. The Italian representatives, Tittoni, Marconi, Scialoja, and Ferraris, were surrounded by huge bouquets sent by the Frenchwomen of St. Germain, the only flowers in the hall. The spirit of Italian victory was in the air. China, the only absentee at the signing of the treaty of Versailles, was represented by Lou Tseng-Tsiang, the Chinese Foreign Minister, and Cheng-Ting Thomas Wang, a Yale graduate from Southern China. Both expressed their satisfaction before the ceremony in being able to put their country into the League of Nations without killing Chinese national pride.

ENTRANCE OF THE DELEGATES

M. Clemenceau entered the room at exactly 10 o'clock, being saluted by the guard of honor. He took his place at the table with Frank L. Polk on his right and A. J. Balfour, British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on his left. Mr. Polk was accompanied by his wife. After the other American delegates were seated Ignace Jan Paderewski, the Premier of Poland, entered the room, his arrival provoking a flurry of conversation.

There was no hostility of any kind evinced when Dr. Renner smilingly entered the small Stone-Age Hall. He nodded politely as he took his seat at the end of the U-shaped table, about which the delegates were grouped. There was no harshness in the voice of M. Clemenceau as he announced in a few words the purpose of the meeting, saying:

The sitting is opened. The negotiations to establish an agreement between the allied and associated powers and Austria for the conclusion of peace are ended. I have signed the documents attesting that the text about to be signed conforms to that delivered to the Austrian delegation in the name of the allied and associated powers. I invite Chancellor Renner to be so kind as to sign the treaty.

AUSTRIAN CHANCELLOR SIGNS

Dr. Renner rose while M. Clemenceau's remarks were being translated into German, and then, bowing graciously, followed the master of ceremonies to the signing table in the centre of the room, where he attached his signature four times to the treaty. He then returned to his seat at the end of the hall, where he remained quite at ease while representatives of twenty-five powers attached their signatures.

Frank L. Polk, who succeeded Secretary Lansing as head of the United States delegation, signed after Dr. Renner, and was followed by Henry White and General Bliss. As the French delegation went to the signing table and passed Dr. Renner's chair the latter rose and bowed very politely to M. Clemenceau, who returned the salutation. China's signature was affixed by Lou Tseng-Tsiang, head of her delegation.

To carry out the technical arrangements under the treaty Dr. Renner actually signed twelve documents, as follows:

First, the treaty with Austria; second, the protocol of the treaty; third, a declaration regarding prize court decisions; fourth, a declaration regarding the blockade of Hungary and agreeing to furnish the Allies with all possible information regarding shipping destroyed by the Austrians during the war; fifth, a protocol of signature; sixth the Czechoslovak treaty regarding minorities; seventh, the Serbian treaty regarding minorities; eighth, annex protocol to the arms convention; ninth, annex protocol to the liquor convention; tenth, revision of Berlin and Brussels acts; eleventh, financial arrangement with Italy; twelfth, financial arrangement with the States inheriting parts of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy.

RENNER'S CONCILIATORY INTERVIEW

After the ceremony of signing, Dr. Renner, in the course of an interview, said:

If France lends us aid the name of St. Germain will soon evoke in our hearts feelings which will alleviate the bitterness of the hours we have just passed. * * * Austria cannot hate. It always respects the man with whom it has to fight. We are the conquered. Yet, misfortune has given us liberty; freed us from the yoke of a dynasty whence for three generations no man of worth has sprung; freed us from bonds with nations which were never in understanding with us nor with themselves.

We are independent, with an independence which cannot be alienated; yet we depend on the Czechs and Poles for coal, on the Banat for cereals, on Italy for maritime commerce.

Dr. Renner departed for Vienna the same evening at 7:20 o'clock.

Text of the Austrian Treaty

Under the Peace of St. Germain Austria Gives Up Vast Territories and Renounces All Military Power

THE complete official English text of the treaty signed on Sept. 10, 1919, by Austria and the allied and associated powers at St. Germain, and brought to the United States by special courier, was presented by Senator Lodge to the Senate on Sept. 15, and at his request reprinted in The Congressional Record of that date.

The treaty consists of 381 articles, making 181 pages in The Congressional Record. In general terms it follows the scheme of the German treaty. Part I, consisting of the first twenty-six articles, is the League of Nations covenant, already published as part of the treaty with Germany, which Austria likewise accepts, though she may not become a member of the League until admitted by vote of the other members.

Part II, lays down in detail the new boundaries of Austria. These boundaries, as specified in the treaty, are indicated in the map on Page 29. The frontiers with Switzerland and Lichtenstein remain unchanged. The treaty contains elaborate clauses covering the cession of territory to Italy, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Jugoslavia. The frontiers with Italy, the Klagenfurt area, and Hungary have undergone much modification; that with Germany remains as before. The net results of this whole section of the treaty are embodied in the two maps accompanying this summary. Boundary commissions are to trace the various new lines, to fix points left undefined by the treaty, and to revise portions defined by administrative boundaries. The various States involved are pledged to furnish all possible information to these commissions.

One of the most vital parts of the treaty is that entitled "Political Clauses for Europe," referring to Austria's relations with neighbor nations. Article 88, which forbids annexation of Austria by Germany, save with the consent of the League of Nations Council, has a direct connection with Article 61 of the German Constitution, which foreshadowed political union between the two nations, and which the Peace Conference compelled Germany to modify.

Following is the text of "Part III: Political Clauses for Europe":

SECTION I.—ITALY

Article 36.—Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favor of Italy all rights and title over the territory of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy situated beyond the frontier laid down in Article 27 (2) and lying between that frontier, the former Austro-Hungarian frontier, the Adriatic Sea, and the eastern frontier of Italy as subsequently determined.

Austria similarly renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favor of Italy all rights and title over other territory of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy which may be recognized as forming part of Italy by any treaties which may be concluded for the purpose of completing the present settlement.

A commission composed of five members, one nominated by Italy, three by the other principal allied and associated powers, and one by Austria, shall be constituted within fifteen days from the coming into force of the present treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line between Italy and Austria. The decisions of the commission will be taken by a majority and shall be binding on the parties concerned.

Article 37.—Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 269 of Part X., (Economic Clauses,) persons having their usual residence in the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy transferred to Italy who, during the war, have been outside the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy or have been imprisoned, interned or evacuated, shall enjoy the full benefit of the provisions of Articles 252 and 253 of Part X., (Economic Clauses.)

Article 38.—A special convention will determine the terms of repayment in Austrian currency of the special war expenditure advanced during the war by territory of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy transferred to Italy or by public associations in that territory on account of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy under its legislation, such as allowances to the families of persons mobilized, requisitions, billeting of troops, and relief to persons who have been evacuated.

In fixing the amount of these sums Austria shall be credited with the amount which the territory would have contributed to Austria-Hungary to meet the expenses resulting from these payments, this contribution being calculated according to the proportion of the revenues of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy derived from the territory in 1913.

Article 39.—The Italian Government will collect for its own account the taxes, dues, and charges of every kind leviable in the territories transferred to Italy and not collected on Nov. 3, 1918.

Article 40.—No sum shall be due by Italy on the ground of her entry into possession of the Palazzo Venezia at Rome.

Article 41.—Subject to the provisions of Article 204 of Part IX., (Financial Clauses,) relative to the acquisition of, and payment for, State property and possessions, the Italian Government is substituted in all the rights which the Austrian State possessed over all the railways in the territories transferred to Italy which were administered by the Railway Administration of the said State and which are actually working or under construction.

The same shall apply to the rights of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy with regard to railway and tramway concessions within the above-mentioned territories.

The frontier railway stations shall be determined by a subsequent agreement.

Article 42.—Austria shall restore to Italy within a period of three months all the wagons belonging to the Italian railways which before the outbreak of war had passed into Austria and have not returned to Italy.

Article 43.—Austria renounces as from Nov. 3, 1918, on behalf of herself and her nationals in regard to territories transferred to Italy all rights to which she may be entitled with regard to the products of the aforesaid territories under any agreements, stipulations, or laws establishing trusts, cartels or other similar organizations.

Article 44.—For a period of ten years from the coming into force of the present treaty central electric power stations situated in Austrian territory and formerly furnishing electric power to the territories transferred to Italy or to any other establishment the exploitation of which passes to Italy shall be required to continue furnishing this supply up to an amount corresponding to the undertakings and contracts in force on Nov. 3, 1918.

Austria further admits the right of Italy to the free use of the waters of Lake Raibl and its derivative watercourse and to divert the said waters to the basin of the Korinitza.

Article 45.—(1) Judgments rendered since Aug. 4, 1914, by the courts in the territory transferred to Italy in civil and commercial cases between the inhabitants of such territory and other nationals of the former Austrian empire, or between such inhabitants and the subjects of the allies of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, shall not be carried into effect until after indorsement by the corresponding new court in such territory.

(2) All decisions rendered for political crimes or offenses since Aug. 4, 1914, by the judicial authorities of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy against Italian nationals, including persons who obtain Italian nationality under the present treaty, shall be annulled.

(3) In all matters relating to proceedings initiated before the coming into force of the present treaty before the competent authorities of the territory transferred to Italy, the Italian and Austrian judicial authorities respectively shall until the coming into force of a special convention on this subject be authorized to correspond with each other direct. Requests thus presented shall be given effect to so far as the laws of a public character allow in the country to the authorities of which the request is addressed.

(4) All appeals to the higher Austrian judicial and administrative authorities beyond the limits of the territory transferred to Italy against decisions of the administrative or judicial authorities of this territory shall be suspended. The records shall be submitted to the authorities against whose decision the appeal was entered. They must be transmitted to the competent Italian authorities without delay.

(5) All other questions as to jurisdiction, procedure, or the administration of justice will be determined by a special convention between Italy and Austria.

SECTION II.—SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE STATE

Article 46.—Austria, in conformity with the action already taken by the allied and associated powers, recognizes the complete independence of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State.

Article 47.—Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favor of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State all rights and title over the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy situated outside the frontiers of Austria as laid down in Article 27 of Part II., (Frontiers of Austria,) and recognized by the present treaty, or by any treaties concluded for the purpose of completing the present settlement, as forming part of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State.

Article 48.—A commission consisting of seven members, five nominated by the principal allied and associated powers, one by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and one by Austria, shall be constituted within fifteen days from the coming into force of the present treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line described in Article 27 (4) of Part II., (Frontiers of Austria.)

The decisions of the commission will be taken by a majority and shall be binding on the parties concerned.

Article 49.—The inhabitants of the Klagenfurt area will be called upon, to the extent stated below, to indicate by a vote the State to which they wish the territory to belong.

[The definition of the Klagenfurt boundaries, and a boundary division of this area into two zones for the taking of the plebiscite, follow here.]

Article 50.—The Klagenfurt area will be placed under the control of a commission intrusted with the duty of preparing the plebiscite in that area and assuring the impartial administration thereof. This commission will be composed as follows: Four members nominated respectively by the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy, one by Austria, one by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State; the Austrian member only taking part in the deliberations of the commission in regard to the second zone, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene member only taking part therein with regard to the first zone. The decisions of the commission will be taken by a majority.

The second zone will be occupied by the Austrian troops and administered in accordance with the general regulations of the Austrian legislation.

The first zone will be occupied by the troops of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State and administered in accordance with the general regulations of the legislation of that State.

In both zones the troops, whether Austrian or Serb-Croat-Slovene, shall be reduced to the numbers which the commission may consider necessary for the preservation of order, and shall carry out their mission under the control of the commission. These troops shall be replaced as speedily as possible by a police force recruited on the spot.

The commission will be charged with the duty of arranging for the vote and of taking such measures as it may deem necessary to insure its freedom, fairness, and secrecy.

In the first zone the plebiscite will be held within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty, at a date fixed by the commission.

If the vote is in favor of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, a plebiscite will be held in the second zone within three weeks from the proclamation of the result of the plebiscite in the first zone, at a date to be fixed by the commission.

If on the other hand the vote in the first zone is in favor of Austria, no plebiscite will be held in the second zone, and the whole of the area will remain definitely under Austrian sovereignty.

The right of voting will be granted to every person without distinction of sex who:

(a) Has attained the age of twenty years on or before Jan. 1, 1919;

(b) Has on Jan. 1, 1919, his or her habitual residence within the zone subjected to the plebiscite; and,

(c) Was born within the said zone, or has had his or her habitual residence or rights of citizenship (pertinenza) there from a date previous to Jan. 1, 1912.

The result of the vote will be determined by the majority of votes in the whole of each zone.

On the conclusion of each vote the result will be communicated by the commission to the principal allied and associated powers, with a full report as to the taking of the vote, and will be proclaimed.

If the vote is in favor of the incorporation either of the first zone or of both zones in the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Austria hereby renounces, so far as she is concerned and to the extent corresponding to the result of the vote, in favor of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State all rights and title over these territories.

After agreement with the commission the Serb-Croat-Slovene Government may definitively establish its authority over the said territories.

If the vote in the first or second zone is in favor of Austria, the Austrian Government, after agreement with the commission, will be entitled definitively to re-establish its authority over the whole of the Klagenfurt area, or in the second zone, as the case may be.

When the administration of the country, either by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, or by Austria, as the case may be, has been thus assured, the powers of the commission will terminate.

Expenditure by the commission will be borne by Austria and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State in equal moieties.

Article 51.—The Serb-Croat-Slovene State accepts and agrees to embody in a treaty with the principal allied and associated powers such provisions as may be deemed necessary by these powers to protect the interests of inhabitants of that State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion.

The Serb-Croat-Slovene State further accepts and agrees to embody in a treaty with the principal allied and associated powers such provisions as these powers may deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment of the commerce of other nations.

Article 52.—The proportion and nature of the financial obligations of the former Austrian Empire which the Serb-Croat-Slovene State will have to assume on account of the territory placed under its sovereignty will be determined in accordance with Article 203 of Part IX., (financial clauses,) of the present treaty.

Subsequent agreements will decide all questions which are not decided by the present treaty and which may arise in consequence of the cession of the said territory.

SECTION III.—CZECHOSLOVAK STATE

Article 53.—Austria, in conformity with the action already taken by the allied and associated powers, recognizes the complete independence of the Czechoslovak State, which will include the autonomous territory of the Ruthenians to the south of the Carpathians.

Article 54.—Austria renounces so far as she is concerned in favor of the Czechoslovak State all rights and title over the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy situated outside the frontiers of Austria as laid down in Article 27 of Part II., (frontiers of Austria,) and recognized in accordance with the present treaty as forming part of the Czechoslovak State.

Article 55.—A commission composed of seven members, five nominated by the principal allied and associated powers, one by the Czechoslovak State, and one by Austria, will be appointed fifteen days after the coming into force of the present treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line laid down in Article 27, (6,) of Part II., (frontiers of Austria,) of the present treaty.

The decisions of this commission will be taken by a majority and shall be binding on the parties concerned.

Article 56.—The Czechoslovak State undertakes not to erect any military works in that portion of its territory which lies on the right bank of the Danube to the south of Bratislava, (Pressburg.)

Article 57.—The Czechoslovak State accepts and agrees to embody in a treaty with the principal allied and associated powers such provisions as may be deemed necessary by these powers to protect the interests of inhabitants of that State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion.

The Czechoslovak State further accepts and agrees to embody in a treaty with the principal allied and associated powers such provisions as these powers may deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of other nations.

Article 58.—The proportion and nature of the financial obligations of the former Austrian Empire which the Czechoslovak State will have to assume on account of the territory placed under its sovereignty will be determined in accordance with Article 203 of Part IX., (Financial Clauses,) of the present treaty.

Subsequent agreements will decide all questions which are not decided by the present treaty and which may arise in consequence of the cession of the said territory.

SECTION IV.—RUMANIA

Article 59.—Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favor of Rumania all rights and title over such portion of the former Duchy of Bukovina as lies within the frontiers of Rumania which may ultimately be fixed by the principal allied and associated powers.

Article 60.—Rumania accepts and agrees to embody in a treaty with the principal allied and associated powers such provisions as may be deemed necessary by these powers to protect the interests of inhabitants of that State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion.

Rumania further accepts and agrees to embody in a treaty with the principal allied and associated powers such provisions as these powers may deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of other nations.

Article 61.—The proportion and nature of the financial obligations of the former Austrian Empire which Rumania will have to assume on account of the territory placed under her sovereignty will be determined in accordance with Article 203 of Part IX., (Financial Clauses,) of the present treaty.

Subsequent agreements will decide all questions which are not decided by the present treaty and which may arise in consequence of the cession of the said territory.

SECTION V.—PROTECTION OF MINORITIES

Article 62.—Austria undertakes that the stipulations contained in this section shall be recognized as fundamental laws, and that no law, regulation, or official action shall conflict or interfere with these stipulations, nor shall any law, regulation, or official action prevail over them.

Article 63.—Austria undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Austria, without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race, or religion.

All inhabitants of Austria shall be entitled to the free exercise, whether public or private, of any creed, religion, or belief, whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.

Article 64.—Austria admits and declares to be Austrian nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality all persons possessing at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty rights of citizenship, (pertinenza.) within Austrian territory who are not nationals of any other State.

Article 65.—All persons born in Austrian territory who are not born nationals of another State shall ipso facto become Austrian nationals.

Article 66.—All Austrian nationals shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language, or religion.

Differences of religion, creed, or confession shall not prejudice any Austrian national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as for instance admission to public employments, functions, and honors, or the exercise of professions and industries.

No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Austrian national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the press, or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings.

Notwithstanding any establishment by the Austrian Government of an official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Austrian nationals of non-German speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the courts.

Article 67.—Austrian nationals who belong to racial, religious, or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the other Austrian nationals. In particular, they shall have an equal right to establish, manage, and control at their own expense charitable, religious, and social institutions, schools, and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein.

Article 68.—Austria will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Austrian nationals of other than German speech are residents adequate facilities for insuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Austrian nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision shall not prevent the Austrian Government from making the teaching of the German language obligatory in the said schools.

In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Austrian nationals belonging to racial, religious, or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of the sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal, or other budgets for education, religious, or charitable purposes.

Article 69.—Austria agrees that the stipulations in the foregoing articles of this section, so far as they affect persons belonging to racial, religious, or linguistic minorities, constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the Council of the League of Nations. The allied and associated powers represented on the council severally agree not to withhold their assent from any modification in these articles which is in due form assented to by a majority of the Council of the League of Nations.

Austria agrees that any member of the Council of the League of Nations shall have the right to bring to the attention of the council any infraction, or any danger of infraction, of any of these obligations, and that the council may thereupon take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances.

Austria further agrees that any difference of opinion as to questions of law or fact arising out of these articles between the Austrian Government and any one of the principal allied and associated powers or any other power, a member of the Council of the League of Nations, shall be held to be a dispute of an international character under Article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations. The Austrian Government hereby consents that any such dispute shall, if the other party thereto demands, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The decision of the permanent court shall be final and shall have the same force and effect as an award under Article 13 of the covenant.

SECTION VI.—CAUSES RELATING TO NATIONALITY

Article 70.—Every person possessing rights of citizenship (pertinenza) in territory which formed part of the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy shall obtain ipso facto to the exclusion of Austrian nationality the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over such territory.

Article 71.—Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 70, Italian nationality shall not, in the case of territory transferred to Italy, be acquired ipso facto;

(1) by persons possessing rights of citizenship in such territory who were not born there:

(2) by persons who acquired their rights of citizenship in such territory after May 24, 1915, or who acquired them only by reason of their official position.

Article 72.—The persons referred to in Article 71, as well as those who (a) formerly possessed rights of citizenship in the territories transferred to Italy, or whose father, or mother if the father is unknown, possessed rights of citizenship in such territories, or (b) have served in the Italian Army during the present war, and their descendants, may claim Italian nationality subject to the conditions prescribed in Article 78 for the right of option.

Article 73.—The claim to Italian nationality by the persons referred to in Article 72 may in individual cases be refused by the competent Italian authority.

Article 74.—Where the claim to Italian nationality under Article 72 is not made, or is refused, the persons concerned will obtain ipso facto the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over the territory in which they possessed rights of citizenship before acquiring such rights in the territory transferred to Italy.

Article 75.—Juridical persons established in the territories transferred to Italy shall be considered Italian if they are recognized as such either by the Italian administrative authorities or by an Italian judicial decision.

Article 76.—Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 70, persons who acquired rights of citizenship after Jan. 1, 1910, in territory transferred under the present treaty to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, or to the Czechoslovak State, will not acquire Serb-Croat-Slovene or Czechoslovak nationality without a permit from the Serb-Croat-Slovene State or the Czechoslovak State respectively.

Article 77.—If the permit referred to in Article 76 is not applied for, or is refused, the persons concerned will obtain ipso facto the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over the territory in which they previously possessed rights of citizenship.

Article 78.—Persons over 18 years of age losing their Austrian nationality and obtaining ipso facto a new nationality under Article 70 shall be entitled within a period of one year from the coming into force of the present treaty to opt for the nationality of the State in which they possessed rights of citizenship before acquiring such rights in the territory transferred.

Option by a husband will cover his wife and option by parents will cover their children under 18 years of age.

Persons who have exercised the above right to opt must within the succeeding twelve months transfer their place of residence to the State for which they have opted.

They will be entitled to retain their immovable property in the territory of the other State where they had their place of residence before exercising their right to opt.

They may carry with them their movable property of every description. No export or import duties may be imposed upon them in connection with the removal of such property.

Article 79.—Persons entitled to vote in plebiscites provided for in the present treaty shall within a period of six months after the definitive attribution of the area in which the plebiscite has taken place be entitled to opt for the nationality of the State to which the area is not assigned.

The provisions of Article 78 relating to the right of option shall apply equally to the exercise of the right under this article.

Article 80.—Persons possessing rights of citizenship in territory forming part of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy, and differing in race and language from the majority of the population of such territory, shall within six months of the coming into force of the present treaty severally be entitled to opt for Austria, Italy, Poland, Rumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, or the Czechoslovak State, if the majority of the population of the State selected is of the same race and language as the person exercising the right to opt. The provisions of Article 78 as to the exercise of the right of option shall apply to the right of option given by this article.

Article 81.—The high contracting parties undertake to put no hindrance in the way of the exercise of the right which the persons concerned have under the present treaty, or under treaties concluded by the allied and associated powers with Germany, Hungary or Russia, or between any of the allied and associated powers themselves, to choose any other nationality which may be open to them.

Article 82.—For the purposes of the provisions of this section, the status of a married woman will be governed by that of her husband, and the status of children under 18 years of age by that of their parents.

SECTION VII.—CLAUSES RELATING TO CERTAIN NATIONS

[Section VII. binds Austria to accept all allied terms relating to Belgium, Luxemburg, Schleswig, Turkey, Bulgaria, and the Russian States.]

SECTION VIII.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 88.—The independence of Austria is inalienable otherwise than with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations. Consequently Austria undertakes in the absence of the consent of the said Council to abstain from any act which might directly or indirectly or by any means whatever compromise her independence, particularly, and until her admission to membership of the League of Nations, by participation in the affairs of another power.

Article 89.—Austria hereby recognizes and accepts the frontiers of Bulgaria, Greece, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and the Czechoslovak State as these frontiers may be determined by the principal allied and associated powers.

Article 90.—Austria undertakes to recognize the full force of the treaties of peace and additional conventions which have been or may be concluded by the allied and associated powers with the powers who fought on the side of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy, and to recognize whatever dispositions have been or may be made concerning the territories of the former German Empire, of Hungary, of the Kingdom of Bulgaria and of the Ottoman Empire, and to recognize the new States within their frontiers as there laid down.

Article 91.—Austria renounces so far as she is concerned in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all rights and title over the territories which previously belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and which, being situated outside the new frontiers of Austria as described in Article 27 of Part II., (Frontiers of Austria,) have not at present been assigned to any State.

Austria undertakes to accept the settlement made by the principal allied and associated powers in regard to these territories, particularly in so far as concerns the nationality of the inhabitants.

Article 92.—No inhabitant of the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall be disturbed or molested on account either of his political attitude between July 28, 1914, and the definite settlement of the sovereignty over these territories, or of the determination of his nationality effected by the present treaty.

Article 93.—Austria will hand over without delay to the allied and associated Governments concerned archives, registers, plans, title-deeds, and documents of every kind belonging to the civil, military, financial, judicial or other forms of administration in the ceded territories. If any one of these documents, archives, registers, title-deeds or plans is missing, it shall be restored by Austria upon the demand of the allied or associated Government concerned.

In case the archives, registers, plans, title-deeds or documents referred to in the preceding paragraph, exclusive of those of a military character, concern equally the administrations in Austria, and cannot therefore be handed over without inconvenience to such administrations, Austria undertakes, subject to reciprocity, to give access thereto to the allied and associated Governments concerned.

Article 94.—Separate conventions between Austria and each of the States to which territory of the former Austrian Empire is transferred, and each of the States arising from the dismemberment of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, will provide for the interests of the inhabitants, especially in connection with their civil rights, their commerce, and the exercise of their professions.

PART IV.—AUSTRIAN INTERESTS OUTSIDE EUROPE

Article 95.—In territory outside her frontiers as fixed by the present treaty Austria renounces so far as she is concerned all rights, titles and privileges whatever in or over territory outside Europe which belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, or to its allies, and all rights, titles and privileges whatever their origin which it held as against the allied and associated powers.

Austria undertakes immediately to recognize and to conform to the measures which may be taken now or in the future by the principal allied and associated powers, in agreement where necessary with third powers, in order to carry the above stipulation into effect.

SECTION I.—MOROCCO

Article 96.—Austria renounces so far as she is concerned all rights, titles and privileges conferred on her by the General Act of Algeciras of April 7, 1906, and by the Franco-German agreements of Feb. 9, 1909, and Nov. 4, 1911. All treaties, agreements, arrangements and contracts concluded by the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy with the Sherifian Empire are regarded as abrogated as from Aug. 12, 1914.

In no case can Austria avail herself of these acts and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Morocco which may take place between France and the other powers.

Article 97.—Austria hereby accepts all the consequences of the establishment of the French protectorate in Morocco, which had been recognized by the Government of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, and she renounces so far as she is concerned the régime of the capitulations in Morocco.

This renunciation shall take effect as from Aug. 12, 1914.

Article 98.—The Sherifian Government shall have complete liberty of action in regulating the status of Austrian nationals in Morocco and the conditions in which they can establish themselves there.

Austrian protected persons, semsars, and "associés agricoles" shall be considered to have ceased, as from Aug. 12, 1914, to enjoy the privileges attached to their status and shall be subject to the ordinary law.

Article 99.—All movable and immovable property in the Sherifian Empire belonging to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy passes ipso facto to the Maghzen without compensation.

For this purpose, the property and possessions of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall be deemed to include all the property of the crown, and the private property of members of the former royal family of Austria-Hungary.

All movable and immovable property in the Sherifian Empire belonging to Austrian nationals shall be dealt with in accordance with Sections 3 and 4 of Part X. (Economic Clauses) of the present treaty.

Mining rights which may be recognized as belonging to Austrian nationals by the Court of Arbitration set up under the Moroccan Mining Regulations shall be treated in the same way as property in Morocco belonging to Austrian nationals.

Article 100.—The Austrian Government shall insure the transfer to the person nominated by the French Government of the shares representing Austria's portion of the capital of the State Bank of Morocco. This person will repay to the persons entitled thereto the value of these shares, which shall be indicated by the State Bank.

This transfer will take place without prejudice to the repayment of debts which Austrian nationals may have contracted toward the State Bank of Morocco.

Article 101.—Moroccan goods entering Austria shall enjoy the treatment accorded to French goods.

SECTION II.—EGYPT

Article 102.—Austria declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on Dec. 18, 1914, and that she renounces so far as she is concerned the régime of the capitulations in Egypt.

This renunciation shall take effect as from Aug. 12, 1914.

Article 103.—All treaties, agreements, arrangements and contracts concluded by the Government of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy with Egypt are regarded as abrogated as from Aug. 12, 1914.

In no case can Austria avail herself of these instruments, and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Egypt which may take place between Great Britain and the other powers.

Article 104.—Until an Egyptian law of judicial organization establishing courts with universal jurisdiction comes into force, provision shall be made, by means of decrees issued by his highness the Sultan, for the exercise of jurisdiction over Austrian nationals and property by the British Consular tribunals.

Article 105.—The Egyptian Government shall have complete liberty of action in regulating the status of Austrian nationals and the conditions under which they may establish themselves in Egypt.

Article 106.—Austria consents so far as she is concerned to the abrogation of the decree issued by his highness the Khédive on Nov.

28, 1904, relating to the Commission of the Egyptian Public Debt, or to such changes as the Egyptian Government may think it desirable to make therein.

Article 107.—Austria consents, in so far as she is concerned, to the transfer to his Britannic Majesty's Government of the powers conferred on his Imperial Majesty the Sultan by the convention signed at Constantinople on Oct. 29, 1888, relating to the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

She renounces all participation in the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board of Egypt, and consents, in so far as she is concerned, to the transfer to the Egyptian authorities of the powers of that board.

Article 108.—All property and possessions in Egypt of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy pass to the Egyptian Government without payment.

For this purpose, the property and possessions of the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy shall be deemed to include all the property of the crown, and the private property of members of the former royal family of Austria-Hungary.

All movable and immovable property in Egypt belonging to Austrian nationals shall be dealt with in accordance with Sections III. and IV. of Part X., (Economic Clauses,) of the present treaty.

Article 109.—Egyptian goods entering Austria shall enjoy the treatment accorded to British goods.

SECTION III.—SIAM

Article 110.—Austria recognizes, so far as she is concerned, that all treaties, conventions, and agreements between the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy and Siam, and all rights, titles, and privileges derived therefrom, including all rights of extraterritorial jurisdiction, terminated as from July 22, 1917.

Article 111.—Austria, so far as she is concerned, cedes to Siam all her rights over the goods and property in Siam which belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy, with the exception of premises used as diplomatic or consular residences or offices, as well as the effects and furniture which they contain. These goods and property pass ipso facto and without compensation to the Siamese Government.

The goods, property, and private rights of Austrian nationals in Siam shall be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of Part X., (Economic Clauses,) of the present treaty.

Article 112.—Austria waives all claims against the Siamese Government on behalf of herself or her nationals arising out of the liquidation of Austrian property or the internment of Austrian nationals in Siam. This provision shall not affect the rights of the parties interested in the proceeds of any such liquidation, which shall be governed by the provisions of Part X., (Economic Clauses,) of the present treaty.

SECTION IV.—CHINA

Article 113.—Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favor of China all benefits and privileges resulting from the provisions of the final protocol signed at Peking on Sept. 7, 1901, and from all annexes, notes, and documents supplementary thereto. She likewise renounces in favor of China any claim to indemnities accruing thereunder subsequent to Aug. 14, 1917.

Article 114.—From the coming into force of the present treaty the high contracting parties shall apply, in so far as concerns them respectively:

(1) The arrangement of Aug. 29, 1902, regarding the new Chinese customs tariff.

(2) The arrangement of Sept. 27, 1905, regarding Whang-Poo, and the provisional supplementary arrangement of April 4, 1912.

China, however, will not be bound to grant to Austria the advantages or privileges which she allowed to the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy under these arrangements.

Article 115.—Austria, so far as she is concerned, cedes to China all her rights over the buildings, wharves and pontoons, barracks, forts, arms and munitions of war, vessels of all kinds, wireless telegraphy installations and other public property which belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy, and which are situated or may be in the Austro-Hungarian concession at Tientsin or elsewhere in Chinese territory.

It is understood, however, that premises used as diplomatic or consular residences or offices, as well as the effects and furniture contained therein, are not included in the above cession, and, furthermore, that no steps shall be taken by the Chinese Government to dispose of the public and private property belonging to the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy situated within the so-called Legation Quarter at Peking without the consent of the diplomatic representatives of the powers which, on the coming into force of the present treaty, remain parties to the final protocol of Sept. 7, 1901.

Article 116.—Austria agrees, so far as she is concerned, to the abrogation of the leases from the Chinese Government under which the Austro-Hungarian concession at Tientsin is now held.

China, restored to the full exercise of her sovereign rights in the above area, declares her intention of opening it to international residence and trade. She further declares that the abrogation of the leases under which the said concession is now held shall not affect the property rights of nationals of allied and associated powers who are holders of lots in this concession.

Article 117.—Austria waives all claims against the Chinese Government or against any allied or associated Government arising out of the internment of Austrian nationals in China and their repatriation. She equally renounces, so far as she is concerned, all claims arising out of the capture and condemnation of Austro-Hungarian ships in China, or the liquidation, sequestration or control of Austrian properties, rights and interests in that country since Aug. 14, 1917. This provision, however, shall not affect the rights of the parties interested in the proceeds of any such liquidation, which shall be governed by the provisions of Part X., (Economic Clauses,) of the present treaty.

MILITARY AND NAVAL CLAUSES

The disarmament of Austria is required in as great detail as in the case of Germany. The Austrian Army is not to exceed 30,000 men. The number of guns and machine guns is strictly limited, mobilization is forbidden and compulsory military service is abolished. Surplus armament and munitions must be turned over to the Allies. The manufacture of arms is restricted to one factory controlled by the State, and the use of gases for warfare is prohibited.

The Austrian Navy henceforth will consist of three patrol boats on the Danube. All warships and submarines are declared finally surrendered to the Allies and the treaty names thirty-two cruisers and fleet auxiliaries, including the President Wilson, (ex-Kaiser Franz Joseph,) which are to be disarmed and treated as merchant ships. All warships begun must be broken up.

Austria will not be allowed to maintain any military or naval air forces nor any dirigibles, and all such equipment and material must be delivered to the Allies.

The disarmament of Austria will be carried out under the supervision of an interallied commission, on which the United States will be represented.

The repatriation of Austrian prisoners of war and interned civilians is fully provided for under a joint commission.

Austrians accused of violating the laws and customs of war are to be delivered to the Allies for trial by military tribunals, together with all documentary evidence.

REPARATIONS

Details of reparations to be made by Austria are given in Part VII., notably in the following articles:

Article 177.—The allied and associated Governments affirm, and Austria accepts, the responsibility of Austria and her allies for causing the loss and damage to which the allied and associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Austria-Hungary and her allies.

Article 178.—The allied and associated Governments recognize that the resources of Austria are not adequate, after taking into account the permanent diminutions of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present treaty, to make complete reparation for such loss and damage.

The allied and associated Governments, however, require and Austria undertakes that she will make compensation as hereinafter determined for damage done to the civilian population of the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied and associated power against Austria by the said aggression by land, by sea, and from the air, and in general damage as defined in Annex 1 hereto.

Article 179.—The amount of such damage for which compensation is to be made by Austria shall be determined by an inter-allied commission to be called the Reparation Commission and constituted in the form and with the powers set forth hereunder and in annexed Nos. II.-V. inclusive hereto. The commission is the same as that provided for under Article 233 of the treaty with Germany, subject to any modifications resulting from the present treaty. The commission shall constitute a section to consider the special questions raised by the application of the present treaty. This section shall have consultative power only, except in cases in which the commission shall delegate to it such powers as may be deemed convenient.

The Reparation Commission shall consider the claims and give to the Austrian Government a just opportunity to be heard.

The commission shall concurrently draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging by Austria within thirty years dating from May 1, 1921, that part of the debt which shall have been assigned to her, after the commission has decided whether Germany is in a position to pay the balance of the total amount of claims presented by Germany and her allies and approved by the commission. If, however, within the period mentioned Austria fails to discharge her obligations, any balance remaining unpaid may within the discretion of the commission be postponed for settlement in subsequent years, or may be handled otherwise in such manner as the allied and associated governments acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in this part of the present treaty shall determine.

MODIFICATION POSSIBLE

Article 180.—The Reparation Commission shall after May 1, 1921, from time to time consider the resources and capacity of Austria and, after giving her representatives a just opportunity to be heard, shall have discretion to extend the date and to modify the form of payments, such as are to be provided for in accordance with Article 179, but not to cancel any part except with the specific authority of the several Governments represented on the commission.

Article 181.—Austria shall pay in the course of the year 1919, 1920, and the first four months of 1921 in such installments and in such manner (whether in gold, commodities, ships, securities or otherwise) as the Reparation Commission may lay down, a reasonable sum which shall be determined by the commission.

Out of this sum the expenses of the armies of occupation subsequent to the armistice of Nov. 3, 1918, shall first be met, and such supplies of food and raw materials as may be judged by the Governments of the principal allied and associated powers essential to enable Austria to meet her obligations for reparation may also, with the approval of said Government, be paid for out of the above sum. The balance shall be reckoned toward the liquidation of the amount due for reparation.

ANNEXES

Annex No. 1 to the reparation articles schedules in detail the damages which may be claimed of Austria for injuries to persons or property resulting from acts of war, including naval and military pensions paid by the Allies, and also including repayment of levies or fines on civilian populations.

Annex No. 2 sets forth the organization of the Reparation Commission, its procedure in assessing damage payments by Austria and the financial arrangements Austria is required to make to secure to the Allies the discharge of its obligations.

Annex No. 3 provides for the replacement by Austria "ton for ton (gross tonnage) and class for class of all merchant ships and fishing boats lost or damaged owing to the war," and the Austrian Government cedes to the Allies the property in all merchant ships and fishing boats "belonging to nationals of the former Austrian Empire."

Under Annex No. 4 Austria undertakes to devote her economic resources directly to the physical restoration of invaded allied territory.

In partial reparation Austria is required under Annex No. 5 to make annual deliveries of timber and manufactures of iron and magnesite.

Annex No. 6 provides for the renunciation to Italy of all Austrian cables in Italian ports and of other specified cables to the allied powers.

By special provisions laid down by Article 191-196 (including annex) Austria is required to surrender all loot from invaded allied territory, particularly objects of art and historical records taken from Italy by the Hapsburgs, not only in this but in previous wars. Some of the loot from Italy which the Austrians are required to return are the Crown jewels of Tuscany and the private jewels of the Princess Electress of Medici and other Medici heirlooms removed to Vienna in the eighteenth century; the furniture and silver plate belonging to the House of Medici and the "jewel of Aspasius" in payment of debt owed by the House of Austria to the Crown of Tuscany, and also the "ancient instruments of astronomy and physics belonging to the Academy of Cimento, removed by the House of Lorraine and sent as a present to the cousins of the imperial house of Vienna."

This annex also specifies the return to Italy of "The Virgin" by Andrea del Sarto, and four drawings by Correggio belonging to the Pinacothek of Modena and removed in 1859 by Duke Francis V.; numerous manuscripts and rare books and bronzes stolen from Modena and "objects made in Palermo in the twelfth century for the Norman Kings and employed in the coronation of the Emperors."

Austria also is required to restore to Belgium various works of art removed to Vienna in the eighteenth century.

To Poland, Austria is required to restore the gold cup of King Ladislas IV., No. 1,114 of the Court Museum at Vienna.

Czechoslovakia will get back many historical documents removed by Maria Theresa and works of art taken from the Bohemian royal castles by various Austrian Emperors in the eighteenth century.

The remainder of the treaty is taken up by financial, economic, legal, river and maritime, transport, labor and general miscellaneous clauses subsidiary to the main provisions of the treaty summarized or quoted above. These sections are essentially similar to those in the German peace treaty.

Activities of the Peace Conference

The Dramatic Coup at Fiume

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 20, 1919]

FACED with the multiple problems of boundary determination of many conflicting peoples in Central and Eastern Europe, the Peace Conference continued its labors during August and September. The treaty with Austria was completed and signed at St. Germain. The treaty with Bulgaria was at last definitely shaped and presented on Sept. 19. Late in August the conference was faced with the dangerous situation created in Hungary by the coup d'état of Archduke Joseph and the military occupation of Budapest by the Rumanians.

Regarding the expenses of the American delegation in Paris, President Wilson presented to Congress an estimate of $1,506,776 from Dec. 1, 1918, to Dec. 31, 1919, and asked that $825,000 be appropriated to cover probable expenses up to the end of this year.

IMPORTANT MATTERS DISCUSSED

Early in September various issues of great importance were discussed. On Sept. 12 the committee in charge of the Teschen controversy between Poland and Czechoslovakia began to consider different plans for the taking of the plebiscite agreed upon between the delegates of the two nations in Paris. The Czechoslovak delegation had accepted this solution as the best obtainable under the circumstances, and had indicated that it would be satisfied if the vote were taken with proper guarantees for its impartiality.

The definite resignation of Arthur J. Balfour, British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, from membership in the Peace Conference was the subject of much discussion on the date mentioned. David Lloyd George arrived in Paris at this time for a conference with M. Clemenceau and Frank L. Polk, chief representative of the United States Government at the conference. On Sept. 16 David Lloyd George, just before leaving Paris with two trainloads of attachés, appointed Sir Eyre Crowe, Assistant Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as England's plenipotentiary and sole British representative in the Conference.

THE D'ANNUNZIO RAID

Shortly before the middle of September the strained situation existing between the conference and Italy over the cession of Fiume to the Yugoslavs was sharply emphasized by an event which disturbed the efforts of Signor Tittoni, the new Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs and a member of the Italian Peace delegation, to bring about a better feeling.

The event referred to was the sudden and audacious march upon Fiume by Gabriele d'Annunzio, the poet-aviator—who had performed signal aerial service in the war—at the head of several thousand soldiers and with 40 motor lorries, and his entrance of the city despite the protests of its commander, General Pittaluga, who went forth with troops and machine guns to prevent his entering the city. Advices from Milan recorded the meeting of d'Annunzio with Pittaluga outside the city in a descriptive scene worthy of Livy:

Pittaluga—Thus you will ruin Italy.

D'Annunzio—Rather will you ruin Italy if you oppose Fiume's destiny and support the infamous policy.

Pittaluga—What, then, do you wish?

D'Annunzio—A free entry into Fiume.

Pittaluga—I must obey orders.

D'Annunzio—I understand you would fire upon your brethren? Fire first upon me.

Pittaluga—I am happy to meet you, brave soldier and great poet. With you I cry, "Viva Fiume!"

All forces together, "Viva Pittaluga!"

While this little drama was being enacted the allied forces remained quietly within their barracks, and d'Annunzio entered the city amid great demonstrations of welcome.

In a statement to the Chamber of Deputies on Sept. 14 Premier Nitti announced that the commander of the 6th Army Corps had been ordered to intercept and disarm d'Annunzio's troops, but that these troops had refused to obey the order. The Premier declared that he was determined to act in a manner to avoid grave conflicts. He deplored what had happened, because for the first time sedition, even though for idealistic aims, had entered the Italian Army. Signor Nitti expressed strong condemnation of what he termed the misguided deed of d'Annunzio.

D'Annunzio's troops, described as numbering 2,300, were still in Fiume, and the poet had installed himself in the Army Command Bureau, defying alike the Peace Conference and the Italian Government. The Government, meanwhile, dispatched General Badoglio, Deputy Chief of Staff of the Italian Army, to Fiume, armed with full powers. Efforts were also being made to intercept and stop the rebellious portions of the 6th Army Artillery Regiment and a cycle corps from entering Fiume and joining the forces of d'Annunzio. On the following day came news that the French and British garrisons in the town, at d'Annunzio's demand, had hauled down their flags and left the city.

The reaction of this news at the Peace Conference was intense. Fear was expressed that the coup would lead to the downfall of the Nitti Government. Signor Tittoni left Paris on Sept. 16 and returned to Italy. The Supreme Council, however, after earnest discussion, decided to refrain from interference, and to allow Italy herself to deal with the situation. A dispatch from Rome on Sept. 18 said that David Lloyd George, M. Clemenceau, and Signor Tittoni were in accord over a definite solution of the Fiume question, insuring the Italian nationality of the town, and were waiting only for President Wilson's decision on the subject. Meanwhile d'Annunzio, ill with fever, was issuing fervid proclamations to his forces, who had occupied the whole defensive line with reinforcements received from various sources, while General Badoglio had proclaimed a time limit for the return of these rebellious troops to the line of armistice, to expire Sept. 18. The Italian Government had put into execution a land and sea blockade against d'Annunzio, and expected by these means to starve the poet aviator's troops into submission.

No decision regarding Albania was officially announced. Repeated protests of this country against the "imperialism" of her neighbors, Italy, Greece, and Serbia, especially protests against Greek advances into territory awarded Albania by the London Conference, had brought no response. On Aug. 20 the Albanian delegation to the Peace Conference sent an appeal for protection to the United States Senate. On Sept. 14 Albanian refugees arriving in Paris from Koritzia brought reports of the plight of many Albanians, fearing massacre before the advance of Greek forces. Albania at this time petitioned the Peace Conference to keep French officials in the district or to send a small American force there to steady the situation, pending the settlement by the conference of the whole Albanian question.

Ceremony at the Quai d'Orsay

THE Peace Treaty between the allied and associated powers and Bulgaria was handed to the Bulgarian peace delegation on Sept. 19, 1919, at 10:40 A. M. in the Clock Room of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the Quai d'Orsay in Paris. It was received by General Theodoroff and the four other members of the Bulgarian delegation.

Representatives of each of the twenty-seven Governments participating in the conference, including Rumania, were present. Frank L. Polk, head of the United States delegation, sat on M. Clemenceau's right and Sir Eyre Crowe, the new British plenipotentiary to the Peace Conference, sat on the President's left.

General Theodoroff, head of the Bulgarian delegation; M. Ganef, M. Saksouff, M. Stambouli, and M. Hartzoff entered the Foreign Office punctually, their dark faces showing no emotion, in contrast to the pale, drawn countenances displayed by the German plenipotentiaries at the Versailles ceremony and with Dr. Renner's good-humored demeanor on the occasion of the signing of the Austrian treaty at St. Germain. They were ushered into the large dining room, where the plenary sessions of the Peace Conference formerly were held. The allied delegates rose when the Bulgarian representatives appeared.

Premier Clemenceau opened the proceedings by stating that the meeting had been called to hand the Peace Treaty to the Bulgarians and that they would have twenty-five days to consider it and file objections, after which the powers would fix a day for final consideration. Paul Duta, Secretary of the Peace Conference, then handed the bound treaty to the Bulgarians, after which General Theodoroff read a long statement in French, pleading that the Bulgarian people were not responsible for the war, but that their Government had thrown the country into the struggle. He blamed King Ferdinand and Vasil Radoslavoff, Bulgarian Foreign Minister in 1914, for Bulgaria's entry into the war. The people, he declared, did not approve of the German alliance, which "came to them as a cataclysm," but they realized that they must accept a part of the blame. Bulgaria's desire was to live

We have committed faults and we shall bear the consequences within the bounds of equity, but there is a punishment no crime can justify, and that is servitude. We are here not only to defend the rights of Bulgaria; we are anxious also to confess her faults. The rights of nations are indestructible. With your high sense of equity you have put them from the start beyond reach of injury. This is why a guilty State, and even a conquered one, may be allowed to appeal to them.

General Theodoroff's plea lasted for fifteen minutes. When it was over, Premier Clemenceau arose and announced curtly that the ceremony was ended. It had lasted forty minutes. The Bulgarian delegation left Paris for Sofia on the same day.

An official summary of the treaty with Bulgaria was made public by the State Department at Washington on Sept. 18. Many clauses are identical with those of the German treaty, notably the League of Nations covenant, the clauses on labor, aerial navigation, penalties, prisoners of war and graves. The important changes in the Bulgarian frontiers are to the south, where Bulgaria cedes Western Thrace to the principal allied and associated powers and agrees to accept whatever disposition of this territory the powers ultimately decide; but it is stipulated that in any event Bulgaria's western frontier shall be modified slightly in four places to Serbia's advantage.

The Bulgarians are required to recognize the independence of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and provisions are made to change the nationality of the inhabitants of the territory formerly Bulgarian and transferred to other States. Provisions are made for protection of minorities in race, language, nationality, and religion. As special compensation for the destruction of the Serbian coal mines, Bulgaria shall for five years deliver 50,000 tons of coal annually to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State.

The frontier with Rumania remains the same as before the war, although it is understood the question of inducing Rumania to cede to Bulgaria that portion of Dobrudja which is wholly Bulgarian in character will be taken up later. The frontier on the west with Serbia is modified in four places to the advantage of Serbia. The frontier with Greece remains the same, except for slight rectification to afford proper protection to the Greek town of Buk.

The Bulgarian Army is to be reduced to 20,000 men within three months, with universal military service abolished and voluntary enlistment substituted. The number of gendarmes, custom officials and other armed guards shall not exceed 10,000, and there must exist only one military school. The manufacture of war material will be confined to a single factory, and the importation or exportation of arms, munitions and war materials of all kinds is forbidden. All existing Bulgarian warships, including submarines, will be surrendered to the Allies.

Bulgaria recognizes that by joining the war of aggression which Germany and Austria-Hungary waged against the allied and associated powers she caused the latter losses and sacrifices of all kinds for which she ought to make adequate reparation. As it is recognized that Bulgaria's resources are not sufficient to make adequate reparation, a capital sum of 2,225,000,000 francs in gold [$445,000,000] is agreed upon as being such as Bulgaria is able to make, to be paid in half-yearly payments, beginning Jan. 1, 1920.

Payments are to be remitted through the Interallied Commission to the Reparation Commission created by the German treaty. The Interallied Commission shall be established at Sofia as soon as possible after the coming into force of the treaty. The commission shall consist of three members nominated by Great Britain, France, and Italy, with a right to withdraw upon six months' notice. Bulgaria will be represented by a commissioner who may be invited to take part in the sittings but have no vote. Cost and expenses of the commission will be paid by Bulgaria and will be a first charge on the revenues payable to the commission.

CURRENT HISTORY IN BRIEF

CARDINAL MERCIER'S VISIT

ONE of the most interesting visitors whom the United States has had since the war is Cardinal Mercier, Primate of Belgium, who stood between the people of his country and the German invaders. The heroic and beloved prelate arrived in New York on Sept. 9 on the Great Northern, a United States naval transport, and received an enthusiastic welcome from the throng of soldiers, sailors, and civilians waiting at a Hoboken pier to greet him. The Collector of the Port went down the harbor to welcome him on behalf of the State Department, and a committee of prominent Catholics, headed by Archbishop Hayes, with the Baltimore committee representing Cardinal Gibbons, as well as Mayor Hylan, saluted him from a police patrol boat which reached the pier at the same time as the transport. After the transport had been made fast, the Cardinal received these committees on the upper deck.

Cardinal Mercier is a white-haired man six feet two inches tall, with a benevolent countenance and a soft, musical voice. Deep lines in his thin face show the strain under which he labored during the years of war. The Cardinal is 68 years old. At the home of the Archbishop of New York he stated that he had not come on any special mission for the Belgian Government; that love was his only mission, and the desire to reveal the grateful heart of his nation to those who had saved it.

On the day following his arrival Cardinal Mercier reviewed the Pershing parade from the steps of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and General Pershing descended from his horse and went to the Cardinal to present his greetings. Later that day the prelate left for Baltimore on a visit to Cardinal Gibbons.

As a guest of the American Cardinal, in the blue room of the latter's home, Cardinal Mercier granted an audience, in which he made an appeal for America's aid to Belgium in respect to raw materials and machinery, of which his country was in urgent need. The restoration of Belgium, he said, would take a long time. The University of Louvain would be restored, as well as his own palace at Malines. His feeling toward Germany was one of great distrust; Belgium might forgive, but it could never forget. In the Baltimore Cathedral on Sept. 14, before a notable audience, he interpreted American intervention against Germany as God's answer to his prayers. Before another great audience at the Lyric Theatre on the 16th the Belgian Cardinal paid tribute to the valor of American troops and to Mr. Hoover's gigantic work of relief, and again stressed Belgium's great need for assistance in reconstruction.

On his return to New York on Sept. 18 he was given the freedom of the city by Mayor Hylan. A great ovation was tendered the Belgian Cardinal at a dinner in the Waldorf-Astoria, where men and women of many creeds joined in enthusiastic tribute. After a day of almost continuous ovation he stood in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf with bowed head and hands clasped as if in prayer, his shoulders enfolded in an American flag, while speaker after speaker lauded his heroic service in the war. In replying he said simply, "The praises were all, I know, for Belgium."

With Cardinal Mercier on the Great Northern arrived the new Belgian Ambassador, Baron Emile de Cartier Marcienne, who was Minister at Washington until he returned to Belgium five months ago.

STORM ON THE TEXAS COAST

IN a hurricane along the Gulf coast on Sunday, Sept. 14, more than 300 people were drowned in and around Corpus Christi, Texas, and the damage to property totaled more than $10,000,000. Industry was brought to a standstill, and the stricken region was destitute of food.

United States troops were sent to guard the wrecked city of Corpus Christi, and the Governors of many States issued an appeal for funds to aid the stricken survivors. Galveston was saved from catastrophe by its new sea wall.

ITALIAN BATTLESHIP RAISED

THE Italian Government on Sept. 17 announced a great hydrostatic feat in the raising of Italy's great super-dreadnought, the Leonardo da Vinci, which had been deliberately sunk by the commander in order to save a neighboring town and Italian and allied warships nearby from the effects of a terrible explosion caused by a clockwork bomb placed on the vessel by some unknown hand. The vessel overturned as it sank, and the heavy guns became imbedded in the sand at the bottom of the sea. It took months of patient, strenuous work to remove the cannon and other equipment, and to bring the gigantic hull to the surface by pumping compressed air into it. At the date mentioned the vessel was ready to be towed into dock and restored to its former value and efficiency.

FRENCH MONUMENT TO AMERICA

AT Pointe de Grave, France, a great French monument to America was begun on Sept. 6, with the laying of a cornerstone commemorating the landing of the first contingent of American troops in 1917. Speeches were made by President Poincaré and Ambassador Wallace. Premier Clemenceau, Marshal Foch, and other distinguished Frenchmen and Americans were present.

THE BREMEN'S FATE A MYSTERY

THE end of the war has brought no light on the mysterious vanishing of the German commercial submarine Bremen, which left Kiel for the United States in the early Summer of 1916 with a cargo of dyes and chemicals, and which was never heard of again.

A report of the return of the crew of the Bremen to Germany was circulated on Aug. 11 by the Vossische Zeitung of Berlin, which declared the men had reached Bremen. According to this newspaper the British had kept the crew prisoners, completely isolated from the world, so that the whereabouts of the missing submersible might remain a secret. Several days later official denial was made in Berlin that the crew of the submarine had arrived in Bremen. On Aug. 26 the British Admiralty disavowed all knowledge of the Bremen. The fate of this underwater craft apparently will remain one of the mysteries of the war.

DEATH OF GENERAL BOTHA

GENERAL LOUIS BOTHA, Premier Minister of Agriculture of the Union of South Africa, died suddenly in Pretoria on Aug. 28. He had first gained distinction as a commander of the Boer forces against the British, and later proved himself a loyal subject of the empire as Premier of the Union of South Africa and as a leader of the campaign against the Germans in Southwest Africa. General Botha was born in Greytown, Natal, in 1863, and was descended from some of the earliest South African settlers. As a youth he herded sheep on his father's farm and, like all Boers, was devoted to his rifle.

When the war with England began he was merely a Veldt-Cornett, but quickly displayed his ability and was put in charge of the Boer Army of 6,000 men which defeated Sir Redvers Buller with 18,000 at the battle of Colenso. Following the death of General P. J. Joubert he was made Commander in Chief of the Transvaal Boers.

After the fall of Pretoria he carried on a prolonged guerrilla warfare till late in 1901. But as soon as peace was declared he set himself to the task of reorganizing his defeated country and aiding it to play its part in the British Empire. He was made first Premier of the Transvaal, and on the formation of the Union of South Africa he became the Premier, and held that position continuously except for one brief interval. The British always trusted him.

At the outbreak of the world war he took command of the forces of the Union in Southwest Africa. The campaign that he conducted was of the most difficult sort, over a nearly waterless country where the few wells had been poisoned by the Germans and the sandstorms compelled the men to wear goggles. His success was complete, the Germans surrendering in July, 1915, and thus placing under the British flag 116,670 more miles of territory than Germany itself contains.

With General Smuts, General Botha signed the Peace Treaty at Versailles on behalf of the Union of South Africa. He arrived at Cape Town on July 28.

On Aug. 31 General Jan Christian Smuts was appointed Premier to replace General Botha, and charged with the duty of forming a new Cabinet.

COST $81.75 PER SOLDIER

FOR each man transported overseas in British vessels the United States Government will pay Great Britain $81.75 under an agreement reached between Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of Transportation in the War Department, and Lord Reading, representing the British Government. Secretary Baker, it was learned on Aug. 24, approved the agreement, which fixes a price a little more than half that tentatively put forward by the British at the beginning of the negotiations. The total cost of the British tonnage used in troop transportation is estimated at $83,757,250, the number of men carried having been 1,027,000. Similar negotiations are in progress with the French and other Governments.

FEEDING 400,000 CZECH CHILDREN.

THROUGH the American Relief Administration European Children's Fund approximately 400,000 children in Czechoslovakia are now being provided with one supplementary meal daily, according to Earl D. Osborn, American Relief representative.

The Czechoslovak Government has added 1,000,000 kronen to the 5,000,000 it had already contributed for child-feeding work, bringing the total to about $300,000. The Czechs in the United States have raised $100,000.

The importance of the work is shown by the following telegram sent from Paris by Herbert Hoover, Chairman of the American Relief Administration European Children's Fund, to the Czechoslovak League of America:

The children's food program for Czechoslovakia will remain an urgent need for at least another year. I urge you to concentrate on this movement. The new Government is assisting the organization of social service workers for the proper distribution of funds for children's relief coming from America. This has enormous importance for the future of the new republic, and I urge you to give it your special support.

CARNEGIE LEAVES $30,000,000

THE will of Andrew Carnegie, filed in New York on Aug. 28, disposed of an estate estimated at approximately $30,000,000. The sum of $10,000,000 was distributed to friends and philanthropies; the residue was set aside for public use. Many annuities were granted. The philanthropic gifts, including bequests, totaled over $378,000,000.

THE ISLAND OF YAP

THE little island of Yap in the Pacific Ocean suddenly loomed up as an international question when it developed in a conference between President Wilson and the Senate Foreign Committee that this island was an important cable centre and that the United States naval authorities were anxious to have it annexed by the United States.

Yap is the centre of a cable system formerly owned by a German cable company. These cables if taken over by the United States would be made to form an integral part of the American cable system already in the Pacific and thus strengthen American trade and commerce, not to speak of the importance of the island and its cable connections from a strategic standpoint.

Up to the time of the outbreak of the war in 1914, the island was owned by the German Government and was the centre of a cable system which that Government was developing in the Pacific. In 1914 it was seized by the Japanese Government and is being held by that Government pending its final disposition by the Allies, but it is understood that Japan is anxious to hold it permanently, together with its cable connections.

PROHIBITION IN BELGIUM

THE United States is not the only prohibition country, Belgium having followed suit, so far as whisky, gin, and other highly alcoholic liquors are concerned. Soon after the armistice was signed a law was passed forbidding the manufacture and sale of such beverages. The making of alcoholic drinks ceased almost immediately, but not much attention was paid to the rule so far as the selling of liquor in the larger places was concerned. The authorities recently confiscated big stocks the bars had on hand.

RED PARTY FORMED IN UNITED STATES

THREE HUNDRED representatives of the Left Wing Faction of the National Socialist Party having withdrawn from the parent body, on Sept. 2 organized the "Communist Labor Party of America" and adopted the emblem of the Soviet Republic of Russia with the motto: "Workers of the World Unite." The emblem consists of a scythe and a hammer surrounded by a wreath of wheat. A suggestion that a torch be added to the emblem was voted down.

Delegate Zimmerman of Indiana led a small minority who wanted the new organization called the Independent Socialist Party, but his suggestion was overwhelmingly defeated. He said in its support:

I think that the word communist will strike terror to the American workman and we cannot succeed in the movement without this element. I will go as far in the revolutionary movement as any man in this hall, but I think it unwise to adopt this name. If you think I am a coward, search the court records of Indiana.

We know that this country is not yet ripe for the revolution. If it was, the name Communist would be all right. They did not use it in Russia until after the capitalist class had been overthrown.

The party announced that it would adopt a constitution which would be patterned largely after that of the Soviet Republic of Russia. Every mention of the Soviet Republic and Bolshevism was greeted with cheers. One of the first acts of the new party was to approve a plan for a general strike in the United States on Oct. 8 to compel the release of Thomas J. Mooney, Eugene V. Debs, and other radical agitators. Subsequently the President of the new communist party was arrested for violent and seditious public utterances of a previous date.

AGUINALDO CAPTAIN OF INDUSTRY

WORD comes from the Philippines that Emilio Aguinaldo, famed in his youth as a Captain of the insurrectos, is winning new fame in his sedate middle age as a captain of industry. Not only is he the owner of valuable agricultural holdings in the islands, returned travelers report, but he is Vice President of two big cocoanut oil concerns recently organized. One-third of the world's supply of cocoanut oil comes from the Philippine Islands, and the two companies in which Aguinaldo is interested are important factors in that trade.

Back in the '90s, at the age of twenty-six, Aguinaldo headed a formidable revolution against the Spanish Government, then administering the Philippines. When the Spanish-American war broke and the American expedition against those far-away Spanish possessions was organized his aid was sought by the American commanders. His troops cooperated with the American forces, but their young Captain broke with the Americans when the peace treaty with Spain gave over the islands to American control instead of granting them independence. He took the warpath again, with the title of Provisional President, and during the campaign that followed his name was by way of being a household word in America. Finally, in March, 1901, he and his staff were captured by an American force led by Funston, and soon afterward took the oath of allegiance.

During the eighteen years that have passed since the surrender and acceptance of American control in the Philippines both Aguinaldo and the islands have prospered probably beyond his own expectations. His influence with his Filipino countrymen continues very great, but his liking for revolution seems to have vanished entirely.

FOOD ADMINISTRATION CLOSES

THE American Relief Administration closed its Paris office on Aug. 23, formally ending its work in Europe. The offices in Prague, Warsaw, Vienna, and other cities all are closed, except that in some of them bookkeepers are closing accounts, work that probably will be finished within two months. Herbert Hoover, who had supervised the distribution of supplies valued at hundreds of millions, sailed for the United States early in September.

The feeding of 4,000,000 underfed children in various parts of Europe, undertaken by the administration, will be continued by a charitable organization formed by Mr. Hoover, with its main offices in New York.

The American Relief Administration during the six months ending May 31, 1919, distributed supplies valued at $836,175,000 to seventeen countries, according to Mr. Hoover's reports to the Supreme Council. These supplies represented 512 shiploads, weighing 2,486,230 metric tons.

THE CERCAY PAPERS

IN the treaty of peace occurs an allusion to "the Cerçay papers." The clause stipulates that Germany shall return to France all the political papers seized by the German authorities on Oct. 10, 1870, at the country house of Cerçay, then the property of M. Rouher, sometime Cabinet Minister. The London Sunday Times explains this clause as follows: When, on Oct. 10, 1870, the 17th Mecklenberg Division arrived at Cerçay, the soldiers proceeded to turn Rouher's house upside down. In the process they came upon some papers which they would have scattered and destroyed, if it had not been for a German officer who, guessing something of their value, reported their existence and was ordered to send them to Versailles, where Bismarck then was. The Chancellor examined the papers himself, would let no one else see them, and ultimately stowed them away in the State archives, where no one, not even Treitschke, has ever set eyes on them. Bismarck had discovered that the fortune of war had put in his possession a correspondence which gave him the complete mastery over his enemies, the recalcitrant States of Southern Germany. The nature of the correspondence can be gathered from contemporary history; it was also pretty clearly divulged in a letter published in the Kölnische Zeitung. The writer, "M. von D." Dalwigk, Minister of the Grand Duchy of Hesse, wrote, "Though Germany does not actually desire a French invasion, the French, if they did come, would be received with open arms." With such letters in his possession Bismarck held the cards. "I cannot help thinking," says a German historian, Ruville, "that we have there the key to the foundation of the German Empire." A French paper, Le Peuple Français, known to have been inspired by Rouher, declared in so many words that "the confidential correspondence exchanged in 1865 and 1866 between the French Government and the Ministers of Bavaria and Württemberg had also been left at Cerçay and are in Prince Bismarck's hands."

GREEK PREMIER CROWNED AS VICTOR

A STRONG appeal to the imagination is made by the crowning of Eleutherios Venizelos, the Prime Minister of Greece, on his return from the Peace Conference bearing triumphantly the many diplomatic triumphs won by him as the results of his long negotiations with the other allied powers, as an Olympian victor, with the golden wreath of wild olive to which the whole democracy of Greece has subscribed.

The wild olive was peculiarly the Olympian victor's wreath, though the crowning of heroes in Greece was not for those who had performed great and valiant deeds in statecraft, or in defense of their country, but for those who had outstripped their fellows in the athletic games which were the chief feature of their national life. The Isthmian festival, claiming an even greater antiquity than the Olympian, crowned its heroes with dry celery leaves; in the cypress grove of Nemea, a secluded valley among the hills half way between Philus and Cleonae, the wreath was of fresh celery, though there at one time, as at Olympia, which it resembled also in other ways, both having probably come under Dorian influence, the prize was a wreath of wild olives. With the Pythians, at Delphi, the prize was a crown of bay leaves, plucked from the Vale of Tempe.

CAPTAIN FRYATT'S WATCH

WHEN Captain Fryatt (the British Sea Captain executed by the Germans for an attempt to ram an attacking submarine) left his home at Dovercourt on his last voyage in command of the Brussels he carried with him a possession which proved to be his death-warrant. It was the gold watch presented to him by the Directors of the Great Eastern Railway Company for faithful service. After capture he was sent with other prisoners into Germany, and it was not until he had been there some time that his identity was discovered through the watch. With a woman's uncanny intuition Mrs. Fryatt had begged him to leave it with her, saying first that it would be safer in her keeping and finally that she had a feeling that it would bring him harm. The Captain, who was particularly proud of the watch, laughed at his wife's fears, and took it away with him—the first episode in the tragedy which followed.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

SATISFIED on the whole with the results of their negotiation, the delegation of Czechoslovak priests who went to Rome to lay before the Pope the Czech and Slovak point of view in certain ecclesiastical matters of interest and importance to the new republic, returned to Prague on July 19.

The subjects brought under consideration were:

1. The advisability of changes in certain Bishoprics in conformity with new conditions.
2. The establishment of a de facto primacy for the Archbishop of Prague throughout the territories of the republic.

3. The use of the Slav instead of the Latin liturgy.

4. The marriage of priests.

It had been an occasion of grave offense to the Czechs and Slovaks that many Bishops of entirely Slav dioceses were formerly appointed from the ruling races, that is to say, Germans in Bohemia and Magyars in Slovakia, and that the higher prelates were often distinctly hostile to the sentiments of the population.

The annulment of the old Slavonic liturgy was contemporary with the loss of all liberties, political and religious, at the battle of the White Mountain. This is one of the reasons why the Czech clergy are so tenacious in insisting on its restoration now. It was stated that there would be a compromise, permitting certain portions of the liturgy to be in Czech.

Much greater difficulty was encountered on the question of the celibacy of the clergy. A congress of clergy, held in Prague last January, petitioned the Government and the Pope for the legal abolition of obligatory celibacy. There has for centuries been a strong feeling for married priests in the country; moreover, 700,000 Ruthenes who are Uniate Catholics with a married clergy are now within the new republic.

LONDON HONORS GENERAL FOCH

ON July 29, amid scenes of great enthusiasm, the British King and the City of London welcomed the victor of the Marne and the Supreme Commander of the allied armies, General Foch. The King bestowed on the illustrious commander the title of Field Marshal, the highest rank in the British Army. The City of London made him a Freeman of her liberties and presented him with a sword of honor, the highest favor it was in her power to bestow. Among the tributes paid him was one by Field Marshal Haig, who very warmly and with earnest sincerity lauded him for his military genius and his devoted services; for his courtesy on the battlefield and in the council chamber, and for the inspiration of his courage, energy, and enthusiasm. Crucial moments of his campaigns against the Germans were recalled by others, and phrases uttered by him and now become famous, were recalled. After the Guildhall ceremony Marshal Foch met a distinguished company at luncheon at the Mansion House, where he heard many laudatory addresses, and in response uttered words of gratitude for the distinguished honors paid him.

THE SACRIFICES OF ST. CYR

ON Aug. 9 there occurred a great pageant at the French Military College of St. Cyr. The ceremony took place in brilliant sunshine. Six different classes were represented, and the gaps in their ranks made it possible to realize the terrible price France had paid for the victory of civilization. When the war broke out in 1914 the great Military School of St. Cyr was crowded with the youthful military talent of France. Out of every hundred men belonging to this class fifty men met their death. Their predecessors, the class of 1913, had lost in killed sixty-one out of every 100, and the losses of the succeeding classes had been extreme. This fact gave a note of pain to the pageant, which was one of the annual triumphs held by St. Cyr year after year to prove in this way the continuity in the history of French arms. Members of the pageant symbolized in appropriate costume the various periods, from the time of early Gaul down to the epoch of 1914. The ceremony of the "baptism of the classes" was particularly impressive. The military students of 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919 lined up in the riding school and the selected representative of the 1914 class, followed by the representative of the 1913 class, was dressed as a splendid figure of Napoleon. He halted before the General in command and read an address of the purest patriotism. Normally the representative of the outgoing class has to speak to the untried boys and exhort them to carry on the great traditions of the school. On this occasion he addressed men who had led their comrades through the worst phases of war, whose breasts were a blaze of decorations, and who had learned more of the meaning of warfare than many of those who were their instructors before the war.

As each was baptized—the 1914 class as the Promotion de la Grande Revanche, the 1915, 1916, and 1917 as the Promotion des Drapaux et de l'Amitié Américaine, the 1918 as the Promotion de St. Odile (the Patron Saint of Alsace) et de Lafayette, and the 1919 as the Promotion de la Victoire—these men all knelt. The ceremony was much more than a mere form, for throughout their careers all these men will speak of themselves under the title of these respective promotions.

ARMISTICE CORRESPONDENCE OF CENTRAL RULERS

THE two following telegrams, exchanged between Charles I and William II. on Oct. 30, 1918, the day when Austria made her first attempt to obtain an armistice, were published in the Frankfurter Zeitung on Aug. 6, 1919. The Austrian Emperor telegraphed to his ally as follows:

This morning, in view of the fact that the military situation has become untenable, I was forced to propose an armistice to the Italians. But if the Italians insist as a condition that the roads through Tyrol and Carinthia, the railways of Tarvis, Brenner, and Südbahn be opened to our enemies to march against thy territories, I will place myself at the head of my German Austrians to prevent this march by the force of arms. Thou canst count on this absolutely. I cannot have the same confidence in the troops of other nationalities. Cordially and loyally,

CHARLES.

To this message the ex-Kaiser replied as follows:

I have read with emotion thy telegram concerning the armistice proposal. I am convinced that thy German Austrians, guided by their Emperor, will rise as a single man against all shameful conditions, and I thank thee for assuring me thereof. Thy faithful friend,

WILLIAM.

MOROCCO AND THE PEACE TREATY

A REPORT on the clauses of the treaty of peace relative to Morocco was submitted to the French Chamber shortly previous to Aug. 10 by M. Maurice Long, a Deputy. After having recalled the events that have occurred in Morocco—the German interventions, the various conventions preceding the war—the report described the favorable results of French policy which gave France a strong position in Morocco when the European conflagration burst out, thus precluding the danger of an attack in Northern Africa. Far from being a cause of weakness, Morocco proved a source of strength. Under the leadership of its administrators, and of the French soldiers and colonists established there, Morocco vied with the oldest and most loyal provinces of France in its contributions to the common cause. The report continued as follows:

France was justified in presenting to the Peace Conference its legitimate aspirations in Morocco. All of these have been admitted. All the treaties which Germany had made with the Moroccan Empire or with France concerning Morocco have been abrogated; Germany loses all the rights which she acquired from those treaties. All the possessions of Germany in Morocco pass to the makhzen without indemnity; all those of German individuals are liquidated and their value deducted from Germany's debt to France. In the future German subjects will have right of access to Morocco only in so far and on the conditions that the Moroccan Government may fix of its own volition; the same will apply to all merchandise coming from Germany. As for Moroccan products they will be admitted to Germany on the same basis as French merchandise. This whole system means that total eviction which the past justifies and by which the future is guaranteed. France could not obtain a satisfaction more complete.

The pact of Algieras, the Franco-German treaties of 1909 and 1911, the protectorate treaty of 1912 applied to all Morocco. The allied and associated powers explicitly recognized that the treaty of peace should have the same scope. The treaty of peace with Austria placed Austria on the same basis in Morocco as Germany. Tangier, which occupies a special position, being administered by a Sultan protected by France, was provided for by a special charter, drawn up by France in 1914, accepted by Great Britain and presented to Spain, but not approved by her up to the year 1919. By the terms of this charter foreign Governments will share in the administration of Tangier, which will thus have an international character. The central and controlling power, however, will remain with France.

The report of the French Deputy concluded thus:

From the Atlantic to the Gulf of Gabès it is not a colony which we wish to govern, but an African France, henceforth a prolongation of the mother country—awakening to life in the new era of world expansion opened to us by the victory of peace.

American Events

Occurrences and Developments in the United States of National Importance

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 18, 1919]

THE American armies called into being by the exigencies of war were rapidly being absorbed into the civil life of the nation when the Summer ended. General March, the Chief of Staff, announced Sept. 13 that to date 3,305,737 officers and enlisted men had been returned to civil life. Of these 164,670 were officers. The number of men returned from Europe totaled 1,892,483, of whom 89,205 were officers.

For the new regular army there had been enlisted since the armistice 113,239 men, of whom 10,921 asked service in Europe and 2,001 expressed a preference for duty in Siberia.

The following casualties were reported on Sept. 12 by the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces: Killed in action (including 382 at sea), 34,568; died from wounds, 13,957; died of disease, 23,653; died from accident and other causes, 5,281; wounded in action (over 85 per cent. returned), 214,378; missing in action (not including prisoners released and returned), 2; total to date, 291,839. It is interesting to note that of those missing in action only two remained unaccounted for.

AID TO DISABLED SOLDIERS

Increases practically doubling the monthly compensation originally provided by the War Risk Insurance act to disabled soldiers and sailors and members of their families were passed unanimously by the House of Representatives on Sept. 13. Under the new plan the compensation for total temporary disability will be—for a single man—$80 a month instead of $30; for a married man with a wife, or a child, $90 instead of $45; one with a wife and one child, $95 instead of $55, and the man with a wife and two children or more, $100 instead of $65.

Disabilities, it is provided, shall also be rated as partial and temporary, total and permanent, and partial and permanent, for which the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the degree of reduction in earning capacity.

Automatic insurance provisions of the law are extended to cover all men, except those who actually refused to apply for insurance, who were finally accepted for service during the war. The permitted class of beneficiaries is enlarged to include uncles, aunts, nephews, nieces, brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, while the definition of parent is extended to persons who stood in loco parentis to a service man.

COURTS-MARTIAL

In approving the report submitted to him by Major Gen. Francis J. Kernan, head of the special War Department Board, on courts-martial and their procedure, Secretary Baker on Aug. 24 took the official stand that the present system should not be changed except in minor details.

The War Department Board's report reflected the opinion of 225 officers who were circularized. More than half of these gave hearty approval to the present system, forty-three condemned it as basically wrong, and the remainder, a total of sixty-seven, pointed out specific weaknesses which they thought should be remedied.

The most serious defect in the existing system, the report asserted, arises from the "lack of competent trial Judge Advocates and counsel," and as a remedy it was recommended that defense counsel be appointed for each general and special court-martial, and that special inducements be offered young officers to study law in order that they may be fitted for these and other special duties.

PERMANENT RANK FOR PERSHING

President Wilson, on Sept. 3, signed the bill passed by the House and Senate authorizing him to confer upon General Pershing the permanent title of General, which creates him ranking officer of the American Army as long as he remains in active service. As the General is 59 years old, this insures his retention of the title for the next five years. The commission was presented to the General by Secretary Baker on the former's arrival in New York, Sept. 8.

RESIGNATION OF OFFICERS

Since the armistice was signed the War Department has accepted the resignations of nearly 1,300 officers. In July alone there were about 160 resignations accepted, more than twice as many officers as resigned in the entire ten years immediately prior to the country's entry into the war in 1917.

The situation created as a result of the wholesale resignation of officers, most of them junior officers—the very backbone of the regular establishment—was so serious that General March, the Chief of Staff, instructed the Morale Division of the General Staff to make a complete and thorough investigation. The results of that investigation were filed Aug. 18 with Major Gen. William G. Haan, the Chief of the Plans Division of the General Staff, who immediately transmitted the document to General March.

The investigation showed* that the enormous increase in the cost of living was in the main responsible for the great loss in officer personnel. In the great majority of the cases of younger officers the pay received was less than that now given to unskilled laborers. Furthermore, these officers of the regular army, practically all of whom served with increased rank during the war, were now being demoted, and up to Aug. 18 861 had reverted to their former grades, with a corresponding reduction in pay. With their demotion their pay reverted to the scale of 1908.

Opposition to an army of 576,000 officers and men developed from both Republican and Democratic sources, when the Chief of Staff appeared before the House Military Affairs Committee on Sept. 3 to discuss legislation dealing with the future of the army. The War Department's bill would raise the total to 576,000 as compared with 175,000 under the National Defense act of 1916.

As soon as General March mentioned these figures Representative Miller of Washington, Republican, asked what world condition would make it necessary to have a force of such size. Representative Dent of Alabama, Democrat, former Chairman of the committee, and now the ranking Democrat, made it plain that he intended to make a fight to keep the size of the army down to 175,000.

SALE OF ARMY SUPPLIES

It was announced by Secretary Baker on Aug. 28 that an agreement had been reached by which the French Government would pay to the American Government $400,000,000 for all of the A. E. F. property in France, except that allotted for return to this country and for the use of remaining troops.

Under the contract made with France that Government will pay for these American army works, properties, and goods in $400,000,000 worth of French bonds, which are to be delivered to the American Government. These bonds will be dated Aug. 1, 1919. They will bear interest at the date of 5 per cent. annually. Interest on them will begin to run from Aug. 1, 1920, payable in United States gold coin, or, if this Government at any time elects, the interest may be paid in French francs. The principal will also be payable in gold coin.

The estimated inventory value of all of the property of the A. E. F. in France on July 8 last was $969,000,000, while the estimated inventory value of the property available for sale to the French was $749,000,000. The estimated original cost of all the property of the A. E. F. still in France on July 8 was about $1,700,000,000, while the estimated original cost of that part of this property available for sale to France was about $1,300,000,000, according to statements obtained from the War Department.

Secretary Baker was advised that if these supplies had been held in France to be sold or otherwise disposed of by this Government, instead of through the French Government, it would have cost the American Government considerable money. He said that it would have meant the expense, among other things, of maintaining about 40,000 men in France from six to eight months, to dispose of the goods, or care for them. If these goods were placed on sale to individuals in France, it would have been necessary to pay duties on them which would have amounted to about $150,000,000.

GROWTH OF NAVY

The United States Navy Year Book, recently issued, showed that the United States was easily the second naval power of the world, while construction now under way would greatly reduce the difference in tonnage between the British and American navies. Great Britain stands first in completed ships, but the United States is far ahead of all other nations as far as new construction is concerned.

The Year Book also includes what is perhaps the most complete statistical history yet compiled of the naval losses sustained by all the belligerents during the war, and gives the name and the date of the loss of 197 German submarines, a total which exceeds the official German report of submarine losses by nineteen vessels. Previously the German Admiralty published a report in which it was said that Germany's losses in undersea craft totaled 178 vessels. The total naval losses of the war were 883 ships, and of these Germany lost 398 and Great Britain 259. France lost 57, Russia 50, Italy 31, the United States 13, Japan 11, and Rumania, Greece, and Portugal 1 each. Turkey lost 32 and Austria-Hungary 29 vessels, making the total losses 424 ships for the Allies and 459 for the Central Powers.

The total submarine losses of the war were 299 vessels, and of these Germany lost 197, England 55, France 15, Austria 12, Russia 10, Italy 8, and Turkey 2, which shows an allied submarine loss of 88 and a Central Powers loss of 211.

REVIEW OF PACIFIC FLEET

On Sept. 1 the Pacific Fleet was reviewed in San Francisco Harbor by Secretary Daniels. The sky was overcast while the review was in progress. Hundreds of thousands, who lined the shores from the Golden Gate to the foot of Market Street, were able, however, to see the manoeuvres.

Half an hour before the first vessel was sighted Secretary Daniels and his party were piped aboard the battleship Oregon, while the guns of Fort Scott boomed out the Secretary's salute. By this time a long line of the fleet—coming single file—was approaching the Gate, led by the dreadnought New Mexico, and with the dreadnoughts Mississippi and Idaho following at intervals of 700 yards.

The long line of warcraft crept through the Golden Gate, past the Presidio military reservation and the once impregnable old Fort Point, whose thick brick walls the engineers of civil war days built to withstand the solid shot of enemy frigates; past the modern forts, Miley and Winfield Scott, on the San Francisco side of the harbor, and under the long range guns of Forts Baker and Barry, hidden in the golden brown hills on the opposite shore, where Mount Tamalpais stands sentinel to the Golden Gate.

Each ship was "dressed" for the event. The Admiral flew his flag—a field of blue with four white stars—from the foremast, and the largest and newest American flags from mainmast and stern. The flagship of the Vice Admiral bore the blue flag with three white stars from its foremast and those of the two Rear Admirals, blue banners with two white stars, from the corresponding masts. The other vessels flew the national ensign at foremast and mainmast and stern.

PEARL HARBOR DRYDOCK

The great Pearl Harbor drydock was dedicated by Secretary Daniels at Honolulu, Hawaii, Aug. 21. The dock is 1,001 feet long and has an inside width of 138 feet and an inside depth of 32½ feet. It will accommodate any ship afloat and represents an investment of more than $5,000,000.

The dock and naval base have a setting in what is considered one of the finest and most beautiful harbors in the world. Entirely landlocked in a rim of hills, Pearl Harbor could anchor all the naval fleets of the world out of view from the open sea. Pearl Harbor has an area of approximately ten square miles. Its depth is approximately sixty feet. Entrance to the harbor has been made safe for all time by dredging and other work done by the United States.

The drydock had been under construction since 1910. Its opening had been planned to take place long before this, but various delays and the war caused postponement. The most serious delay occurred when the entire bottom of the drydock upheaved suddenly, ruining all work that had been done and delaying construction for a year.

Permanent rank of Admiral in the United States Navy, previously given only to three men, Farragut, Porter and Dewey, was conferred upon Admirals W. S. Sims and W. S. Benson by a bill which passed the House of Representatives Sept. 8, by a vote of 244 to 7.

RAILROAD DEFICIT

Reports of Class 1 railroads of this country to the Interstate Commerce Commission for July and the first seven months of this year showed that the Railroad Administration must face an operating deficit at the end of 1919. At present, the line of 1919 earnings is running far below the standard return guar-anted by the Government to the roads during its control, and while July records show a net gain to the Railroad Administration of approximately $2,000,000 for the month, this improvement is not sufficient to offset the deficit piled up in the first six months to approximately $290,525,000.

COST OF LIVING

General increases of about 80 per cent. in the cost of living during the period from December, 1914, to June, 1919, were shown in tables made public on Aug. 16 by the Department of Labor. The tables were based on investigations in various representative cities. In every instance the greatest increases were recorded in the prices of clothing and house furnishings. Food advances were of third importance. Figures for the period, December, 1917, to June, 1919, show general average increases of about 20 per cent.

Total increases in the two items of food and clothing, without considering other items in family budgets, showed enormous increases from December, 1914, to June, 1919, the advance in the case of Chicago being 157.67 per cent. The same items went up 125 per cent. in Detroit, 125 per cent. in Cleveland, 140 per cent. in Buffalo, 103 per cent. in Portland, Me., 137 per cent. in Boston, 151 per cent. in New York, 135 per cent. in Philadelphia, 128 per cent. in Baltimore, 104 per cent. in Norfolk, 146 per cent. in Savannah, 139 per cent. in Jacksonville, 93 per cent. in Mobile, 135 per cent. in Houston, Texas, 115 per cent. in Portland, Ore., 110 per cent. in Seattle, 123 per cent. in Los Angeles, and 134 per cent. in San Francisco and Oakland, Cal.

Smaller increases in such things as housing, fuel and light and miscellaneous items lowered the general average increase, general percentages being as follows: Portland, Me., 74; Boston, 72; New York, 79; Philadelphia, 76; Baltimore, 83; Norfolk, 87; Savannah, 79; Jacksonville, 74; Mobile, 76; Houston, 80; Portland, Ore., 69; Seattle, 74; Los Angeles, 65; San Francisco and Oakland, 65; Chicago, 74; Detroit, 84; Cleveland, 77, and Buffalo, 84.

In all instances the increases in clothing prices were greater than any other item.

PENALTIES FOR PROFITEERS

The proposed amendments to the Food Control act for dealing with profiteers in nearly all necessities, with a penalty of $5,000 fine or two years' imprisonment for those who charge exorbitant prices, was passed by the House on Aug. 22 without a roll call. This action came at the end of a day of partisan speech-making after the House, sitting as Committee of the Whole, by a vote of 79 to 63, had brought rent profiteers throughout the country within the scope of the law. When the bill was reported to the House this amendment was eliminated by a vote of 77 to 132, and a motion by Representative Griffin to recommit the bill and instruct the committee to report it without the exemption of farmers was lost by a vote of 24 to 200.

Republican leaders who were responsible for the defeat of the rent profiteering section held that the inclusion of this subject would make the bill too far-reaching and break down the purpose of the proposed law, which is timed to reach profiteering in food and clothing. They said that rent profiteering would be reached later in a specific law.

This action marked the first legislative step in the Administration's high cost of living campaign and place in the hands of Governmental agencies sufficient authority to proceed against retailers, who, according to Attorney General Palmer, are maintaining high price levels.

ARMY OF OCCUPATION

Marshal Foch reached a decision Sept. 4 upon the extent of territory in the Rhineland to be held permanently by the American force. Its area will be twice as large as that which has been under American jurisdiction since the last combat division left for home. By Marshal Foch's decision the Americans are again to take over all the Coblenz bridgehead proper, or exactly the same territory on the east bank of the Rhine as they have occupied since December last. On the west bank American area has been extended about forty kilometers, taking in the large towns of Cochem, on the Moselle, Mayen, and Andernach, which have been occupied by the French since the departure of the 3d Division a month ago. On the east bank of the Rhine the Americans will continue to occupy the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, Neuvied, and Montabaur. The headquarters of the American forces will remain at Coblenz.

General Pershing advised the War Department on Aug. 22 that the American force remaining in Germany after Sept. 30 would consist of a little more than 6,000 picked men. The names of the units and their approximate strength were as follows:

	Officers.	Men.

The Police Strike in Boston

Other Labor Problems

THE police strike in Boston, which began on Sept. 9, 1919, and which resulted in the city's being subjected to a brief reign of terror by the lawless elements, at once assumed an aspect of national importance by reason of the far-reaching principles involved. Boston policemen to the number of 1,500 went out on strike on the date mentioned at the 5:45 roll-call as a long-threatened and drastic means of enforcing recognition of their newly formed union and of their right to affiliate with the American Federation of Labor. The strike was precipitated by the suspension of nineteen patrolmen found guilty by Police Commissioner Curtis of violating the department order against unionizing.

The serious consequences of a strike of this nature at once became apparent. Gangs of boys looted shops; hoodlums broke windows; and rioting mobs in Roxbury, South Boston, the West End and other sections of the city were dispersed only at the point of the revolver. Loyal policemen were jeered and pelted with mud. Howling mobs roamed the city streets committing acts of violence. The Provost Guard was rushed to the city from the navy yard at midnight to help quell the disturbances. Mayor Peters issued a proclamation calling on all law-abiding citizens to help the authorities to maintain order. Volunteers were sworn in by special officers and equipped with badges and revolvers. All able-bodied retired patrolmen were recruited. Banks and large business houses organized guards from among their employes, arming them as special policemen. Federal authorities took precautions for the guarding of all Government property.

On Sept. 10 the rioting continued. Cavalry with drawn sabres and infantry with fixed bayonets charged to disperse the assembled rioters. The city was placed completely under martial law, and 5,000 soldiers of the State Guard patrolled the streets with orders to protect life and property. Two men were killed and several wounded by machine gun and rifle fire in South Boston, where the rioting continued for hours. Scores of soldiers and civilians received injuries from flying missiles. Sticks, bottles, and paving stones were used as weapons by the attacking crowds. In Scollay Square, which is in the heart of the city, some of the worst outbreaks occurred, the crowd growing steadily and finally attacking police officers. One man was killed at this point, and others were removed badly wounded to the hospital. Steel-helmeted cavalymen clattered through the streets and frequently took to the sidewalks to break up all gatherings. Banks and business offices were kept fully lighted, and guards sat inside with rifles and automatics in their hands ready for instant use. Millions of dollars' worth of valuables were removed and sent to Springfield or Worcester. The windows of many downtown stores were barricaded with lumber. Numberless persons were robbed. Gambling went on openly on the Boston Common. Unprotected women were pursued and assaulted in dark corners. Some of the perpetrators of these crimes were arrested and sentenced to prison, but many went unpunished.

POLICE UNION'S ATTITUDE

President John McInnis of the Policemen's Union issued a statement saying that the responsibility for the rioting and looting rested with Commissioner Curtis. Ample notice of the coming strike, he declared, had been given, and the public had been informed that an emergency force was being recruited. Why, he asked, was this emergency force not in evidence? Mayor Peters stated that the Committee of Thirty-four appointed by him had done everything humanly possible to avoid the strike, but had received no co-operation either from the Police Commissioner or the Governor. A request made by him to mobilize the State Guard had been refused by the Commissioner.

On Sept. 11 lawlessness started early in the morning and continued through the day. Nineteen more were wounded and forty injured in clashes with troops. Some forty-four men were arrested for gambling on the Common. One was killed. Meanwhile Governor Coolidge had sent a telegram to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy asking for Federal military assistance to maintain order if the 5,000 guardsmen on duty in the city proved unequal to the task.

ACTION BY MR. GOMPERS

A new element was injected into the situation by a telegram, sent from New York on Sept. 12 by Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, to Mayor Andrew J. Peters of Boston, and repeated to Governor Coolidge and to Frank McCarthy, Organizer of the American Federation of Labor in Boston. It was an appeal that the whole matter of police unionization be left in statu quo until after the conference called by President Wilson for Oct. 6.

On the same day Mr. McCarthy announced that the Policemen's Union agreed to accept Mr. Gompers's proposal to return to work and await the result of the President's conference. The Governor referred the question of reinstatement of the striking policemen to the Police Commissioner. A conference, however, was arranged between Governor Coolidge and representatives of the American Federation of Labor and the Central Labor Union, to discuss Mr. Gompers's proposal and the general question of the policemen's right to unionize and affiliate with the association.

STRIKERS' POSITIONS FORFEITED

The next day, acting on the legal advice of the State Attorney General that the police strikers had forfeited their positions in the Police Department, Commissioner Curtis declared vacant the positions of all policemen who had gone out on strike. The nineteen suspended policemen had been discharged, and a new force was being recruited.

After receiving from Governor Coolidge a telegram declaring that he would support Police Commissioner Curtis in dismissing the Boston policemen who went out on strike, Samuel Gompers issued a statement making a further appeal for the strikers and asserting that Commissioner Curtis had assumed an unwarranted and autocratic attitude.

The Bay State Governor, however, remained firm and on Sept. 14 sent a letter to Mr. Gompers in which he said:

Replying to your telegram, I have already refused to remove the Police Commissioner of Boston. I did not appoint him. He can assume no position which the courts would uphold except what the people have by the authority of their law vested in him. He speaks only with their voice. The right of the police of Boston to affiliate has always been questioned, never granted, is now prohibited.

The suggestion of President Wilson to Washington does not apply to Boston. There the police have remained on duty. Here the Policemen's Union left their duty, an action which President Wilson characterized as a crime against civilization.

Your assertion that the Commissioner was wrong cannot justify the wrong of leaving the city unguarded. That furnished the opportunity; the criminal element furnished the action. There is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, any time.

An appeal was issued by the officers of the American Federation of Labor and the Central Labor Union on behalf of the policemen, setting forth the poor pay and bad working conditions of the force, describing their ineffectual efforts to better these conditions and placing the blame for the outbreak of lawlessness on the Police Commissioner. A new wage scale was drafted by Mayor Peters to apply to the newly recruited members of the force. The authorities, however, firmly refused to reinstate the striking policemen, and their places were filled by new men, mostly returned soldiers.

President Wilson's attitude on the subject of police unions was stated in a telegram to Louis Brownlow, President of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in which he said:

I am desirous, as you are, of dealing with the police force in the most just and generous way, but I think that any association of the police force of the capital city, or of any great city, whose object is to bring pressure upon the public or the community such as will endanger the public peace or embarrass the maintenance of order, should in no case be countenanced or permitted.

NATION STRIKE-RIDDEN

Strikes in general were on the increase during the month, as shown by Department of Labor statistics at Washington. As far as bases of comparison were available in regard to strikes and lock-outs, labor unrest had reached its highest point since the armistice. Reports received from Sept. 11 to Sept. 18 indicated that there were 121 strikes under way in the country and that 53 were threatened. Nineteen strikes were settled before Sept. 17. In these settlements it was the strikers who gained the advantage.

The actors' strike was settled on the basis of the open shop on Sept. 6. Demands as to salaries, overtime, and pay for rehearsals were mostly granted, and arbitration was provided for. On Sept. 7 all New York theatres reopened.

Rivaling this in public interest was the threatened steel strike. The vote of the steel workers to strike was taken on Aug. 20. Requests for conference with the steel operators were denied, and even President Wilson's attempt to bring about an arbitration failed, Mr. Gary, Chairman of the Board of the United States Steel Corporation, remaining unmoved in his determination not to arbitrate the corporation's right to continue the system of the open shop. The steel unions made twelve demands, including collective bargaining and wage revision. At least 2,000,000 persons were involved. The strike was ushered in on Sept. 21 by clashes between the Pennsylvania State police and crowds bent on holding labor mass meetings in the Pittsburgh district. Nineteen labor men were arrested. At this time some steel unions had already gone out.

Railway strikes on the Southern Pacific, Santa Fé, and Salt Lake roads, which tied up all Los Angeles traffic, were ended by an ultimatum sent by Mr. Hines, Director General of the Federal Railroad Administration, and approved by President Wilson, declaring the Government's purpose to continue the operation of these roads with military force if necessary. It was stated on Sept. 21 that all the striking shopmen had accepted President Wilson's terms of an eight-hour day and an increase of 4 cents an hour for labor performed. Mr. Gompers won over the shopmen to a ninety-day truce awaiting the results of the Administration's drive to reduce the cost of living.

On Sept. 2 the President issued invitations to labor leaders, financiers, manufacturers, and farmers to attend a conference to be held in Washington Oct. 6-15, for consideration of the problems of labor and its directors. Regarding the International Labor Conference scheduled to be held in Washington on Oct. 29 in accordance with the Peace Treaty, Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, on Sept. 2 stated publicly that no arrangements had been made for representation of the United States and that no such arrangements could be made pending the ratification of the treaty by the Senate.

Among the Nations

Survey of Important Events and Developments in Both Hemispheres

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 15, 1919]

THE BALKANS

THE situation in the Balkans, from internal to international affairs, was rendered confusing by repeated assertions and denials of opposing factions and Governments. Telegraphic messages, except Belgrade official, from the Balkan capitals were few and contradictory.

Aside from the Rumanian adventure at Budapest, with its political ramifications in the Balkans, locally the chief topics of discussion in the peninsula were the partition of Thrace, the continuance of the Rumanian-Serb dispute over the Banat, and the attempt of the Serbian Government at Belgrade to inaugurate Yugoslavia—the Monarchy of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. The Yugoslav propagandists continued to publish documents of varying authenticity and importance tending to show the treason of King Nicholas toward Montenegro, and there were signs that the press of Sofia had espoused the cause of Yugoslavia against Italy and had begun a new campaign against Greece as a response to the growing good-will of Greece toward Italy and the growing accumulation of evidence of Bulgarian atrocities visited on the Greek population of Macedonia and Thrace.

Details of an uprising of Montenegrins against the Serbian Army of occupation came in a dispatch from London, on Aug. 28, only to be categorically denied and stigmatized on Sept. 2 as King Nicholas's propaganda, by representatives of the Belgrade Government at Washington. On the other hand, a defeat of Italian troops by the Albanian clansmen, reported from Belgrade on Sept. 2, was formally denied by the Italian Government three days later and the assertion made that the Albanians, both Christian and Moslem, were working hand in hand with the Italian Army of Occupation so as to restore order and revive industry.

The question of Thrace reverted to its position of a month ago, after several declarations were made at Paris, only to be later repudiated. On Aug. 21 it was reported that the so-called Polk (American) compromise plan for making an international State of about half of Western Thrace, with Dedeagatch as its Aegean port, and with commercial right of way for Bulgaria, had been adopted at Paris with the assent of the Greek Premier, M. Venizelos. On Sept. 1 the French delegates were understood to have induced M. Venizelos to withdraw his assent, and it was announced that the Polk compromise had been abandoned. Meanwhile, the position of Greek propaganda on the subject, as may be interpreted from the material reaching M. Venizelos and American newspapers, stood firmly not only on the claim that all Thrace should belong to Greece, but that Bulgaria should be shut out entirely from the Aegean Sea, and that no territory containing Greek nationals should be internationalized.

BULGARIA.—The Sofia press and official pamphleteers made spirited replies to the charges of Bulgar atrocities in Eastern Macedonia published in the Official Report of the Interallied Commission by declaring that many of the towns and villages within the zones covered had been inhabited almost entirely by Bulgars who had fallen victims to the Greek irregulars, and by resurrecting the Rockefeller report of 1913 containing charges of Serb and Greek atrocities alleged to have been committed against the Bulgars. The Sofia press also charged Greek and Italian delegates at Paris with bringing about the withdrawal by Austria of the Orient Express on the line from Vienna to Constantinople, via Belgrade, Nish, Sofia, and Adrianople.

GREECE.—The Athens press reprinted with general approbation the scheme for the disposition of Thrace advanced by J. Saxon Mills of London, which covers the following points:

1. There is no Aegean port worthy of the name which can be ceded to Bulgaria. Hence it is useless to present arguments in favor of one.

2. Bulgaria already has two ports on the Black Sea which should be of great value with the opening of the Dardanelles.

3. All commercial tendencies of Bulgaria lean toward Central Europe. As Friedrich Neumann has said, Bulgaria is the natural ally of Germany.

4. Let the Greeks accord to the Bulgars at Cavalla commercial facilities similar to those accorded to Serbia at Saloniki. It is useless to speak of any rights in Thrace other than those of Greece, save in Constantinople and its neighborhood, where other considerations demand another disposition. During the recent wars the attitude of Bulgaria has certainly been such that no political or commercial advantage should be given her at the expense of Greece. The right of Greece to Thrace reposes in race, tradition, and present administration, which is acceptable to both the Bulgar and Moslem minorities.

RUMANIA.—Although the replies made by the Rumanian Government to the Peace Conference in regard to the Rumanian military occupation of Budapest were couched in the approved language of diplomacy, the press of Bucharest was more outspoken, and its arguments covered the following points: It was absolutely necessary, both for Rumania and for the conference that the Bela Kun Bolshevik régime in Budapest should be ended, hence Rumania should be thanked rather than censured by her allies; the delay in signing the Austrian peace treaty with restorations, particularly in live stock, rolling stock, and farm implements to be made to Rumania, has kept the latter stagnant, with consequent dissatisfaction for the Government; nothing was seized in Hungary by the Rumanian army of occupation that was not needed for the maintenance of that army or that had not been taken away from Rumania by Hungarians—"Belgium and France should have done the same thing in Prussia"; as to the shipment of arms from Hungary to Rumania, did the conference want Rumania to be defeated by the Russian Bolsheviks in Bessarabia?

The press of Bucharest gave considerable space to translations from the Paris papers commending Rumania's action at Budapest, most of them adding that the Peace Conference needed to be taught a lesson. The case of Premier Bratiano, who returned from Paris to Bucharest, was compared to that of Premier Orlando in Italy—both were obliged to brave the Supreme Council at Paris in order to retain power at home. Vienna reported on Sept. 10 that the Bratiano Ministry was out and that Take Jonescu would head a new one.

The establishment of a Rumanian civil Government in Bessarabia on Aug. 20 brought about direct diplomatic communication between Rumania and Rumania.

According to the United States Trade Commissioner at Bucharest, Louis E. Van Norman, in a report published Aug. 30:

On account of its exceptional economic position Rumania, in the opinion of competent observers, seems virtually certain to recover its financial stability sooner than any other of the Balkan nations and perhaps sooner than any of the nations of Europe, including the new ones which have grown up out of the war. Rumanian credit has always been good. The national obligations of the country have been secured by natural resources, perhaps surpassed by no other nation of the same size. This is demonstrated by the fact that up to the time of the Balkan wars the Rumanian national debt was held almost exclusively by the Rumanian people. There had been practically no borrowing abroad, although before these wars the German financial penetration had proceeded very far in Rumania. Although there is no Government bank in Rumania, as the term is generally accepted in other countries, the National Bank of Rumania is permitted to issue national bank notes to the extent of 30 per cent. of its reserves, and the Banca Romaneasca, a bank with some national character, is granted special privileges. In the hands of the banks, of course, lies for all practical purposes the rehabilitation of Rumanian finance.

SERBIA.—On Aug. 16, the Prince Regent signed a decree appointing a Ministry for the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. It was formed by the Social-Democratic Party. The list follows. All are Democrats save the last three, who are Socialists:

- M. LIOUBA DAVIDOVITCH, Prime Minister.
- M. PAVLE MARINKOVITCH, Public Instruction.
- M. VOISLAV VELTKOVITCH, Finance.
- Dr. ANTE TRUMBITCH, Foreign Affairs.
- M. MILORAD DRACHLOVITCH, Communications.
- M. MOSTA HYMOTYEVITCH, Justice.
- M. VELISLAV VOULOVITCH, Public Works.
- M. SVETOZAR PRIBICHEVITCH, Interior.
- M. EDO. LUKINITCH, Post and Telegraphs.
- M. TOUGOMAN ELABUPUVITCH, Public Worship.
- M. ALBERT KRAMER, Commerce and Industry.
- M. FRANCO POLJAK, Agricultural and Agrarian Reform.
- General STEVAN HADJITCH, War, (no party.)
- M. VITOMER ORATCH, Social Policy and ad interim Public Health.
- M. VILIN ROUKSCHEG, Food.
- M. ANTON KRISTAN, Mines and Forests.

On Aug. 23 M. Davidovitch made a declaration of policy before the Provisional Chamber, which aside from purely internal matters—ridding the country of Austrian crown notes before the exportation of the new crops begins and the expropriation of large landowners—was as follows:

The conditions we demand are based on the principles of international justice, which should be applied to us as they have been applied to others. We are asking for no departure from those principles for our own benefit; we cannot reconcile ourselves to their being transgressed at our expense. We are prepared to co-operate as faithfully in the consolidation of peace as we did in the achievement of victory. Alone in Southeastern Europe we maintained the struggle from the beginning to the end of the war, and, though cruelly stricken, never wavered in the fight for the grand ideal of liberty. Our co-operation in the re-establishment of peace should be sought for and welcomed, because no other nation has had such long and such wide experience of the conditions of the Balkan Peninsula, and our friends would risk missing the great aim of the pacification of the world if they try to solve Balkan problems without sufficient regard to the claims of those of their allies who are most directly concerned in the questions of new frontiers, indemnities, and other economic and political problems. In these matters our delegates at the Peace Conference will have our utmost support. We have nothing to modify in our point of view and our demands, and we will defend our rights and interests wherever threatened.

We feel keen sympathy for such of our brethren as are not yet united to us and are persecuted for their love of us. When peace is concluded we will endeavor to maintain friendly relations with all our neighbors. Without ever forgetting our past experiences, our policy toward them will always be inspired by the principle of not seeking to benefit at the expense of others.

With the new Slav States of Czechoslovakia and Poland we will seek to draw closer the bonds of friendship. With Greece and Rumania, whose aspirations have hitherto enjoyed greater international support than ours, our State, by working for mutual confidence and intimacy, will insure permanent peace in the Balkans.

It is our conviction that until the solution of all pending problems by the Peace Conference, it is indispensable that the Government of this country should be composed of representatives of all political groups, and we are determined to do all in our power not to render such concentration of national political forces impossible. * * * We take the opportunity of solemnly denying the rumor, spread both abroad and here, that the Constituent Assembly will be dispensed with. * * * On the contrary, the Government will in a few days submit to the Chamber an electoral bill, whereby the nation will be enabled, through its freely chosen representatives, to lay the foundations of its future destiny. On the broad basis of liberty that we aspire to establish will arise a solid resistance to anarchy and the abuse of liberty by any one section of the community at the expense of any other, those terrible social fallacies of which we are now the horrified witnesses.

At Belgrade, as at Bucharest, there is complaint of the tardiness of restitution to be made by Hungary and Bulgaria. Rolling stock and locomotives are needed for the newly opened Belgrade-Nish-Saloniki main line. The United States Commercial Report of Sept. 6 contained the following comment on Serbian commercial and industrial conditions:

Of labor in the wide sense Serbia is almost as deficient as in materials. When the army is freed from duty there will be workers for the fields and unskilled labor for reconstruction, but expert technical and professional men are few in numbers and are not capable, without foreign assistance, of handling the problems which press for solution. It is stated that there are not more than seventy constructional engineers, architects, and surveyors in the whole of Serbia. It is much less difficult, however costly it may be, to reconstruct a country like Belgium—before the war the most highly organized for its size in Europe—than to rebuild Serbia, a country in which industrial development had scarcely passed the stage of infancy.

The point which requires emphasis is that Serbia is quite unable, without skilled assistance from the Allies, to re-establish normal life in the country. If that assistance is not forthcoming Serbia must inevitably, when peace is signed, turn for help to the countries which have been enemies.

What Serbia needs Serbia is able to pay for. This may seem strange, but it is a fact that, apart altogether from indemnities for the damage done during the war, the peasant population and shopkeepers have plenty of money—in dinars and Austrian crowns. The explanation is simple. The people in the country during enemy occupation spent little or nothing on luxuries, and all the while were receiving high prices for their goods and produce. They have sold but not bought, and are now in a position to buy largely.

BELGIUM, HOLLAND, AND LUXEMBURG

The Belgian and Dutch press passed through another period of tension in regard to the reconstruction of the Treaty of 1839 and the Belgian claims to Limburg, and to that part of Zeeland south of the Scheldt, or the right-of-way over the Ghent-Terneuzen Canal—which would give the same commercial but not strategic advantage. The tension was characterized by feverish propaganda on the part of the Belgian press and insinuating silence on the part of the Dutch, with the exception of the Telegraaf, which on Aug. 31 assured its readers that the Commission of Fourteen in Paris had no intention of changing their decision of June 4, which was to the effect that no territorial concessions would be demanded of Holland. Also at The Hague the celebration of the Queen's birthday on Sept. 1, which had not been publicly observed since 1914, was the occasion for a patriotic demonstration in favor of the territorial status quo.

That the matter was not regarded as serious in official circles, in spite of certain alarmist messages sent American newspapers, was deduced from the fact that although the Dutch Minister to Great Britain, Jonkheer van Swinderen, who was also the chief Dutch delegate at Paris, made several significant trips between there and The Hague. Foreign Minister Moher and other high officials were away on vacation.

Stories repeatedly appeared in the Belgian and British press to the effect that Great Britain and the United States would guarantee Belgium's security against Germany. There was no official confirmation of these stories, beyond emphasizing the fact that such protection was implied in the Franco-Anglo-American convention which was adopted on Aug. 8, when the Peace Treaty with Germany was ratified by the Chamber. It was ratified by the Senate on Aug. 26.

Malmedy, where Belgian troops had replaced the British on Aug. 13, was transferred to Belgian civil authority on Aug. 25, when registration of the population began which will settle their ultimate nationality. Similar registration went on in Eupen, a district stretching north of Malmedy as far as Limburg. The League of Nations will review and determine the nationality of the registration—whether Prussian or Belgian—within six months.

After four and a half years of work the Rotterdam headquarters of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium and France closed its office on Aug. 16. Its head, since 1914, Walter Brown of Los Angeles, moved to London to take charge of Mr. Hoover's "child's welfare" for feeding the undernourished children of Europe.

According to statistics published by the Belgian Interior Department, the output of coal in July reached nearly 87 per cent. of the monthly output of the year before the war. Although no payments had been received from Germany and little machinery returned, the blast furnaces in the Liège district and the mills in Louvain nearly reached their normal production.

Before the war more than half of Belgium, or an area of nearly 6,000 square miles, was under cultivation, with a fifth of forest lands and only a fifteenth of fallow or uncultivated. A measurable portion of the latter and those parts of the forest lands destroyed by the Germans have been reclaimed and put under cultivation. In the great sand-belt of Campine, across the provinces of Antwerp, Limburg, and Brabant, agricultural reclamations have proceeded with afforestation projects and with equal success have transformed the wastes of sand dunes and marshes into crop-producing and pasturage lands. In this way the great estates of Baron van Havre and Esbeek have quadrupled their capacity.

In spite of its small area, only 998 square miles, and its population of 300,000, the wealth of Luxemburg is $2,400 per capita, or twice that of France. On Dec. 7, 1918, the Grand Duchy denounced its zollverein with Prussia and ever since both France and Belgium have been bidding for preferment. According to an unofficial canvass made by Marcel Noppenay of the Indépendance Luxembourgeoise a majority of the population desired industrial cohesion with France.

FRANCE

The Chamber of Deputies began its debate on the German Peace Treaty Aug. 26. In the speeches delivered in the following days frequent references were made to the attitude of the United States Senate, and several Deputies voiced the opinion that if the League of Nations covenant were the cause of the American delay then the covenant "should be amputated." Aside from the Socialist criticisms of the treaty along lines which have become familiar everywhere, there were criticisms from members of former Governments similar to those heard from the Republican side in the American Senate, without, however, any attempt to formulate reservations.

The principal expounder of the treaty was Captain André Tardieu of the Peace Mission. Louis Barthou, former Premier, declared that the treaty was insufficient and insecure, and insisted on an international General Staff and army to carry out the decrees, when necessary, of the League of Nations. M. Franklin-Bouillon criticised the lead taken by Washington and ridiculed the placing of France on terms of equality with Panama and Cuba. Of the thirty-one Deputies scheduled to speak on the treaty over one-third had withdrawn by Sept. 4, when it was announced that there would probably be fewer than 100 votes against the treaty when the final vote was taken.

In the Chamber on Aug. 28 M. Lefèvre introduced a bill authorizing the issue of a lottery loan of 60,000,000,000 francs ($12,000,000,000) without interest—the largest project of its kind ever proposed. The lottery would take the form of an issue of 120,000,000 bonds of 500 francs ($100) each, reimbursable at par by half-yearly drawings over a period of twenty years. Thus every day for two years a number would be drawn which would win 1,250,000 francs, ($250,000,) and every week two numbers winning 100,000 francs, ($20,000.) After the first two years the 1,250,000 franc prizes would be drawn each week instead of each day.

The American Liquidation Commission reached an agreement with the French Government on Aug. 20, by which the latter for the sum of $400,000,000 took over all the property in France of the A. E. F. with the exception of what had been put aside for return to America or would be needed by the military force remaining in France. The payment was made in gold bonds, with interest beginning Aug. 1, 1920. An official inventory of all the property of the A. E. F. made last July showed it to be worth nearly $1,000,000,000. The part disposed of to France is estimated to be worth $749,000,000. The original cost of all the property was $1,700,000,000, and of that sold to France $1,300,000,000.

Reports to the Department of Commerce at Washington, as well as articles and advertisements in the French papers, show that France needs and is now ready to employ (as she did not realize immediately after the armistice) American engineers, architects, masons, and constructors of all sorts, together with interchangeable structural material for dwellings and factories. Statistics show that nearly 50 per cent. of the younger and most advanced professional men were killed or permanently injured in the war. It was estimated that with the speed made in the devastated regions in the last ten months it would take ten years for complete rehabilitation and reconstruction without outside help in expert skill and prepared material.

The campaign against the high cost of living in France made considerable advance. The Commission of the Food Ministry and the Sub-Commissions of the Départements were reinforced by Vigilant Committees in the Arrondissements, while the so-called local Leagues of Consumers were transformed into Leagues of Purchasers. In small towns the new leagues devote a certain weekly amount for the purchase of necessities and appoint a member to buy the material desired. This has worked out as the bid for estimates works out in larger enterprises—he receives bids and accepts the cheapest. There is no chance for the sellers to combine against him, as the maximum price is fixed by the commission.

Some of the Paris papers took up the question of Russian prisoners, who, released from German war prisons, have been interned at Auch, in Gascony, where it was reported they scandalized the neighborhood. They are fed, lodged, and entertained by the French Government, but they decline to work, and openly declare that they desire to return to Russia in order to join the forces of Lenin.

The National Wine Syndicate and International Wine Committee, two bodies which rule the production and distribution of European wine, issued a manifesto declaring that there must be a great diversion of labor from viticulture, particularly in the Bordeaux, Dijon, and Rheims region. The German market, they say, is overstocked with stolen French wines; America will use no more, and the exportation to Great Britain, which was measurably reduced during the war, is still contracting. The United States in the past imported annually $7,000,000 worth of French wine alone, or nearly twice as much as she imported from Italy. Among other things the manifesto says:

It is a shame, almost a sacrilege. The red juice of Burgundy and Bordeaux was never brought into disgrace by tipplers. Why is it that because there are a small minority of people who do not know how to drink that those who do should be sacrificed together with the most ancient world industry?

ITALY

According to Roman papers the meeting which took place toward the last of August between Signor Tittoni, Foreign Secretary and head of the Italian Peace Delegation, and Premier Lloyd George, at Deauville, France, put in form for presentation to President Wilson what is known as the "Tittoni Compromise" in regard to Fiume already agreed to by Premier Clemenceau. According to unofficial descriptions of the measure it provided for the Italian possession of the city and its two western harbors, while the waterfront east together with a zone on the left bank of the Fiumara or Rjeka shall be administered by the mandate of the League of Nations, with full commercial facilities for the districts of Central Europe which formerly used the port, until such a time as the Monarchy of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes should develop the natural ports lying to the southeast—Buccari and Portorè in the Bay of Buccari, Novi, Cirquenizza, Segna, San Giorgio, the great historic port of Croatia; Ablana and Carlopago.

The Interallied Military Commission at Fiume reported in favor of the League's control of the city. On Sept. 13 Italian volunteers, under Gabriele D'Annunzio, took forcible possession of Fiume, the Italian Sixth Army Corps refusing to disarm them and the allied troops remaining in their barracks.

The press of Vienna began reasserting the Austrian claim to the Southern Tyrol denied it in the Austrian Treaty of Peace. The Popolo Romano of Rome on Aug. 22 said, after discussing the threefold question, whether the Peace Conference was doing its best to satisfy the national aspirations of all, or only of the major allied members, or was fostering discord in an attempt to rehabilitate the enemy:

The promised Utopian Society of Nations lacked from its very birth harmony among its members and a reciprocal acknowledgment of legitimate rights. This amply justifies our claim to Southern Tyrol even against the principle of nationality. Our claim is based on the right of defense. The Brenner boundary is the sole result obtained by Italy's sacrifice of blood and treasure, and is not contested by the Allies, and it would be a crime to renounce the greatest benefit derived from our victory by weakening the defense of the country to favor Austria.

On Sept. 4 the bill granting Italian women the right of national suffrage, after receiving support in an eloquent address by Premier Nitti, was passed by the Chamber by a vote of 174 to 55. Women, however, will not vote in the November general elections.

On Aug. 23, five days before the Chamber reconvened to debate the peace treaties, Signor Nitti, as Minister of the Interior, issued a circu letter to the Prefects of the Provinces urging them to begin a campaign for harder work, greater production, greater economy, and the prevention of strikes. The Government, he said, could not go on supplying bread at an annual loss to the State of $500,000,000, particularly when 1,250,000 acres had gone out of cultivation in three years. He added: "There is a condition in Italy which forces us to act now strongly and vigorously."

On Sept. 1 it was announced that King Victor Emmanuel III. had signified his intention of relinquishing all the vast domains of the Crown throughout Italy for the benefit of the peasantry and soldiers. The Crown properties of Italy are larger than those of any other country, since the House of Savoy inherited the properties of the rulers of the eleven States into which Italy was divided before the kingdom became united.

During the war the King gave over his splendid royal palace at Caserta, the Castel Moscali di Piedmont, for the use of his soldiers. His intention was that the vast lands which he possesses, virtually in every region of Italy, should go to the peasants who fought in the war, while his palaces, castles and other buildings should be utilized for philanthropic purposes. In addition, the King expressed a desire that his private patrimony be taxed like that of any other citizen. Thus the King's civil list, amounting to about $3,000,000 yearly, will be done away with or greatly diminished, as the monarch used it almost entirely to administer the Crown properties or for charitable purposes.

In the opinion of the United States

Consul at Venice, John S. Armstrong, the Pearl of the Adriatic is certain to regain much of its ancient position as a commercial clearing house between the West and the East. In his report issued by the Department of Commerce, Sept. 2, he writes:

The situation in which Venice finds itself today is greatly altered. Italy expects to acquire competing ports on the Adriatic with their railroad connections, has already taken possession of the important railway artery of the Trentino extending 200 kilometers (124.27 miles) toward Germany, and controls the western end of the railroads in the Pusteria. Moreover, as a result of the collapse of Germany the force of its political prestige in the field of international economic competition has been destroyed.

Venice is, therefore, presented with a favorable opportunity to develop into an important distributing centre for a largely extended international zone. To attain these ends, the port must have complete and regular steamship services, an efficient railroad network connecting Venice with its national serving area, and sufficient dock facilities for handling incoming and outgoing cargo.

Venice's position is greatly improved by the removal of the pressure of the Austro-Hungarian railways immediately north of the old Italian confines, and Il Lavoro points out that the port should profit by the new state of affairs by linking itself more closely to new serving areas, such as the Trentino, the Alto Adige, eastern and southern Switzerland.

At present Venice has a single important railway artery completely piercing the Alpine walls which can serve the port for international traffic. This is the Padua-Verona-Trento-Brennero. However, the big curve which the railway describes in the plains near Verona considerably prolongs its distance, and its already excessive traffic does not render it adaptable to a more intense utilization than at present.

LATIN AMERICA

Advices from Buenos Aires under date of Sept. 11 were that two steamers had arrived on that date bringing 450 German immigrants as colonists for the scheme of Baron von dem Bussche-Haddenhausen, mentioned last month. Concerning him and his scheme a correspondent wrote:

Married to an Argentine lady—a member of the important portefio family of Martinez de Hoz—and a man who is not only well versed in Argentine affairs but is also, to give him his due, remembered by all who came into contact with him as a capable and courteous diplomat, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he will be successful in his mission, whatever form that mission may take.

Thus while in many quarters one hears that Argentina is at heart wholly pro-ally, that she has no love for Germany and the Germans, and that her firm desire is to strengthen her relationship with the allied powers, actual facts go to prove the contrary, and official Argentina loses no opportunity of showing the remnant of the imperial party in Germany that they have a firm friend in the Government of this republic. The diplomatic agents in the German Legation are still fully accredited and treated with all the honors; the German flag is still hoisted on the official quarters and on the leading German houses of business, and when the whole city of Buenos Aires was bedecked over the final ratification of peace the Germans ostentatiously held aloof, and in their local press refer contemptuously to the schandfrieden, or shameful peace, which they hold has no interest for them.

On Sept. 13 the Chilean Ministry resigned, principally owing to the controversy in the House of Deputies over the Tacna-Arica problem, which had come to the surface again by Bolivia demanding an outlet to the sea.

The United States Government was in receipt of no official information showing that Nicaragua was involved in the expulsion of Federico Tinoco from the Presidency of Costa Rica and the murder of his brother, as alleged by the former on Aug. 16, at Kingston, Jamaica.

The revolution in Honduras which began in July forced the resignation of President Bertrand in the first week of September and the landing of American marines from the cruiser Cleveland at Puerto Cortez to protect foreign lives and property. The Presidential candidate, Dr. Nazario Sorano, had the support of President Bertrand, while the revolutionary forces supported Dr. Membréño and Lopez Guierrez.

A French military mission under Colonel René Mascarel arrived in Peru. It was reported from Lima that J. Leonard Replogle and Charles M. Schwab had purchased the properties of the American Vanadium Company, thus obtaining direct control of 98 per cent. of the vanadium supply in the world. The general election held in Peru on Aug. 24 gave the Leguia party nearly unanimous returns for their candidates as well as for constitutional reforms, described in these columns at length last month.

A movement in favor of Dr. Fernandez Henriquez, the exiled President of Santo Domingo, was launched in Spain on Sept. 10 by certain Spanish political leaders sending a memorial to the Washington Government suggesting a withdrawal of American marines, who had been maintaining order there since Nov. 25, 1914. By the treaty of 1917 Santo Domingo became practically a protectorate of the United States.

The press of the Republic of Colombia urged the Government to resent the absence of the "apology" in the Colombian treaty which was submitted by President Wilson to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate on July 29. La Palabra of Aug. 2 stated:

Truly it looks grotesque that after the United States unsheathed the sword to fight in defense of justice outraged in the violation of the Treaty of Brussels, now they refuse, in the New World, to make amends for the outrage which they brought upon a sister who was worthy, although weak. The "sincere regret" cannot be blotted out of the treaty with Colombia, without causing the magnanimity of the North American Republic to suffer diminution. The whole of Latin America should back Colombia in this supreme claim and should exert an international and collective influence to the end that our sister may obtain the most complete satisfaction. The United States must not forget that "greatness compels."

MOROCCO

The Sultan of Morocco on Aug. 26 published a proclamation declaring Raisuli a rebel and ordering the confiscation of his property. The proceeds of the latter will be divided between the victims of Raisuli and the Government Treasury. Correspondents at Tangier declared that Raisuli was plentifully supplied with German gold, which enabled him to pay his followers $1 a day, and that to judge from the debates in the Spanish Cortes on the subject the seriousness of the matter was not understood at Madrid. One wrote:

Raisuli has never been as strong as he is now. There is, too, a spirit of waning loyalty among the tribes which have already submitted to Spain that only a decided Spanish success can cure.

The great religious sect of Derkaona, hitherto friendly to Spain, and on whose support so much depends, is now divided in its opinion, and many of its devotees are already openly on Raisuli's side. The Spanish authorities here and in Tetua seem to realize this and are taking a step to counteract this action that can only be described as hazardous. Perhaps the critical situation warrants it. Both Spain and Raisuli are playing for the support of these Derkaona, and my information is that Raisuli is winning. He has released certain Derkaona prisoners whom he held incarcerated and has received a Derkaona deputation at the Fondako.

PERSIA

In regard to the Anglo-Persian treaty, described last month, the full text published on Aug. 18 in Paris aroused a wave of drastic criticism in the press of the capital. The following passage is from an article in the Echo de Paris:

If the above stipulations do not constitute a most complete protectorate then words have lost their meaning. Doubtless nowhere is a formal protectorate mentioned, and doubtless a clause announces the independence and full integrity of Persia, but the substance of the agreement will fool no one.

Le Temps four days previous had said:

The departure of the Shah of Persia, who is proceeding to Europe, appears to have been hastened as a result of the feeling caused in Teheran by the signature of an agreement which has been negotiated during the last few months by the British Legation there. The agreement recognizes the independence and integrity of Persia, but nevertheless contains stipulations which seem to point to the fact that henceforth only British influence will be exerted in that country.

Only British subjects will henceforth be able to be engaged as foreign officials by the Persian Government. British experts will reorganize finances in Persia, to which country Britain is making a loan. Great Britain will also reorganize the Persian Army, supplying instruction and modern arms. British capital will be interested in concessions in Persia, and Great Britain promises to help the Persian Government to obtain pecuniary and territorial reparation.

According to reports from Persia, the new agreement has not been well received by public opinion, which accuses the Government of having sold the country. It can easily be understood that the Persians are not enthusiastic over the contract, which will place Persia in a situation analogous to that of Egypt, and it is difficult to explain why they should be surprised at this event, as it is merely the last stage of a process which has developed logically. The fact that Persia has been admitted to the League of Nations will not inspire many illusions, as the situation in Persia is exactly what might have been foreseen from the moment when Russia disappeared from the scene of international politics.

On Aug. 18 Cecil B. Harmsworth, British Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, made a protracted denial of the foregoing charges in the House of Commons.

TURKEY AND ARMENIA

The fate of Armenia overshadowed every other subject connected with the attempt of the Peace Conference to adjust the affairs of Turkey. While the State Department at Washington put itself on record Aug. 28 by declaring that the United States neither desired nor would accept a mandate for Armenia, and that public opinion here would not support the necessary military force to preserve the Armenian Republic from the Turks, prominent Armenians all over the world in petitions and pamphlets sent to Paris and Washington urged the mandatory guardianship of the United States as the only means to save the survivors of the Turkish war massacres. Later it was explained at Washington that the American Government, which did not declare war on Turkey, was merely following its pre-war policy there, although this policy might be later modified in accordance with the report expected from Major Gen. James G. Harbord, then making an investigation in Armenia and the Transcaucasus.

On Sept. 14 M. Venizelos, the Prime Minister of Greece, was quoted as saying in Paris that the idea of an American mandate for Armenia would be popular among all the powers concerned, but that if the status of Turkey were not settled soon there would be no Armenians left.

Why the Saloniki Army Was Powerless

By GORDON GORDON-SMITH

[CAPTAIN OF THE ROYAL SERBIAN ARMY AND ATTACHE OF THE SERBIAN LEGATION AT WASHINGTON]

Acting as war correspondent for London and New York newspapers, Captain Gordon-Smith was with the Serbian headquarters staff in 1915 from the attack on Belgrade to the final retreat through Albania. In July, 1916, at the request of M. Pashitch, he returned to the Serbian headquarters at Saloniki and was with the staff of three Serbian armies up to the fall of Monastir. Toward the end of the war he became attached to the Serbian headquarters staff with the rank of Captain of Cavalry and has since been sent on important diplomatic missions to Paris, London, and Washington. He has here written for CURRENT HISTORY the inside facts as to why Sarraill's army of half a million men stood practically idle until the last months of the war.

DURING the world war just terminated, with its clash of peoples on a score of fronts, it was difficult for the public to follow the various phases and realize their relative importance. Military tactics and strategy were often divorced from policy, with the result that the co-ordination of the effort suffered and the war, instead of being waged by the Allies as a whole on a well-defined plan, was split up into a series of water-tight compartments, each of which was regarded by those fighting in it as the crucial one for the decision of the whole war. Some fronts were given undue prominence, others excited little or no interest.

An example of the latter was the Saloniki front. The Army of the Orient was the Cinderella of the Allies, as far as treatment was concerned. This front was, in certain quarters, regarded as one of merely secondary importance. The Army of the Orient, under the command of General Sarraill, was considered to have the mission of holding the line from Monastir to the Aegean, so as to exercise pressure on the German, Austrian, Bulgarian, and Turkish forces defending it, immobilize them, and prevent their utilization elsewhere. But there was no intention of so reinforcing the allied army as to permit of its undertaking an energetic offensive and, coûte que coûte, cutting the Berlin-Constantinople railway.

This was, however, a completely false conception of the mission of the Army of the Orient. The Saloniki front was not one of secondary importance; it was a front of capital importance. On no other front would such immense and far-reaching effects have resulted from a successful offensive.

In stating this I am not expressing a merely personal opinion. During the eighteen months I spent with the headquarters staff of the Serbian Army I had continual opportunity of discussing with officers of the highest rank the importance of the whole Balkan front, and in the ten months I passed on the Saloniki front, of discussing the real mission of the Army of the Orient. I found them unanimous in their opinion as to the importance of the operations in Macedonia.

IMPORTANCE OF RAILWAY

In their opinion, the objective of the Army of the Orient was the cutting of the Berlin-Constantinople railway. It was notorious that Germany drew immense resources from Asia Minor, and that Bulgaria and Serbia were also laid under contributions.

A swarm of German officials had been sent down to these countries, which had been cut up into sections like a chess board, and were swept clean of everything that could be made use of. All day and every day trains filled with food were rolling up to Germany from the Balkan States and Asia Minor, while the trains traveling from Germany to Constantinople were filled with munitions, without which the resistance of Turkey to the British and Russian Armies would at once have collapsed.

The possession of the Berlin-Constantinople railroad further assured the Central Powers the mastery of the Dardanelles. As Germany controlled the entrances to the Baltic, Russia was practically isolated from her allies. The only means they had of forwarding war material to her was via Vladivostok or Archangel. In other words "Mittel-europa" was realized and a situation created which, if it could have been made permanent, would have assured to Germany the domination of Europe, the first step to world dominion.

There is not the slightest doubt that the cutting of the railway would have brought about the immediate collapse of Turkey. This would have meant the reopening of the Dardanelles, the re-provisioning of Russia, then still in the field, with munitions, of which she was sorely in need, and the delivery to the Allies of the immense quantities of food-stuffs accumulated in Southern Russia after the closing of the strait. At the same time the collapse of Turkey as a military power would have set free the British armies in Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Palestine and the Russian Army in the Caucasus for service elsewhere.

BLUNDER OF THE ALLIES

The appearance of the allied fleets in the Black Sea would undoubtedly have called a halt to the intrigues of the pro-German court camarille surrounding the Czar, and even if the Russian revolution had nevertheless taken place, the Kerensky army on the Polish front, as a "force in being," would have been maintained, Bolshevism would have been nipped in the bud, and the whole course of the war might have been changed. The failure to recognize these elementary truths constitutes the second capital error of the Allies in the Balkans and undoubtedly prolonged the war by at least two years.

Once Bulgaria and Turkey were disposed of, the Army of the Orient could have reoccupied Serbia, moved on the Danube, and threatened Budapest. The Hungarian capital would then have been menaced from three sides—from the Danube, from the Rumanian front, and by the Russian Army then operating in the Bukovina. The country around Budapest being one immense plain, on which there are no fortresses of any importance, the defense of the capital would have called for an immense number of men, which Austria at that moment did not possess.

The chief arguments of the opponents of the Saloniki front were: (1) The excessive demands it made on tonnage, (2) the difficulties of communication, and (3) the mountainous nature of the country.

The excessive demands made on tonnage for the transport of troops and war material was due to the failure of the Allies to utilize all the means of transport at their disposal. For eighteen long months they only made use of the sea route. As a transport steaming at ten knots (the speed imposed on it by the scarcity of coal) took ten days to make the voyage from Marseilles to Saloniki, a ship could only deliver one cargo per month. At the same time the Mediterranean and the Aegean were swarming with submarines, and a large proportion of the transports were sunk. It was only in December, 1917, that some one in the War Office in London perceived that if troops and stores were forwarded by land to Taranto in the south of Italy they could be shipped over to Greece in a single night, thus avoiding the submarine danger. One ship going backward and forward between Italy and the Greek ports could therefore do the work of ten running from Marseilles to Saloniki.

MARVELS IN ROAD BUILDING

As soon as this was realized, a clause giving the Allies the right to disembark troops and stores at Itea, the Greek railroad in the Gulf of Lepanto, whence they could be forwarded by rail to Saloniki, was inserted in one of the many ultimatums sent to King Constantine. The Italians also constructed a "route carrossable" from Santa Quaranta to Monastir, a marvel of military engineering, by which they were able to send thousands of tons a day of war material by motor truck.

As regards the second difficulty—the means of communication in Macedonia itself—an immense improvement had been made. When the expeditionary force first landed, in 1915, there were only three lines of railway—and those single track—and such roads as had existed under the Turkish régime. But the 300,000 men composing General Sarrail's force, reinforced by thousands of Macedonian peasants, in less than a year and a half constructed thousands of kilometers of roads and hundreds of kilometers of light railways.

Mountains on which a year before only sheep tracks existed were made accessible to heavy guns. An immense amount of motor transport was accumulated, and hundreds of thousands of pack animals were at the disposal of the allied army. The army of General Sarrail was, therefore, if reinforced, in a position to undertake a successful offensive. The Serbian advanced lines were in January, 1917, only a matter of eighty miles from Nish, one of the principal stations of the Berlin-Constantinople railway.

The third objection—the mountainous nature of the country—was greatly exaggerated. It did not offer any insuperable obstacle to military operations. The brilliant campaign of Field Marshal Misitch, which culminated in the capture of Monastir, is a proof of this. He attacked, with inferior numbers, an enemy intrenched in most formidable mountain strongholds and drove them from one position after another. In fact, the superior skill of the Serbians in mountain fighting gave them a distinct advantage over the Germans in a country like the Balkans. Their knowledge of the country enabled them to seize advantages to outmanoeuvre an enemy who was not accustomed to that kind of warfare. It may further be argued that in no country has there ever been so much fighting as in the Balkans.

The mountainous nature of the country did not prevent the States composing the Balkan League from inflicting in 1912 a crushing defeat on Turkey; neither did it prevent the German-Austrian-Bulgarian Armies in 1915 from driving the Serbian Army into Albania. On that occasion 250,000 Serbs resisted the invasion of 750,000 Germans, Austrians, and Bulgarians for over two months. The fact that they were able to do so is only attributable to their superior skill in this kind of warfare.

SALONIKI'S NAVAL VALUE

The Saloniki front had not only immense military importance, but its naval value could hardly be overestimated—by this I mean its naval value for the enemy. If, by any chance, the Germans and their allies had driven the Army of the Orient out of Saloniki and seized the city and bay, the effect would have been simply catastrophic.

The Port of Saloniki is one of the most magnificent in the world; a land-locked harbor miles in extent, in which the navies of the world could lie at anchor. If this had fallen into the hands of the Germans they would at once have formed it into a submarine base of the most formidable kind. Then would have followed the invasion of Greece. Once the Germans were in firm possession of that country, they would have established other submarine bases in the rocky and indented coast line of Greece and in the hundreds of islands forming the Archipelago. Once they were firmly established there, the task of driving them out would have been one of superhuman difficulty.

The result would have been that hundreds of submarines and submarine mine layers would have been let loose in the Aegean and the Mediterranean. It would have been perfectly possible for them to stop all traffic by the Suez Canal, thereby cutting Great Britain off from direct communication with India, and depriving the large British Army holding Egypt from receiving supplies and munitions. The attack by the Turks on the Suez Canal would then undoubtedly have been resumed, as the difficulty of providing the army defending Egypt with munitions would have rendered the chances of success more than probable.

In these circumstances, the Suez Canal being put out of commission, the Germans would have left no stone unturned to bring about trouble in British India. That this was their program is proved by the prosecution of Hindu conspirators held in 1917 in San Francisco. With the Suez Canal cut, the only means of communication between Great Britain and India would have been the long and difficult voyage via the Cape of Good Hope.

It was, therefore, for the Allies a life-and-death question not only to maintain themselves in force on the Saloniki front, but it was also of the highest importance that this front should be so reinforced as to allow the Army of the Orient to take an energetic offensive and cut the Berlin-Constantinople line.

There was, in addition, the danger that the Russian collapse might any day set free some hundreds of thousands of German troops for service in the Balkans. There is no doubt that the Great General Staff at Berlin was thoroughly alive to the immense results which would follow from successful operations at Saloniki; in fact, the loss of Saloniki would be irreparable. Once Germany was master of the Aegean and the Mediterranean, victory for her would be in sight. That the Great General Staff did not undertake operations only proves how hard pressed it was on other fronts. This renders the failure of the Allies to realize their opportunity all the more inexcusable.

ERROR IN BRITISH ATTITUDE

On the Saloniki front the only possible policy was, therefore, an energetic offensive. But in certain British circles it was argued that this front could perfectly well fulfill its mission by simply defending the intrenched camp of Saloniki. This, supported by the guns of the fleet, was, they declared, impregnable.

There could be no greater error. Any abandonment of the line running from the Albanian frontier across the plain of Monastir and along the Moglene Mountain range to Lake Doiran and the Struma Valley would have been disastrous. It would have permitted the German troops and their allies to seize Greece and threaten Saloniki both by land and sea. Once masters of Greece, Germany would have had little difficulty in rendering the access to Saloniki by sea or land either impossible or a matter of extreme difficulty.

The intrenched camp could have been closely invested until such time as the Germans and their allies had established themselves solidly in Greece and Greek Macedonia and concentrated overwhelmingly superior forces for an attack. With the Aegean Sea swarming with hostile submarines, the position of the force defending the intrenched camp would have been precarious in the extreme. The prize was too great for the Germans not to put forward every effort to win it.

Such a policy would have cut off all communication between the Italian force in Albania and the Army of the Orient. Shortly after the capture of Monastir the liaison was successfully established between the Italian army of occupation in Albania and the forces of General Sarrail, so that the fighting line was continuous from Valona on the Adriatic to the Gulf of Cavalla on the Aegean. The successful expulsion of the Germans and Bulgarians from Greek Macedonia entailed ten months of hard fighting and cost the Army of the Orient 40,000 men. Its abandonment would have meant the loss of thousands of kilometers of roads and hundreds of kilometers of light railways constructed at a cost of millions of dollars. In addition, the unfortunate population would have been delivered over to the tender mercies of a ruthless and cruel enemy.

No more suicidal policy could therefore have been imagined than any abandonment of the conquered territory by the Allies, and the idea of confining the task of the Army of the Orient to the defense of the intrenched camp was, in the opinion of all competent authorities on the spot with whom I discussed the question, strategically and tactically unsound.

ARMY OF 500,000 PARALYZED

The result of this failure of the Allies to realize the importance of the Saloniki front (or perhaps it would be more correct to say their divided opinions in regard to it) paralyzed the action of an army of 500,000 men. This was more than was required for the mere defense of the entrenched camp of Saloniki and not sufficient to undertake an offensive. Every time the Army of the Orient undertook a successful operation it was unable to follow it up for want of men.

The capture of Florina by the French and Serbs on Sept. 18, 1916, was a case in point. The Bulgarians retired with such precipitation that little would have been required to turn their retreat into a rout. But the necessary reserves for this were lacking, with the result that instead of being driven back in confusion to Prilep and Veles the Bulgarians were able to reform their fleeing regiments, "dig themselves in" a few miles further back and again arrest the operations of the allied army.

A few weeks later came the second offensive, the brilliant campaign of the army under the command of Field Marshal Misitch, which resulted in the capture of Monastir. But as before he possessed no reserves, he was unable to follow up his victory with the result that the retreating enemy once more were able to intrench themselves in formidable mountain positions. And during all this time the Army of the Orient was melting away as the result of the ravages of malaria. The armies sweltering on the plains fell victim to it by tens of thousands. At one time there were not sufficient hospital ships to repatriate the sick.

FRANCE FOR ACTION

When the position of the Army of the Orient had thus been reduced to one of stalemate I had, in the early months of 1917, occasion to visit Paris and London and made it my business to find out the views of the French and British statesmen regarding the Saloniki front. In Paris I had long conversations with M. Briand, then Prime Minister; M. Stephen Pichon, the present Minister of Foreign Affairs; General Malterre, the famous French military writer; M. Humbert, member of the Commission of the Senate on Military Affairs; Colonel Rousset, the eminent military critic of the Petit Parisien, and a score or so of other well-known public men and soldiers.

I also had long conversations with M. Sevastopoula, Counselor of the Russian Embassy, and Colonel Count Ignatieff, the Russian member of the Interallied Military Council. I found that they completely shared the views of their French allies. The latter were unanimous in favor of an energetic offensive on the Saloniki front and equally unanimous in deploring the shortsightedness of the British military authorities.

When I spoke with M. Briand and urged the importance of the Saloniki front he replied to me "My dear M. Gordon-Smith, you are preaching to the converted. It was I who sent the Army of the Orient to Saloniki and who have kept it there. If you see Lloyd George in London tell him from me that M. Briand is more convinced than ever of the strategical and political importance of the Saloniki front."

BRITISH FOR WITHDRAWAL

A week later I was in London and found myself face to face with a stone wall. The public knew nothing about Saloniki and cared less. The Daily Mail had, on Jan. 18, published an article proposing purely and simply to withdraw the whole army from Saloniki, a repetition of Gallipoli. The impression made in Paris by this article was disastrous, so much so that the censor "got busy" and issued a stern warning to the press to abstain from discussing the situation in Saloniki.

The military censorship would allow no discussion of the situation in the Balkans. All the correspondents of London journals had been expelled from Saloniki with the exception of Ward Price, correspondent of the Newspaper Proprietors' Association, (a syndicate of the London Journals,) and Mr. Ferguson of Reuter's Agency. As all their dispatches were strictly censored first in Saloniki and a second time in London, no news of any importance was allowed to transpire and the word Saloniki had practically disappeared from the columns of the London press. It was openly declared that it was on the western front alone that the war would be decided and no discussion of this theory was permitted.

The only public man who seemed to have understood the importance of the Saloniki front was John Dillon, the leader of the Irish Party in the House of Commons. He delivered an admirable speech on the subject in the House, but so rigid was the "taboo" on everything concerning Saloniki that the only publication which had the courage to publish it was The New Europe.

It was notorious that General Sir William Robertson, Chief of the Imperial Staff, and all the men surrounding him were out-and-out "westerners" and refused to listen to any proposals to undertake any offensive elsewhere. As a result the Army of the Orient, its ranks ravaged by malaria due to its failure to advance out of the swampy plains surrounding Saloniki, was melting away uselessly in complete inaction. It was an open secret that in England the military party had completely got the upper hand and had seized not only the military but also the political conduct of the war. The War Office and the Foreign Office were often in conflict. The Imperial General Staff turned a deaf ear to all counsels which did not square with their particular views.

It was at this moment that I had a number of conversations with Lord Northcliffe. I found him strongly imbued with "western" ideas, but I so far shook his confidence in the infallibility of the "western" theory that he gave me permission to state the case for Saloniki in a letter addressed to the editor of The Times. This I did in terms of extreme moderation, but was informed a day or two later that it had been suppressed by the censor from the first line to the last and returned to The Times with the order "Not to be published" stamped on every page.

UNIFIED COMMAND WINS

It was only after weeks and weeks of sapping and mining that the civil power was able to assert itself once more. Lloyd George planned in secret the organization of the Supreme War Council in Versailles. When its creation was intimated to General Sir William Robertson he at once in protest tendered his resignation as chief of the Imperial General Staff, which, probably much to his surprise, was promptly accepted. Colonel Rapington, the military critic of The Times, also an out-and-out "westerner" to whom the Saloniki front was anathema, rushed to the assistance of his chief with such a want of moderation of language that he was promptly haled before the courts and fined £100 under the Defence of the Realm act. Then General Maurice, Director of Operations, issued the manifesto which cost him his position. A number of subordinates, known to be out-and-out "westerners," were removed, and the power of the Imperial General Staff to impose its will on the statesmen was at an end. Lloyd George triumphed and General Foch was intrusted with the supreme direction of the war.

OFFENSIVE BEGUN AT LAST

The result was a complete change of policy and strategy in the Balkans. General Sarrail was recalled and replaced by General Guillaumat, one of the most brilliant commanders from the western front. As soon as he had the Army of the Orient reorganized and reinforced, General Frenchet d'Esperey, the commander of the Fifth French Army Group, was sent out to take command at Saloniki and an energetic offensive was at once begun.

As before, the chief attack was intrusted to the Serbian contingent of the Army of the Orient. It attacked with splendid élan the Bulgarian intrenchments on the Dobra Polie, drove in their centre, and then rolled the opposing army up right and left. Through the breach thus made poured the French and British contingents; the retreat became a rout, and in five days' time the army of King Ferdinand capitulated.

The Serbs continued their triumphant advance, the Berlin-Constantinople railway was seized and the Danube front reached. In a fortnight's time Turkey collapsed, the Dardanelles were opened and the allied fleets entered the Black Sea. Austria saw the game was up and sued for peace. The German Empire was therefore menaced from the rear. Field Marshal von Hindenburg saw that under these circumstances nothing could save the situation and begged for an armistice. Thus the war which began in the Balkans, for the Balkans, ended in the Balkans.

That this would be the inevitable result of an energetic offensive had long been clear to every one on the spot, but unfortunately the voices of those who advocated it had long been the "voices of those crying in the wilderness." It is only when the historian begins a detailed study of the world war in all its phases that the astonishing errors of the Entente in its Near Eastern policy will become apparent.

The consequence of these terrible errors was not only to prolong the war for two long years, but it also caused unheard-of sufferings to the victims of these errors. What Serbia suffered is indescribable; over 25 per cent. of her population succumbed, her territory was ruthlessly plundered, and she piled up a war debt that will tax her economic resources to the uttermost for many a day to come. As she had to incur this debt mainly through the incredible blunders of the statesmen of the Entente, who refused to listen to her warnings, the least that the Allies can do is to pass all the credits with which they supplied Serbia to profit and loss.

American Envoy Received in Prague

MR. RICHARD T. CRANE, the American Ambassador to the new Republic of Czechoslovakia, and the first American to enter diplomatically the Czechoslovak seat of Government, presented his credentials to President Masaryk and his Ministers toward the middle of last June. The ceremony, as described by a correspondent present at the time, was both picturesque and symbolic of Austria's vanished power. The American representative was lodged in the palace of the former Cardinal Archbishop,

At midday, under a blazing sun, the ceremony began, with the appearance of the escort of honor. Instead of soldiers, sokols (men of the gymnastic societies that have played so important a part in the progress of many countries) were chosen for this. On their fine horses, in their tan and scarlet costumes, with black, round cap and falcon's feather, but with no weapons, they were splendidly picturesque. The sokols of Bohemia have always stood for their independence; hence they were most suitable to greet a republic's envoy.

The sokols were in two groups, advance and rear guards. As the first group appeared at the great castle gates, the band began playing the American national anthem, following with the beautiful, mysterious, and even tragical Czech hymn. Following the sokols came a carriage in which Colonel Miles, the Ambassador's secretary, rode alone in his khaki uniform. Then came the Ambassador, accompanied by Lieut. Col. Liska, his attaché, riding in an open coach drawn by six superb white horses, (said to have been those of the whilom Austrian Emperor,) and on the coachman's seat were two white-haired retainers who appeared to have been handed down from the Middle Ages.

In the arched entrance to the castle the coaches stopped, and an American gentleman in simple attire went up the imposing stairway of a mediaeval stronghold to meet, in the name of the American people, another simple gentleman, the President of the Czechoslovak Republic. He was met and accompanied up the stairs by dignitaries of the republic, Dr. Kucera and Lieutenant Seidl, and at the top was greeted by Dr. Jiri Guth, master of ceremonies, who conducted him to the President.

With President Masaryk were the Czech Ministers, Dr. Šámal, Svelha, Stepánek, and Dr. Husak. Introduced by Dr. Guth, Mr. Crane presented his secretary, Colonel Miles, and then made a speech, to which President Masaryk replied, thus ending the ceremony.

Germany as a Full-Fledged Republic

OUTSTANDING events of the month included Friedrich Ebert's taking the oath as President of Germany before the National Assembly at Weimar, and the official termination of that body's existence, to give place to the new Reichstag in Berlin. Revelations, accusations and personal defenses continued to pour forth from those, on one side or the other, involved in the great after-the-war controversy. Among the latest was Count von Bernstorff's diplomatic apologia. The beginning of a widespread emigration of the middle classes from Germany was commented upon. General conditions were reported to be improved as regards increasing productivity and less turmoil, but the country continued to suffer from a harassing economic situation.

Friedrich Ebert took the oath as President of the German Republic in the National Theatre at Weimar on Aug. 21. A large crowd had gathered in the square before the theatre, where a guard of honor was drawn up and the Land-jäger band played national airs. Herr Ebert arrived in an automobile at 5 P. M. and was received by the Vice President and Secretaries. The organ resounded as he was conducted to the centre of the flower-decked hall, where the President's tribune was situated. It was noted that the places reserved for the German National and Independent Socialists were unoccupied. Herr Fehrenbach, President of the Assembly, handed Herr Ebert the document containing the oath, the formula of which the latter read with a firm voice. Herr Fehrenbach then addressed the German President:

You came from the people, and therefore you will ever be a faithful friend of the working people, to whom you have devoted your life work. You will also ever be a shield to the Fatherland, which you have done your best to serve and for the sake of which you have made a terrible and most painful sacrifice, seeing that of four sons you sent to the colors two have not returned. It is a thorny office which in the hardest times the Fatherland has laid upon your shoulders, but with an easy conscience you can claim to be free from all blame or responsibility in the country's wretched position.

You sought to attain progress and freedom solely by peaceful development, but with defeat the die was cast regarding the old State form and the dynasty. Even those who preserve their love for the old institutions recognize that fact, and you lead it back in a patriotic mind to order and to work and point the way to the rebirth of the beloved Fatherland.

President Ebert in reply said:

This must remain to us if we desire to rebuild the Fatherland—deep love for the homeland and the tribe out of which each of us sprang, and to this must be joined sacred labor for the whole and the placing of one's self in the republic's service. Every contradiction between the whole and the individual States vanishes there.

The essence of our Constitution shall above all be freedom, but all freedom must have its law. This you have now established. We will jointly hold on to it. It will give us strength to testify for the new vital principle of the German Nation—freedom and right.

After Herr Fehrenbach had bade his farewell to the National Assembly, in which he referred to the task of that passing body as the effort "to build out of a heap of ruins a new edifice," and affirmed his faith in the German people, he conducted President Ebert to the balcony of the theatre. The President then addressed the crowd as follows:

A people equal and with equal rights—that is what this day shall signify to all Germans. I now renew before you my oath of fealty to the people and the people's rights. Let us stand together in our people's hard struggle for life. Join me in a vow of this indissoluble unity, so that from here—from the scene of imperishable deeds—it may ring throughout the German Fatherland. Long live our beloved German people!

Thereupon the crowd broke into deafening cheers, and the band played "Deutschland über Alles," in which the people joined lustily.

This ceremony officially terminated the German National Assembly, which, unless specially convened before the next regular session of the German Legislature, would be superseded by the new Reichstag. Its labors had occupied seven months in eighty-five sessions, unquestionably of momentous consequence to the future of the German people. Now that Germany had a democratic Constitution, it was the opinion of competent observers that such reforms as the granting of a plebiscite to Upper Silesia, and the rights given to Workers' Councils, though experimental, were of good augury for the eventual establishment of a democratic republic upon the traditional love of order and industry heretofore displayed by the German people. On the other hand, disclosures of the shameless profiteering of industrial magnates during the war, and the Imperial Government's utter incapacity to combat it, together with the ignominious flight of the ex-Kaiser at the supreme crisis, seemed to shatter any dream of a return to power by the reactionaries.

On the last day of the National Assembly it named a committee to investigate war responsibility, with Herr Petersen, a Democrat, as President, and Dr. Peter Spahn, a Centrist, as Vice President. The Assembly also appointed a new Foreign Affairs Committee of five Social Democrats, three Centrists, three Democrats, two German Nationalists, and one member of the People's Party. Philipp Scheidemann was chosen as its President.

PAN-GERMAN REACTIONARIES

On Aug. 31 the Pan-German League held a general meeting at Berlin, in which it openly threw down the gauntlet to the German Republic and pledged itself to the restoration of Kaiserism. Many hundreds of delegates shouted their approval when their leader, Herr Glass, denounced the events of Nov. 9, 1918, as the greatest political crime ever recorded in history. Another leader, Baron von Schel, demanded "preparation for a war of liberation" and the return of the monarchy. The meeting closed with shouts of "Hail to the German Kaiser!"

A different note, however, was struck by young Baron von Biederhann's juvenile convention at Potsdam on Sept. 1. Chief Delegate Vondervogel of the Boy Scouts made a revolutionary speech, followed by others who declared that their leagues were "thoroughly revolutionary" and unable to countenance the old order of things that led to the disastrous war.

RHINELAND SEPARATISM

Propaganda to establish an independent buffer State between France and Germany was again active in the Rhineland. Dr. Hans Dorten, who sponsored the ill-fated Rhine Republic last June, was reported to be renewing his efforts in the territory on the left bank of the Rhine formerly held by the Americans. Another somewhat similar movement under the leadership of Dr. Haas attained the stage of rioting at Ludwigs-hafen on Aug. 29. In an attack on the Post Office two officials were killed before the "revolt" was suppressed by the French authorities. Coblenz reported that much dissatisfaction had been aroused in the Rhineland owing to the indefinite postponement of the National Convention of the Centre Party at Cologne, at which the question of a Rhineland State was to have been discussed.

A news dispatch of Sept. 14 stated that the proposed withdrawal of the American representative from the Rhineland High Commission would result in a situation which army officers at Coblenz regarded as pregnant with difficulties and dangers for the United States. America, by withdrawing, would leave only the vote of England as opposed to the Rhenish separatist movement against the two votes of France and Belgium, reported to be in its favor. Unless, therefore, American troops in the Rhineland, holding 700 square miles of German territory with a population of 350,000, were withdrawn also, blame in Germany for any success of the separatist movement would fall equally on the United States, together with all its possibilities of complications and entanglements.

UNION WITH AUSTRIA FORBIDDEN

At the end of August the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference decided to send a forcible note to the German Government pointing out that Article 61 of the new German Constitution conflicted with the Versailles Treaty in providing for the representation of Austria in the German Reichstag. The council demanded the alteration of the article on pain of further occupation of Rhineland territory. Frank I. Polk, the American member of the council, disagreed with the hostile tenor of the note as originally drafted, insisting on milder terms. M. Clemenceau's communication to the German Government on this subject, as finally agreed upon and dispatched Sept. 11, ended with the following diplomatic formula, which the German legislative authorities must ratify within a fortnight after the treaty of peace comes into force:

The undersigned, duly empowered to act in the name of the German Government, recognizes and declares that all prescriptions of the German Constitution which are in contradiction to the Versailles Treaty are not valid; notably, the admission of Austrian representatives can take place only if, conformably with the treaty, the League of Nations gives assent to a modification of Austria's international situation.

In a statement issued in Berlin on Sept. 13 Dr. Hugo Preuss, who had drafted the new German Constitution, denounced the Allies' demand that Germany amend the Constitution so as to prevent Austrian representation in German affairs. This policy, he asserted, ran counter to all the solemn declarations of President Wilson and the Entente.

GENERAL NOSKE'S PLEA

In support of his plea that Germany be allowed to reduce her military forces more gradually than stipulated by the treaty, General Noske said to a correspondent of the Paris Matin in Berlin:

There are still some nests of Bolshevism scattered throughout Germany even in the neighborhood of Berlin. A second revolution in this country in the coming Winter is entirely possible. The first one I was able to quell, and so saved Central Europe from barbarism. Now it is necessary to leave me the means to do the same thing if the occasion arises.

I now have actually 400,000 men. This is the absolute total, despite the Entente newspapers' charges that I have innumerable armies. According to the treaty, I must reduce these 400,000 to 100,000 before next April. Already I am beginning to reduce the army, but when the treaty becomes effective, probably by the first of October, I must throw out immediately 150,000 to join our masses of unemployed. That will add to our social difficulties.

With only 100,000 men, I will not be able to maintain order in this country. After the shocks which Germany has sustained, and in the midst of an economic crisis, show me the man who in mid-Winter with coal and food lacking will undertake such responsibilities. I will not.

Reports from Coblenz on Aug. 23 dwelt on the organization of 500,000 Home Guards, in reality a reserve army, to evade the Peace Treaty terms. To carry out the plan this force was placed technically under the Ministry of the Interior instead of the Ministry of War. Further, General von Keller, a Russian nobleman of German descent, was said to be at the head of a movement to organize a large German volunteer corps in the Baltic provinces, and, to that end, was working in harmony with the German occupation troops.

ERZBERGER AND FLAME THROWERS

The reactionaries, smarting under revelations made by Mathias Erzberger, Minister of Finance, retaliated by publishing a letter showing that he had been a patron of Herr Fiedler, inventor of the flame thrower. This letter, written by Herr Erzberger to General von Falkenhayn, Minister of War, read:

Berlin, Sept. 17, 1914.

Your Excellency will allow me to submit herewith a memorandum concerning a flame thrower invented by Herr Fiedler. The matter is already known to your Excellency, but I consider the further suggestion to make use of the new invention from airships to be a very happy one. All considerations of international law and humanity, which were all very well in times of peace as a subject for conversation in the salons of Berlin, must now, in my opinion, be absolutely discarded. We must gain victory also over England, and I believe this invention is eminently calculated to realize precisely this aim.

The Germans never used flame throwers on airships because the plan proved impracticable; but Erzberger's advocacy of their use in Zeppelin raids is not without interest.

A Berne message of Aug. 29 stated that in evidence taken before United States Consul Stewart, in connection with charges brought against Dr. Rumely as purchaser of The New York Evening Mail, it was admitted by Dr. Albert, former German Under Secretary of State and German agent in New York, that he had advanced money for the purchase of The Evening Mail from funds in his hands—resulting from the raising of German loans in the United States and certain other sources. Dr. Albert added that he had advanced this money somewhat against his own judgment, but his objection had been overruled by Dr. Dernburg's order. In cross-examination, when confronted with photographic facsimiles and copies of letters, checks, &c., produced by Bielaski before the Overman Committee, Dr. Albert admitted that practically everything which was said about his endeavors to make the American public take the German point of view was substantially correct.

VON BERNSTORFF'S EXPLANATION

What may be termed Count von Bernstorff's diplomatic apologia appeared in Das Demokratische Deutschland toward the end of August. After urging that Germany should direct her policy toward a revision of the Peace Treaty by means of the League of Nations, the former German Ambassador at Washington wrote:

During the whole war two minds dwelt within German policy. The one was naval-military and the other civilian-political. All the utterances of our Government which reached Washington during the period of America's neutrality were dictated either by the one tendency or were the result of a compromise between both. Thus one can more justly speak of a split in German policy than of its "two-faced" nature. The one tendency wanted the U-boat war, even if it drove the United States to a breach with us; the other wanted to join in with President Wilson's policy and so come to peace. The struggle between these two tendencies began with the Lusitania episode and ended with the declaration of the unrestricted U-boat campaign in the defeat of the civilians.

As one of the chief factors in this struggle, I can offer the most binding assurance that the German civil policy always kept the one end in view. It did not carry on negotiations with a view to preparing for the U-boat war in the meantime, as many Americans still believe. Nor did it instigate any conspiracies in America. The German civil administration had absolutely no knowledge of the worst things which were being done by the naval-military tendency over there, such as, for example, the Rintelen mission.

The two chief sins with which we are charged under the heading "two-faced"—the Adlon dinner in honor of Ambassador Gerard and the Mexican telegram—were only committed after the Berlin civil administration had hauled down their sails before the superior force of the naval-military party. Like the astrologer in "Faust," the German Government then only made such declarations as were whispered to it by the naval-military Mephisto. This moment was the climax of the German tragedy. The mediatory action which had just then been begun by President Wilson was rendered worthless by our deed, and the war was lost. All efforts made at the last moment from Washington to alter Berlin's decision came to nought, as will be remembered, on account of "technical difficulties."

EVENTS OF INTEREST

A dispatch of Aug. 28 stated that the Spartacides had made a great coup in plundering a large munition depot and getting possession of several thousand rifles, which they had concealed on the Danish frontier. From Munich it was announced that on Aug. 25 the Bavarian Army had officially ceased to exist and had become part of the national defense army. Considerable public dissatisfaction was manifested. On Sept. 2 Government troops occupied the principal buildings in Munich and patrolled the streets.

A settlement of claims by the French Government against Germany for the murder of Sergeant Paul Mannheim in Berlin last July was agreed upon, Germany paying an indemnity of 1,000,000 marks.

Field Marshal Liman von Sanders, who had commanded one of the Turkish armies, arrived in Berlin on Sept. 1, after having been arrested and imprisoned at Constantinople and finally repatriated by order of the British Government. He complained of his confinement in a stockade, but admitted he had been treated with every courtesy by the British Admiralty in transit from Malta to Venice.

According to Munich advices, nearly 100,000 officers and men were regarded as wartime deserters from the German Army. Included in this number were many thousands in England and America who were prevented from returning to Germany at the outbreak of war. Switzerland led the neutral countries with 40,000 deserters. A proclamation by the German Government offered amnesty to these men if they returned to Germany this year.

A curious trade plot was uncovered in Switzerland, according to a Geneva dispatch of Sept. 2. Of 500 poor students of Vienna University to whom Switzerland offered hospitality for several months 81 per cent. were officially found by the Swiss Minister at Vienna to be young German-Austrian commercial travelers. Their baggage was composed chiefly of samples, prospectuses and price lists in English, destined for London and New York, and arranged to appear as coming from Switzerland. The Swiss Minister refused to indorse their passports.

Berlin advices of Sept. 14 stated that Rear Admiral Adolf von Trotha would assume charge of the naval forces under the new Ministry of Defense, becoming operative on Oct. 1. Colonel Reinhardt, the Prussian Minister of War, would assume command of the land forces.

The arrival and internment at Saloniki of Field Marshal von Mackensen was reported in State Department dispatches from Greece, according to a Washington message of Sept. 15.

By the middle of September the food situation in Germany had improved to the extent of white bread reappearing in the restaurants, without cards, and the city looked cleaner generally. But in the homes of the people conditions had improved little. Meat of the cheapest sort was rather more plentiful at $2.25, but sugar was still at almost forty-five times its pre-war prices. In a large department store a correspondent found lines of china, glassware, and cooking utensils in greater supply and at cheaper prices than in London. Clothes still remained a difficulty.

EX-KAISER'S NEW HOME

From Holland reports indicated that the Hohenzollern family purposed taking up permanent residence in that country. Dispatches stated that the ex-Crown Princess Cecilie, with her two sons, had arrived at the island at Wieringen to visit her husband, and that the Duke and Duchess of Brunswick, the former Kaiser's son-in-law and daughter, had purchased a large house in one of the best neighborhoods at The Hague. The Duchess had already arrived at Scheveningen, where she temporarily occupied a villa which had been used by the Y. M. C. A. as headquarters staff hostel during the internment of British soldiers in Holland.

The announcement was also made of the purchase by the former Kaiser of the estate and house of Doorn, near Utrecht, five miles north of Amerongen, from the Baroness van Heemstra de Beaufort. The ex-Kaiser's new estate is described as magnificently wooded, and the mansion as a beautiful, old, ivy-covered, white house dating from the fourteenth century, and resembling an English country residence. Though rich in historic association and imposing in appearance, it possesses only twelve rooms in addition to small chambers for the servants. The front of the house is approached first by a lodge, then by a long gravel drive and a large round lawn. Next come the formal garden, with handsome stables to the right, and the gravel square in front of the house, with tropical trees and palms in tubs. The hall is of white marble, which leads by a short flight of marble steps to a long sitting room opposite the front door and occupies almost the whole width of the house. The place was said to have been selected originally by the ex-Empress, and it was announced that the former imperial family would take up their residence there in the Fall, after renovation had been made and furnishings from one of his castles in Germany had been installed.

Meantime the former Emperor was reported as continuing his tree sawing exercise with more zest than that experienced by the medical and other members of his suite invited to participate. His negotiations with the German Government for a settlement of claims "through forced abdication" were stated in a Berlin message of Sept. 5 to have resulted in a plan, still withheld from the press, that would not be dictated "by pettiness or malice, and would not call forth justified criticism." Investigation by Dr. Suedekum, Prussian Minister of Finance, had failed to indicate that the former imperial family had capital "planted" abroad, while the amount on the ex-Kaiser's person when he fled to Holland was not more than $160,000.

A message from The Hague of Sept. 10 stated that fifty-one Berlin furniture vans were counted moving along the road between the railway station at Zeist and the village of Doorn transporting the ex-Kaiser's household effects to his new residence.

The Evidences of Germany's Guilt

Masterly Report Summarizing the Proofs of the Berlin Government's Responsibility for the War

By LOUIS BARTHOU

[FORMER PREMIER OF FRANCE]

The Peace Committee of the French Chamber on Aug. 7, 1919, devoted the whole of an afternoon session to the reading of the report of Louis Barthou, Chairman of the committee on the treaty of peace with Germany. Mr. Barthou's report was listened to with the closest attention, and was afterward characterized as a masterly document, "the clearest and most cogent summary of the origin and prosecution of the war by Germany that has yet appeared." Its most important passages are here translated in full:

THE special committee to which you referred the Peace Treaty signed on June 28, 1919, at Versailles, between the allied and associated powers, on the one hand, and the German Empire and its component States, on the other, recommends, by a majority report, the ratification of that treaty. It would neither have understood nor fulfilled the task assigned to it had it confined itself to a mere act of registration under the pretext that it could propose to you, excluding all amendment, only approval or rejection of the treaty. When an international convention so long, so ramified, and so complex pledges for an indefinite time the prosperity and the security of France, the country's representatives would fail to do their duty if they made no effort to determine its general inspiration, its conditions, and its consequences. France has the right to know the situation in which a glorious and costly victory has left her, and within what bounds her future will develop. * * *

There is no initial and capital point from which the whole derives and which the negotiations have placed beyond question. By fixing the responsibilities incurred by Germany in her declaration and conduct of the war, the conference, both morally and legally, has laid the strongest possible basis for the conditions of peace which it has dictated to her. Although it applies only to reparations, Article 231 of the treaty lays down a general principle, around which all its provisions are harmoniously grouped. It says that "the aggression of Germany and her allies has imposed war on the allied and associated Governments." After having striven to deny this charge, the German Government has been obliged to recognize it. Vainly did its partisans, its press, and the orators of its Assembly insist that all authority should be withheld from this judgment on the ground that it was subscribed to under compulsion. Vainly is it still publishing or having published documents tending to palliate the greatest responsibilities. The guilt of Germany, her premeditated will to war, and the support of her whole people in a war criminally unchained by a subservient accomplice are truths now historically established.

GERMANY'S OWN WITNESSES

Public opinion everywhere has given its judgment. To the many irrefutable documents which the diplomatic archives of the belligerent countries have yielded to debate, and of which the German White Book, cynically abridged, is not the least convincing, witnesses have added new and decisive facts. When these witnesses rise up upon her own soil, how may Germany deny the terrible proofs with whose utterance those witnesses have purged their consciences? The memoir of Prince Lichnowsky, the report of Dr. Mühlön, and the documents revealed by Kurt Eisner contain crushing charges. Their origin and their exactness can leave no doubt of the perfidy with which Germany seized on the assassination of the Archduke Ferdinand at Serajevo as a pretext to declare the war which she had been preparing for so many years. The opportunity was a good one "to make an end of it," as General von Moltke said to the King of Belgium in 1913. The German General Staff had unceasingly exercised on public opinion that indirect and continuous pressure whose use Colonel von Ludendorff, then battalion commander, had recommended in order "to strengthen and extend Deutschum throughout the whole world." He added:

We must drill into the people the idea that our armaments are a response to the armaments and policy of France. We must accustom them to thinking that an offensive war by us is necessary to combat the provocations of our adversary.

We must act prudently so as to excite no suspicions and avoid all crises that might injure our economic life. We must so guide events that under the heavy pressure of powerful armaments, of considerable sacrifices, and of a strained political situation, a declaration of war shall be considered as deliverance, with the prospect that it will be followed by decades of peace and prosperity, as after 1870.

PRETEXT OF DEFENSE

These tactics succeeded. The measures of defense taken by the French Government were denounced in the German press as a provocation, and, following the assassination at Serajevo, the situation was "strained" enough to permit the German General Staff and the German Government to call the people, by no means averse, to a pretended policy of deliverance. Whatever may be urged by his belated defenders and, above all, by his accomplices, made uneasy by his revelations and threatened with his fate, Emperor William II., from whom one word, a single word, would have sufficed to prevent the conflict, refused to take every step which would have held back Austria on the brink of the fatal precipice. His letter of July 28 to the Chancellor of the Empire, von Bethmann Hollweg, declared, it is true, that the "capitulation of Serbia removed every motive for making war." But did he not, at the same time, make that war inevitable by exacting that the promises of Serbia, to be more than a scrap of paper, should be followed by the occupation of Belgrade, considered as a necessary pledge?

Moreover, the imperial letter is in flagrant contradiction with the memoir submitted to the Reichstag on Aug. 3, 1914, by von Bethmann Hollweg. It was formally stated in this letter that, though the reply of Serbia yielded—how could it be denied?—some satisfaction to the desires of Austria-Hungary, it was, after all, only a source of delay, which the Dual Monarchy was right in ending by a declaration of war. This declaration of war was equivalent to the irrevocable casting of the dice. The memoir of von Bethmann Hollweg admits it, saying:

With all our heart we could say to our ally that we shared her view, and could assure her that the action which she judged necessary to put an end in Serbia to the agitation directed against the existence of the monarchy would have all our sympathies. We realized that eventual acts of hostility committed by Austria-Hungary against Serbia might involve Russia and lead us into war, together with our ally; but we could not, knowing that the vital interests of Austria-Hungary were at stake, either advise our ally to show an indulgence incompatible with her dignity or refuse to her our support in that difficult moment. We had the less reason for doing so in that our own interests were threatened to the highest degree by the continual underhand procedure of Serbia.

This avowal, imposed by the evidence deriving from the combined facts and also from the documents published, was renewed during the negotiations at Versailles by the German delegation: "If, immediately after the arrival of the Serbian answer of the 27th, the Vienna Cabinet had been prevented from taking irrevocable measures, the result might have been decisive."

The delegation's note added that the Berlin Cabinet "lacked decision." The truth is that it profited by the circumstances to precipitate war. None of the steps taken by the powers to prevent it—the request made by M. Sazonov for extension of the time granted Serbia; the proposal of mediation in a group of four formulated by Sir Edward Grey; the suggestion expressed by the Czar and which the German White Book passed over in silence, to submit the Austro-Serbian conflict to The Hague tribunal; the last hour and supreme appeal addressed by Czar Nicholas to William II. to abstain, as he bound himself to do upon his honor, from every aggressive act during the negotiations—had its support. On the contrary, at the moment when Austria-Hungary on July 31 seemed disposed to open discussion with the Russian Ambassador, Germany made this impossible by charging her Ambassador at St. Petersburg with an ultimatum which she knew would inevitably lead to war. As Prince Lichnowsky expressed it: "We went into war with whip and spur."

History has already declared that Germany wanted war, and documents dated from Berlin, Austrian or German, prove it. We must record these evidences. On July 25, 1914, Count Szoegeny, the Ambassador of Austria-Hungary at Berlin, telegraphed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs at Vienna:

It is generally admitted here that, in case of a possible refusal by Serbia, our immediate declaration of war will coincide with the military operations. A delay in the initiation of military operations is considered here as a great danger because of the intervention of other powers. We are urgently advised to begin immediately and to confront the world with an ACCOMPLISHED FACT.

Two days later, when Serbia had replied by what Emperor William called a "capitulation," the same agent sent this message to his Government:

The Secretary of State informs me in a very clear and confidential statement that in the near future possible proposals of mediation on the part of England may be sent to your Excellency by the German Government. The German Government binds itself in the most solemn way not to associate itself in any way with these proposals; on the contrary, it is absolutely opposed to their examination and will transmit them only to comply with England's request.

The German delegation felt the accusatory power of these two telegrams, as issuing from an allied Ambassador and revealing directly the perfidy of the Berlin Government, alarmed lest, either through the weakness of Austria-Hungary or by the calling in of Serbia, the opportunity which it was watching with criminal eagerness might escape it. Consulted by the delegation, von Bethmann Hollweg and von Jagow, both called by the German delegates "men worthy of confidence," opposed a weak and belated contradiction to the statements of Count Szoegeny, transmitted in the very midst of the negotiations. Something else was necessary: the German delegation, in order to nullify the effect of the evidence by the charge of mental weakness, simply and coldly added that "the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador was older than his age."

BAVARIAN MINISTER'S REVELATION

Unfortunately for Germany, other witnesses against the Berlin Government have arisen since 1914 who, without knowing the view imparted to Count Szoegeny, expressed the same sentiment with equal force. On July 18 the Bavarian Minister, not as an ally, but as a German, informed the Munich Government of the state of mind of Berlin, after a conversation with Herr Zimmermann, then Under Secretary of State for Foreign affairs. He said:

The step which the Vienna Cabinet has decided to take at Belgrade, and which will consist in the transmission of a note, will occur on the 25th of the present month. The deferring of this action until that time is based on the desire to await the departure of MM. Poincaré and Viviani from St. Petersburg in order to make an agreement between the Dual Alliance Powers (France and Russia) for counteraction more difficult. Until that time the appearance of pacific intentions will be feigned in Vienna by the simultaneous granting of leave of absence to the Minister of War and the head of the General Staff. The press and the Stock Exchange have also been influenced. It is recognized here that in these respects the Vienna Cabinet has acted skillfully, and it is only regretted that Count Tisza, who at first was opposed to energetic action, raised the veil of secrecy somewhat by his statement before the Chamber of Deputies.

According to what was told me by Herr Zimmermann, the note will contain the following demands:

"1. Publication by the King of Serbia of a proclamation declaring that the Serbian Government has kept itself entirely aloof from the Pan-Serbian movement, and does not approve of it.

"2. Opening of an investigation concerning the accomplices in the murder at Serajevo and participation in this investigation by an Austrian official.

"3. Official action against all those who have taken part in the Pan-Serb movement."

For the acceptance of these demands, a period of forty-eight hours will be fixed. It goes without saying that Serbia cannot accept these demands, which are incompatible with her dignity as an independent State. War will consequently result. There is complete agreement here that Austria should profit by this favorable moment, even at the risk of later complications. It is believed therefore that this is Austria's hour of destiny, and it was in this belief that without hesitation the reply was sent to Vienna that Germany approved any action decided on there, even at the risk of war with Russia.

The origin, the date, and the specific nature of this telegram make it a document of capital importance. It is sufficient to establish the responsibility of the Berlin Government; its premeditation, hypocritically concealed by exterior precautions; its approval of the Austro-Hungarian ultimatum, which it knew to be incompatible with the dignity and independence of Serbia; its fear of losing the opportunity for a war coolly determined on; its pressure on the Vienna Cabinet to hasten what Count Szoegeny called "the accomplished fact."

The German delegation asserted that the "so-called revelations of Kurt Eisner added nothing new, granting that they contained nothing erroneous," but, with the exception of two alleged errors of detail, it prudently refrained from discussing a document whose crushing truthfulness has been confirmed by the events themselves, as they developed, and whose author, Kurt Eisner, paid for its publication with his life.

In declaring war on France, Germany on Aug. 3 abandoned the game which she had so cleverly played forty-four years before. In 1870 she succeeded, by the fraudulent alteration of a dispatch, in giving to France, at least apparently, the rôle of an aggressor. On Aug. 3, 1914, she assumed before the world and before history the responsibility for aggression. Innocent of the declaration of war, France has no self-reproaches to make for the events that led to the bloody conflict. Her Government, her diplomacy, and her military command pushed prudence and patience to the extreme. France, who had counseled Serbia to make all concessions compatible with the sovereignty of an independent State, rejected no attempt at conciliation or mediation. She escaped all the traps laid for her by Germany. Questioned by Herr von Schoen on the attitude that France would take in case of a conflict between Germany and Russia, M. Viviani did not make an "unsatisfactory and ambiguous answer," as von Bethmann Hollweg characterized it; he made the sober and dignified reply that France would be guided by her own interests. The withdrawal of French troops to a point ten kilometers from the German frontier, as ordered by the Government, proved to the world the peaceful intentions of our country, and at the same time made impossible the incidents from which Germany beyond doubt sought to draw advantage. Against such wise and prudent procedure only a pretext based upon falsehood could prevail. Germany had recourse to both.

FALSE PRETEXTS EXPOSED

Concerning the declaration of war on Aug. 3, Herr von Schoen said:

The administrative and military authorities of Germany have recorded a certain number of hostile acts committed on German territory by French military aviators. Several of these manifestly violated the neutrality of Belgium by flying over the territory of that country; one of them tried to destroy constructions near Wesel; others were perceived over the Eiffel region; another threw bombs on the railway near Karlsruhe and Nuremburg.

None of these assertions was proved, none was true. In contradicting these alleged "aggressions" the head of the French Government anticipated the contradictions of the Germans themselves. On April 3, 1916, the municipal authorities of Nuremburg published a decisive statement:

The temporary commander of the 3d Bavarian Army Corps, stationed here, has no knowledge that before or after the declaration of war any bombs were thrown by enemy aviators on the lines of Nuremburg-Kissingen or Nuremburg-Ansbach. All allegations and dispatches of newspapers to this effect are manifestly false.

This denial, coming from German military authorities, has such evidential force that the German delegation, far from repeating the pretext inscribed in the declaration of war, was itself compelled to recognize its falseness:

It is regrettable that in the declaration of war on France use should have been made without due consideration of certain information concerning attacks by French aviators, which the Government did not take the trouble to verify.

History, severe as it is, will deliver no judgment more terrible than this German phrase of comment on the German lie that served as pretext, as sole pretext, for the declaration of war on France by Germany. It is true that the delegation tried indirectly to modify its avowal by imputing to France on Aug. 2, in a note referred to the addenda, "at least fifty violations of the frontier"; and on Aug. 3 "to the beginning of the state of war at 6 o'clock in the evening, sixteen further violations of the frontier established certainly, four probable, and one possible." To support these belated charges, no specific evidence, no fact, no proof. When France in 1914 accused the German soldiers or aviators of having passed the frontier or flown over French territory it cited the places where these violations of international rights had occurred. The Yellow Book need only be opened to find them. The German White Book is silent, and it is thereby evident how vague are the allegations of the German delegation.

France had the war forced on her, she did not wish it. Germany wished the war, and despite the efforts of the German Republic, which continued up to the last moment to evade the fundamental tenor of Article 31 of the treaty, this article enunciates a decisive and irrefutable truth in affirming that the aggression by Germany and her allies forced war on the allied and associated Governments. No country better than France can testify to the truth of this historic fact.

TWO TREATIES VIOLATED

There is another truth, accepted also by history, and based on Article 227, in which William Hohenzollern II. is indicted "for supreme offense against international authority and the sacredness of treaties." Germany deliberately violated two treaties in which she was the contracting party. A guarantor by the terms of the Treaty of London of May 11, 1867, assuring the neutrality of Luxemburg, Germany on the morning of Aug. 2 sent troops and armored trains over that neutral territory on the pretext of protecting, without resort to violence, the railways which were under German administration. Against the protest of the Minister of State of the Grand Duchy, the Berlin Government alleges that "reliable information" had announced the march of French troops on Luxemburg. This was a lie.

The same lie and the same formula were to serve her as a pretext to justify the invasion by German troops on Aug. 4 of the territory of Belgium, whose neutrality Prussia had guaranteed by the Treaty of London of April 19, 1839. The German Government, after vainly trying to intimidate or bribe the Belgian Government, alleged that "reliable information" had removed all doubt of France's intention to occupy the Belgian territory. A pretext was necessary; German imagination had little trouble in finding it, but German premeditation had long been brewing, and it is German documents, again, that prove it. In his report of 1913 Colonel Ludendorff wrote on behalf of the Berlin Headquarters:

In the next European war the small States will be compelled to join us or be conquered. Under certain conditions their armies and fortresses can be rapidly conquered or neutralized. This would probably be the case for Belgium and Holland, and thereby a territory could be put beyond the reach of our enemy in the west which could serve as a base of operations against our flank.

After having spoken of the certainty of Swiss neutrality and of Germany's safety in the south, the report added:

We cannot apply the same criterion to the situation presented by the small States of our northwestern frontier. A vital problem will confront us there, and the object which we must pursue is to take the offensive with great superiority of numbers from the first days. To this end we must concentrate a great army, followed by strong formations of Landwehr, which will impel the armies of the small States to follow us, or at least to remain inactive in the field of operations, and which would crush them in case of armed resistance.

The execution of the plan of invasion of Belgium was pursued in August, 1914, by the Prussian staff, as appears from a report of the Bavarian Legation in Berlin published by Kurt Eisner:

Germany cannot respect the neutrality of Belgium. The head of the General Staff has declared that even the neutrality of England would be too great a price to pay for respecting Belgian neutrality, for an offensive war against France is possible only along the line of Belgium.

BETHMANN'S CONFESSION

To these documents may be added the notorious confession made before the Reichstag by the Imperial Chancellor, the "scrap of paper" man:

Gentlemen, we have been compelled to defend ourselves, and necessity knows no law. Our troops have occupied Luxemburg, and already, perhaps, are treading Belgian soil. Gentlemen, this is contrary to the decrees of international law. We have been obliged to ignore the justified protests of Belgium and Luxemburg. This injustice—I say it candidly—we will make good as soon as our military objective has been attained. When a nation is involved as we are, and is struggling for a momentous gage, it must think only of triumphing as best it can.

These confessions decide the question. After the discovery in Brussels of certain documents relating to negotiations between England and Belgium, the German Government, after deliberately perverting their spirit, tried to find therein a justification of the crime which it had committed to the perjury of its pledged word and in transgression of the law of nations. But the German delegation took from it even this resource:

As for the violation of Belgian and Luxemburg territory, the undersigned share completely the point of view defended by the Imperial Chancellor of Germany on Aug. 4, 1914, amid the applause of the Reichstag, when he declared that there was "an injustice to be made good." They deplore the fact that this view was momentarily abandoned during the war, and that an attempt was made subsequently to justify the German invasion.

INTELLECTUALS DISCREDITED

We should show ourselves ignorant of the true character of Germany, to which country as a whole Prussia has transmitted its policy and its traditions, if we were not sure that, had she been victorious, she would have taken up again and emphasized that justification. Frederick II. began "by taking," and when his troops had fulfilled his orders he left to the scholars of the nation the task of demonstrating the legality of his action. The German scholars did not fail the successor of Frederick II. The manifesto of the ninety-three intellectuals said:

It is not true that we have criminally violated the neutrality of Belgium. We have irrefutable proof that France and England, sure of the connivance of Belgium, had resolved to violate that neutrality themselves. It would have been suicide for our country not to anticipate them.

The German delegation, composed, ac-according to Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, of independent men, gave the lie to this audacious statement when it accepted without protest Article 232 of the treaty, which imposes on Germany, held to complete restoration and restitution, the costs of the unjust war of aggression waged on Belgium.

"It is not true," said again the manifesto of the intellectuals, "that we wage war in contempt of international law. Our soldiers commit neither acts of indiscipline nor cruelties." The German delegation did not dare to take upon itself the denial of a fact whose truth the whole world knows today. It has even made confession. Count Brockdorff-Rantzau said at Versailles on May 7:

In all enemy countries public opinion resounds with crimes which Germany is charged with having committed during the war. On this point, also, we are ready to confess the injustices which we have wrought. We have not come here to palliate the responsibility of the men who have conducted the war politically and economically, nor to deny the crimes committed against the laws of nations.

In this confession there would be an undeniable element of pride if the head plenipotentiary had not immediately sought to nullify its effect by imputing to Germany's adversaries deeds and transgressions similar to those whose responsibility he accepted for the armies of his country. This position, perhaps, is cleverly taken; it is, from any legal or factitive standpoint, unacceptable. No comparison is possible, and less still any compensation, between isolated, individual, accidental acts and a systematically barbarous waging of war. The Germans have erected cruelty into a system. Faithful to the doctrines of Clausewitz, von Hartmann, von Bernhardi, von Haeseler, they oppose to the law of nations the unlimited use of brute force. Herr Erzberger has declared that "war, a harsh, rough instrument, must be as pitiless as possible." And we know whether the German armies have been accessible to pity!

The Peace Conference has drawn up under thirty-two heads the summary of the crimes against the laws and customs of war and against the laws of humanity with which Germany and her allies may be charged:

1. Murders and massacres, systematic terrorism.
2. Putting to death of hostages.
3. Tortures inflicted on civilians.
4. Starvation of civilians.
5. Violations of women.
6. Seduction of young women to force them into prostitution.
7. Deportation of civilians.
8. Internment of civilians under barbarous conditions.
9. Forced labor of civilians compelled to do work connected with military operations.
10. Usurpation of sovereign rights of the State during military occupation.
11. Compulsory enrollment of soldiers taken from among the inhabitants of the occupied countries.
12. Attempts made to denationalize the inhabitants of the occupied territories.
13. Pillage.
14. Confiscation of property.
15. Illegal or exorbitant taxes and requisitions.
16. Depreciation of the monetary system and emission of false money.
17. Impositions of collective penalties.
18. Devastation and destruction of property without cause.
19. Intentional bombardments of unfortified places.
20. Destruction, without cause, of monuments and religious, charitable, educational, and historical edifices.
21. Destruction of merchant ships and passenger ships without warning or the taking of measures to secure the safety of the crews and passengers.
22. Destruction of fishing boats and food trains.
23. Intentional bombardment of hospitals.
24. Attacks on and destruction of hospital ships.
25. Infractions of the regulations of the Geneva Cross.
26. Use of noxious and asphyxiating gases.
27. Use of explosive and expanding bullets and other inhuman weapons.
28. Order to give no quarter.
29. Bad treatment inflicted on wounded and prisoners of war.
30. Use of prisoners of war on unjustified labor.
31. Abuse of the white flag.
32. Poisoning of wells.

This list, long and precise as it is, is not complete; it would be possible to add new transgressions to the terrible list of crimes committed by the Germans. This list, based on innumerable facts, justifies only too well the condemnation expressed by the allied and associated powers in their letter of June 16, 1919, for "the savage and inhuman manner" in which Germany had conducted the war. The allied and associated powers were right in saying that "the conduct of Germany is almost unexampled in the history of the human race."

DEPORTATIONS NOT FORGOTTEN

If France has not been the victim of all the violations of right, accidental or systematic, which the summary drawn up by the conference contains, it has perhaps known those which most violently conflict with the laws of nations and with the most sacred sentiments of humanity. Though it is impossible to examine them one by one, it is also impossible to pass over the wholesale abduction, in April, 1916, and the deportation of 25,000 women, young girls, or men of Lille, Roubaix, and Turcoing. * * *

Our colleagues MM. Delory and Ragheboom narrated to us in the session of Oct. 22, 1918, amid almost unanimous emotion, the brutality of the mode of execution of this order, which aggravated a measure more than odious in itself. M. Delory concluded by protesting against a peace without reparations. He said:

It is impossible to pass the sponge over such acts. Not to demand a peace of justice would be a crime against France, a crime against humanity.

These words expressed the national sentiment. Germany deliberately sought to assassinate France, to destroy her industry, her land, her race. Paul Deschanel has said: "To forget would be treachery and supreme peril." The whole Chamber applauded these words. But it is insufficient not to forget; the criminals must expiate their crimes. The German delegation itself has recognized the necessity of "giving satisfaction to the legitimate claims of moral justice where an injustice has really been committed." It would be impossible, alas! to repair all the injustices from which the moral conscience has suffered. But justice, to be efficacious, cannot content itself with a mere condemnation which, despite all its solemnity, would be derivative. * * *

[The report of M. Barthou concluded with a chapter on the restoration of Alsace and Lorraine. When the reading was completed, M. Viviani, on behalf of the Chamber, thanked M. Barthou for the important work which he had accomplished, especially for having brought out into strong relief the advantages secured by the treaty, and, at the same time, for having underlined some of its imperfections. He added: "This is the first time that a complete study of the treaty has issued from any Parliament. The committee had high expectations of your talents and authority; it has not been disappointed."]

German ex-Crown Prince's Memoirs

LATE in July the ex-Crown Prince wrote a letter to Captain Kurt Anker, formerly an intelligence officer in the Crown Prince's Army Group, in which he said that he has refused all invitations from publishers to print his memoirs, as it was repugnant to him to assert his claim for justice too hastily. The letter continued as follows:

In the war I endeavored, according to my knowledge and my ability, to do my duty. I tried to spare the blood of the German soldiers committed to my care, where I could, and to make life better for them so far as lay in my extremely limited power. Today most will disown me. I bear them no grudge for that, but thousands of my brave fellows, whose hands I have shaken, will in their hearts recognize the truth that I finally left the scene of my activities when my person might cause further confusion for our poor and severely tried Fatherland. Whether I acted rightly, who will today decide?

Events have taken their course, and we must now concentrate our thoughts on raising again our shattered German Nation and restoring to outward and inward health our Fatherland, which is bleeding from a thousand wounds. I personally am by no means in a state of deep despair or indifferent apathy. Under the entirely changed conditions, I shall build up a new life for myself and my family.

Constitution of the German Republic

Full Text of New Basic Law of the Nation, Adopted by the National Assembly at Weimar

THE National Constituent Assembly of Germany, elected on Jan. 19, 1919, after many months of deliberation adopted the following Constitution for the new republic on July 31, and it became effective on Aug. 13. During this whole period the Constituent Assembly fulfilled the functions of the Reichstag. Under the Constitution the Reichstag, elected in accordance with the new basic law, will resume its functions. The National Council forms a sort of upper house, corresponding largely to the Federal Council of the Empire. The revision of Article 61, which provides for the admission of Austrian delegates to the National Council, has been formally demanded by the Peace Conference at Paris. The text of the Constitution is as follows:

Preamble.—The German people, united in all its branches and with the determination to build up and strengthen its domain in liberty and justice, to preserve peace, both at home and abroad, and to foster social progress, has adopted the following Constitution:

COMPOSITION AND FUNCTIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT

ARTICLE 1.—The German National State is a Republic. The power of the State is derived from the people.

ARTICLE 2.—The territory of the nation consists of the territories of the German States. Other territories may be taken into the Government by national law, when their inhabitants, by a vote of self-determination, express such a desire.

ARTICLE 3.—The national colors are black-red-gold. The trade flag is black-white-red, with the national colors on the upper inside corner.

ARTICLE 4.—The universally recognized principles of the laws of nations are accepted as binding elements of the laws of the German Nation.

ARTICLE 5.—The power of the National State shall be exercised through the agencies of the Government on the basis of the Constitution in all matters affecting the nation, and in all matters affecting the respective States through the agencies of such States on the basis of their respective Constitutions.

ARTICLE 6.—The Government has the exclusive right of legislation over:

1. Foreign relations.
2. Colonial matters.
3. State property, right of changing residence, immigration and emigration, and extradition.
4. Military organization.
5. Coinage.
6. Customs, including the unification of customs and trade districts and the free circulation of wares.
7. Posts, telegraphs, and telephones.

ARTICLE 7.—The Government has right of legislation over:

1. Civil law.
2. Criminal law.
3. Judicial proceedings, including the execution of penalties and co-operation between departments.
4. Passports and police for aliens.
5. Poor laws and vagrancy.
6. Press, associations, and assemblies.
7. Population policy; provisions affecting maternity, nurslings, young children and adolescents.
8. National health, veterinaries, protection of plants from disease and pests.
9. Labor law, insurance, and protection of workmen and employes and employment agencies.
10. The organization of trade representation in the nation.
11. Provision for war veterans and their survivors.
12. The right of alienation of property.
13. The socialization of natural treasures and economic undertakings, as well as the production, organization, distribution, and evaluation of economic goods for the community.
14. Trade, weights and measures, issue of paper money, banks and stock exchanges.
15. Traffic in food articles and luxuries, as well as objects of daily need.
16. Industrial pursuits and mining.
17. Insurance.
18. Navigation, fishing on the high sea and along the coasts.
19. Railways, internal navigation, communication by vehicles propelled by power on land, on sea, and in the air, construction of highways, in so far as general communications and national defense are concerned.
20. Theatres and cinematographs.

ARTICLE 8.—The Government further possesses legislative power over taxes and other sources of income, in so far as they may be claimed in whole or in part for its purposes. In the event that the Government claims taxes or other forms of income which formerly belonged to its confederated States, it will be bound to consider the maintenance of such States' vital means of support.

ARTICLE 9.—Whenever a need for centralized control occurs the Government has a right of legislation over:

1. Community welfare.
2. Protection of public order and security.

ARTICLE 10.—The Government in respect to legislation may lay down principles for:

1. The rights and duties of religious associations.
2. Schools, high schools, and scientific publications.
3. The official rights of all public bodies.
4. Land rights, land divisions, settlements and homesteads, title or landed property, habitations, and distribution of inhabitants.
5. Interments.

ARTICLE 11.—The Government in respect to legislation may lay down principles for the permissibility and mode of collection of taxes, in order to prevent:

1. Injury to income or to trade relations of the nation.
2. Double taxation.
3. Excessive and burdensome taxes on the use of public ways of communication which hinder traffic, and of tollways.
4. Tax disadvantages of imported wares as compared with domestic products in trade between the various States and State districts, or,
5. To exclude or to conserve important communal interests.

ARTICLE 12.—So long and in so far as the Government makes no use of its right of legislation, the confederated States possess the right of legislation. This does not apply to the exclusive legislation of the Government.

The Government has the right, wherever the welfare of the community is involved, to veto laws of confederated States related to the objects of Article 7, Section 13.

ARTICLE 13.—Government law transcends States' law. In case there should arise doubt or difference of opinion as to whether State legislation is in harmony with Government legislation, the proper officials of the Government or the central State officials, according to the specific prescription of a Government law, may resort to the decision of a highest national court.

ARTICLE 14.—The laws of the Government will be exercised through the State officials, unless the national laws provide otherwise.

ARTICLE 15.—The Government administration exercises supervision in matters over which the nation has the right of legislation.

In so far as the laws of the Government are to be exercised by State officials, the Government Administration may issue general directions. It has the power to send commissioners to the central State authorities, and, with their approval, also to subordinate officials, to supervise the fulfillment of the Government laws.

The State Administrations are charged, at the request of the Government Administration, to eliminate defects in the execution of the national laws. In case of differences of opinion, the Government Administration, as well as the State Administration, may resort to the decision of the Supreme Court, in case another court is not prescribed by Government law.

ARTICLE 16.—Those officials charged with the direct administration of Government in the different States shall, as a rule, be appointed from citizens of the given State. The officials, employees, and workmen of the Government Administration will, when desired, be employed in their home districts as far as proves possible, and whenever consideration of their training or of the demands of the service present no objection.

ARTICLE 17.—Every State must have a republican Constitution. The people's representatives must be chosen in universal, equal, direct and secret vote cast by all German men and women citizens on the basis of proportional representation. The State Administration shall require the confidence of the people's representatives.

The election basis for popular representation applies also for the community elections. Through State law, however, the right to vote may be made to depend on the length of residence in the community to the extent of one year.

ARTICLE 18.—The division of the Government into States shall serve the highest economic and cultural interests of the people after most thorough consideration of the will of the population involved. Changes in State boundaries and the reconstruction of States within the nation may occur on the passing of a national law changing the Constitution.

If the States directly involved agree, a simple Government law will suffice.

A simple Government law will be sufficient, further, if one of the States involved does not agree but the territorial change or reconstruction is demanded by the will of the population and a predominating national interest requires it.

The will of the population is to be determined by referendum. The National Administration will sanction such a vote when a third of the inhabitants qualified to vote for the Reichstag, and who belong to the territory whose separation is opposed, demand it.

To determine a territorial change or reconstruction three-fifths of the votes cast, or at least a majority of votes cast by qualified voters, shall be required. Even when a separation of only a part of a Prussian administrative district, a Bavarian circle, or, in other States, a corresponding administrative district, is involved, the will of the population of the whole district under consideration must be determined. If a considerable dependence of the district to be separated on the whole region does not exist, the will of the population of the district to be separated may be pronounced sufficient on the basis of a special Government law.

After the consent of the population has been manifested by vote, the Government Administration must lay before the Reichstag a corresponding law for enactment.

In case dispute arises over financial or property details when such union or separation is accomplished, the Supreme Court of Germany, if charged therewith by one of the parties, may give a decision.

ARTICLE 19.—In the case of constitutional disputes within a State in which no court exists that may resolve them, as well as in the case of disputes of a non-private nature between different States or between the Government and a State, the National Supreme Court, at the request of one of the parties in dispute, shall decide, in case another court of the Government does not have jurisdiction.

The National President executes the decision of the Supreme Court.

THE REICHSTAG

ARTICLE 20.—The Reichstag shall consist of the deputies of the German people.

ARTICLE 21.—The delegates are representatives of the whole people. They are subject only to their own conscience and shall not be bound by any orders.

ARTICLE 22.—The delegates shall be chosen on the basis of universal, equal, direct and secret vote by all men and women over the age of 20, in accordance with the principles of proportional representation. The day for elections must be a Sunday or a public day of rest.

Other details will be determined by the Government election law.

ARTICLE 23.—The Reichstag will be elected for four years. New elections must occur at latest after the expiration of sixty days following its expiration.

The Reichstag will convene at latest on the thirtieth day after election.

ARTICLE 24.—The Reichstag will meet each year on the first Wednesday in November at the seat of the National Government. The President of the Reichstag must call it earlier, if the President of the Republic, or at least a third of the members of the Reichstag demand it.

The Reichstag shall determine the close of session and the day of reconvention.

ARTICLE 25.—The President of the Republic may dissolve the Reichstag, but only once for the same cause.

New elections shall occur at latest on the sixtieth day after such dissolution.

ARTICLE 26.—The Reichstag shall choose its President, as well as his representative, and its secretary. It shall determine its own order of business.

ARTICLE 27.—Between two adjournments or election periods the President and his representative of the last session shall continue all necessary business.

ARTICLE 28.—The President shall exercise the power of law and police duty in the Reichstag building. The management of the House is subject to him; he shall have power over the incomes and disbursements of the House, in accordance with the standard of Government economy, and shall represent the Government in all legal business and litigation arising in his administration.

ARTICLE 29.—The Reichstag's proceedings will be public. At the request of fifty members the public may be excluded on a two-thirds majority vote.

ARTICLE 30.—Truthful reports of the proceedings in open sessions of the Reichstag, of a Provincial Parliament or of their committees shall carry no responsibility.

ARTICLE 31.—A Court of Election Control shall be formed in the Reichstag. This court shall decide the question whether a delegate shall lose membership or not.

This Court of Election Control shall consist of members of the Reichstag, which the latter chooses for the election period, and of members of the Government Court of Administration, to be appointed by the President of the Republic at the suggestion of the President of this court.

This Court of Election Control shall form its decisions on the basis of public oral discussions conducted by three members of the Reichstag and two judicial members.

Besides the proceedings of the Court of Election Control, other proceedings will be instituted by a Government Commissioner appointed by the President of the Republic. These proceedings, however, shall be regulated by the Court of Election Control.

ARTICLE 32.—To make any decision of the Reichstag valid, a simple majority vote shall be required, in so far as the Constitution does not prescribe a different ratio of voting. For elections to be undertaken by the Reichstag the Committee on Rules may admit exceptions.

The determination of a decision will be regulated by the Committee on Rules.

ARTICLE 33.—The Reichstag and its committee may demand the presence of the National Chancellor and of any other Government Minister.

The Chancellor, the Government Ministers, and their duly appointed representatives shall have access to the sessions of the Reichstag and of its committees. The confederated States shall possess the right to send their plenipotentiaries to these sessions to interpret the views of their State Governments regarding the object of discussion.

At their request the representatives of the State Government must receive a hearing during the discussion, and the representatives of the National Government must be heard also outside the order of the day.

They shall, however, be subject to the control of the Chairman in matters of order.

ARTICLE 34.—The Reichstag has the right and, at the request of one-fifth of its members, the duty of appointing committees of investigation. These committees in open session shall bring to light the evidence which they, or the members proffering the request, shall consider required. Publicity may be excluded by the committee of investigation by a two-thirds majority vote. The Committee on Rules shall regulate the proceedings of the committee and determine the number of its members.

The judicial and administrative officials shall comply with requests made by these committees for information evidence, and the records of these officials shall on request be laid before them. The prescriptions of the penal code shall have application to the investigations of these committees and of the officials by them petitioned, but the secrecy of letter and parcel post, telegraph, and telephone services shall be undisturbed.

ARTICLE 35.—The Reichstag shall appoint a standing committee for outside matters, whose activity shall exist also outside the session and after the close of the election period until the reconvention of the new Reichstag. The sittings of this committee shall not be public, unless the committee by a two-thirds majority vote decides for publicity.

The Reichstag further shall appoint a standing committee to maintain the rights of the popular representatives as against the Government Administration outside of session and after the close of the election period.

These committees shall have the rights of investigating committees.

ARTICLE 36.—No member of the Reichstag or of a Provincial Parliament shall at any time, because of his vote or because of any opinions expressed in the fulfillment of his duty, be judicially or officially prosecuted or in any way be held for responsibility outside the Assembly.

ARTICLE 37.—No member of the Reichstag or of a Provincial Parliament shall, without approval of the house to which the delegate belongs, be subjected to investigation or arrest during the session on account of any action involving penalty, unless the member is arrested in the act, or, at latest, on the following day.

The same approval is required in the case of every other limitation of personal freedom which hinders the fulfillment of the delegate's legislative duties.

Every criminal proceeding against a member of the Reichstag or of a Provincial Parliament and every arrest or other limitation of his personal freedom shall, at the demand of the house to which the delegate belongs, be revoked for the period of the session.

ARTICLE 38.—The members of the Reichstag and the Provincial Parliaments are empowered to refuse evidence concerning persons who have given them information in their capacity as delegates, or to whom, in the fulfillment of their duties as delegates, they have given such information, as well as to testify concerning such information. In regard also to the seizure of documents their position shall be the same as that of all persons who by law are given the right of refusal of evidence.

A search or seizure may be undertaken in the precincts of the Reichstag or of a Provincial Parliament only with the consent of the President.

ARTICLE 39.—Officials and members of the army need no leave to fulfill their office as members of the Reichstag or of a Provincial Parliament.

If they become candidates for a seat in these bodies the necessary leave shall be granted them to prepare for their election.

ARTICLE 40.—The members of the Reichstag shall have the right of free transport over all German railway lines, and also compensation as prescribed by a national law.

THE NATIONAL PRESIDENT AND THE GOVERNMENT

ARTICLE 41.—The President of the Republic shall be chosen by the whole German people. Every German who has completed his thirty-fifth year is qualified for election. Further details are determined by a national law.

ARTICLE 42.—The National President, on assuming his office before the Reichstag, shall take the following oath:

I swear to consecrate all my energy to the welfare of the German people, to increase its advantages, to avert its injury, to preserve the Constitution and the laws of the nation, to fulfill my duties conscientiously, and to deal justly with all.

The addition of a religious declaration shall be permissible.

ARTICLE 43.—The duration of the President's tenure of office shall be seven years. Re-election shall be permissible.

Before the expiration of his term the President may be deposed by a referendum, at the request of the Reichstag. The decision of the Reichstag shall require a two-thirds majority vote. Through such decision the President shall be prohibited from further exercise of his office. Rejection of his deposition by a referendum shall count as a new election and entail the dissolution of the Reichstag.

The National President shall not be subject to prosecution without the sanction of the Reichstag.

ARTICLE 44.—The President may not at the same time be a member of the Reichstag.

ARTICLE 45.—The President shall represent the nation in matters of international law. He shall in the nation's name conclude alliances and other treaties with foreign powers. He shall accredit and receive Ambassadors.

Declaration of war and conclusion of peace shall be subject to national law.

Alliances and treaties with foreign States, related to subjects covered by national law, shall require the approval of the Reichstag.

ARTICLE 46.—The President shall appoint and dismiss Government officials and military officers, if not otherwise provided by law. He can exercise this right of appointment or dismissal through other officials.

ARTICLE 47.—The President has supreme command over all the military forces of the nation.

ARTICLE 48.—If any State shall not fulfill the duties prescribed for it by the Constitution or by Government laws the President of the Republic may hold it to such fulfillment with the aid of armed power.

The President, in the event that public security and order in the German Nation should be considerably disturbed or endangered, may take all necessary measures to re-establish such public security and order, and, if required, to intervene with the aid of armed power. To this end he may provisionally abrogate, in whole or in part, the fundamental laws established in Articles 114, 115, 117, 118, 123, 124, and 153.

The President must immediately inform the Reichstag of all measures provided for by Paragraphs 1 or 2 of this article. These measures may be revoked at the demand of the Reichstag.

In case of danger from delay the Provincial Government may take provisional measures of the kind mentioned in Paragraph 2 for its own territory. These measures may be revoked at the demand of the President of the republic or of the Reichstag. Details are provided by a Government law.

ARTICLE 49.—The President of the Republic shall exercise for the Government the right of pardon. Government amnesties require a national law.

ARTICLE 50.—All arrangements and dispositions of the President of the Republic, including those concerning the army, to become valid must be countersigned by the Prime Minister or by duly qualified Government Ministers. Responsibility shall ensue upon this countersigning.

ARTICLE 51.—The President of the Republic, in case he is incapacitated, shall be represented by the National Chancellor. If such incapacity last for any considerable time, this representation shall be regulated by a Government law. The same provision shall apply in case of a premature vacancy of the Presidency until the new elections are completed.

ARTICLE 52.—The administration of the Government shall consist of the (National Chancellor and the Government Ministers.

ARTICLE 53.—The Chancellor, and at his suggestion the Ministers of the Government, shall be appointed and dismissed by the President of the republic.

ARTICLE 54.—The Chancellor and the Government Ministers shall require the confidence of the Reichstag for the fulfillment of their office. Any of them must withdraw in the event that the Reichstag by explicit resolution withholds its confidence.

ARTICLE 55.—The Chancellor shall preside in the Government Administration and shall conduct its affairs in accordance with an order of business, which shall be determined by the Administration and approved by the President of the Republic.

ARTICLE 56.—The Prime Minister shall determine the line of policy and shall assume responsibility therefor to the Reichstag. Within this line each and every Government Minister shall conduct independently the field of activity allotted to him, assuming his own responsibility to the Reichstag.

ARTICLE 57.—The Ministers of Government are charged to lay before the Government Administration for discussion and decision all drafts of law, all matters so prescribed by Constitution or law, and all differences of opinion over various questions which concern the functions of several Government Ministers.

ARTICLE 58.—The Government Administration shall ratify its decisions on the basis of majority vote. In case of a tie the vote of the presiding officer shall be decisive.

ARTICLE 59.—The Reichstag is empowered to enter a complaint before the Supreme Court of the German Nation against the President of the Republic, the Prime Minister and the Government Ministers, on the ground of their having violated the Constitution or a Government law. The proposal to initiate this complaint must be signed by at least 100 members of the Reichstag and requires the approval of the majority prescribed for alteration of the Constitution. Other details will be regulated by the Government law applying to the National Supreme Court.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL

ARTICLE 60.—A National Council [Reichsrat] shall be formed for representation of the German States in national legislation and administration.

ARTICLE 61.—In the National Council every State shall have at least one vote. In the case of the larger States one vote will be accorded to every million inhabitants. Any excess equal at least to the population of the smallest State will be estimated as equal to a full million. No State shall be represented by more than two-fifths of all votes.

German-Austria, after its union with the German Nation, shall receive the right of participation in the National Council with the number of votes corresponding to its population. Until that time the representatives of German-Austria shall have a deliberative voice.

The number of votes shall be newly determined through the National Council after every general census.

ARTICLE 62.—In committees formed by the National Council from its own members, no State shall have more than one voice.

ARTICLE 63.—The States shall be represented in the National Council through members of their respective Governments. But half of the Prussian votes will be disposed of according to a State law, by the Prussian Provincial Administrations.

The States shall have the right to send as many representatives to the National Council as they have votes.

ARTICLE 64.—The Government Administration shall be bound to summon the National Council at the demand of one-third of its members.

ARTICLE 65.—The Presidency of the National Council and of its committees shall be filled by a member of the Government Administration. The members of the Government Administration shall have the right, and, on demand, the duty, to participate in the dealings of the National Council and its committees. During its sittings they shall, if they so desire, be given a hearing at any time.

ARTICLE 66.—The Government Administration, as well as every member of the State Council, are authorized to make proposals in the National Council. The National Council shall regulate the conduct of its proceedings through an order of business. The plenary sessions of the National Council shall be public. According to the order of business, the public may be excluded for special objects of discussion. A simple majority of the voters shall be decisive in voting.

ARTICLE 67.—The National Council shall be kept informed by the National Ministries of the conduct of national business. The proper committees of the National Council shall be summoned by the National Ministries for deliberations over important subjects.

NATIONAL LEGISLATION

ARTICLE 68.—Projects of legislation shall be introduced by the Government or from the body of the Reichstag. The laws of the nation shall be determined by the Reichstag.

ARTICLE 69.—The introduction of legislative projects by the Government Administration shall require the assent of the National Council. In the event that the Government Administration and the National Council shall not agree, the Government Administration may nevertheless introduce the project, but shall be bound to record the dissent of the National Council.

In case the National Council approve a project of legislation and the Government Administration disapprove it, the latter shall introduce the project in the Reichstag with an exposition of its own standpoint.

ARTICLE 70.—The National President shall make a compilation of all laws created according to the Constitution and within one month publish it in the Government Legislative Record.

ARTICLE 71.—All Government laws shall come into force, unless otherwise specified, on the fourteenth day following the date of the issue of the Government Legislative Record in the nation's capital.

ARTICLE 72.—The publication of a Government law may be deferred for two months, if so demanded by one-third of the Reichstag. Laws which the Reichstag and the National Council declare as urgent may be published by the President of the Republic without regard to such demand.

ARTICLE 73.—A law approved by the Reichstag must be referred to the people before its publication if the President of the Republic so decrees within a month. A law whose publication is deferred at the demand of at least one-third of the Reichstag must be laid before the people for decision, if one-twentieth of qualified voters make such proposal.

A referendum shall further be resorted to if one-tenth of qualified voters express the desire that a project of law shall be proposed. A fully elaborated project of law must be the basis of such desire. The Government must lay this project of law before the Reichstag and explain its own stand regarding it. The referendum shall not occur if the desired project of law is accepted by the Reichstag without alteration. Only the President of the Republic may call a referendum for matters concerning the budget, tax laws, and salary payments. A national law shall regulate the procedure to be followed in a referendum or a project of law desired by the people.

ARTICLE 74.—The National Council shall have the right of veto against laws approved by the Reichstag. This veto must be entered before the Reichstag by the Government within two weeks after ratification, and within two further weeks at the latest must be circumstantiated.

In the event of such veto the law shall be laid before the Reichstag for a second decision. If the Reichstag and the National Council do not agree, the President of the Republic may within three months refer the subject of dispute to a referendum. In case the President does not avail himself of this right, the law will be considered not to have been passed. If the Reichstag rejects the protest of the National Council on the basis of a two-thirds majority vote, the President shall publish the law in the form accepted by the Reichstag within three months, or else decree a referendum.

ARTICLE 75.—Through a referendum a Reichstag decision may be nullified only when a majority of the qualified voters participate in the voting.

ARTICLE 76.—In respect to legislation the Constitution may be altered. But decisions of the Reichstag on alteration of the Constitution shall be valid only when two-thirds of the lawful membership are present, and at least two-thirds of those present give their assent. Decisions of the National Council on alteration shall also require a two-thirds majority of all votes cast. In case a change of Constitution is determined by popular desire through a referendum, the assent of a majority of qualified voters shall be required.

In the event that the Reichstag determine on an alteration of the Constitution against the protest of the National Council, the President of the Republic need not publish this law, if the National Council demand a referendum within two weeks.

ARTICLE 77.—The Government shall issue the general administrative decrees required for the execution of the national laws where no other provision is made by law. The assent of the National Council is necessary when the execution of the laws is incumbent on State officials.

NATIONAL ADMINISTRATION

ARTICLE 78.—Relations with foreign States concern the nation exclusively.

In matters regulated by provincial law the confederated States may conclude treaties with foreign States. These treaties require the consent of the nation.

Agreements with foreign States regarding change of national boundaries may be concluded by the nation on consent of the State involved. Alterations of the boundaries may occur only on the basis of a Government law, except in cases where mere correction of the boundaries of uninhabited districts is in question.

To assure the representation of interests arising for special States through their special economic relations or their proximity to foreign countries, the Government shall decide on the measures and arrangements required in concert with the States involved.

ARTICLE 79.—The defense of the nation concerns the nation. The military organization of the German people shall be placed under unified control by a Government law in which the special provincial institutions shall be given due consideration.

ARTICLE 80.—Colonial administration concerns the nation exclusively.

ARTICLE 82.—Germany forms a customs and trade territory surrounded by a common customs boundary. This customs boundary shall be identical with the frontier boundary. On the coast the shore line of the mainland and of the islands belonging to the national territory constitute the customs boundary. Exceptions may be determined for the customs line running along the seacoast and other waters. Foreign territories or parts of territories may be annexed to the customs territory by national treaties or agreements.

Parts of the customs territory may be excluded on special request. In the case of free ports this exclusion may occur only through a law altering the Constitution. Customs districts excluded may be annexed to a foreign customs district through national treaties or agreements.

All natural products, as well as arts and crafts products, may in the free intercourse of the nation be transported into, out of, or across the boundaries of the various States and communities. Exceptions may be permitted by a Government law.

ARTICLE 83.—Customs and excise of articles of consumption shall be administered through Government officials. Measures shall be provided for the administration of Government taxes through Government officials which shall enable the confederated States to maintain special State interests in the spheres of agriculture, trade, crafts, and industry.

ARTICLE 84.—The Government shall provide by law for:

1. The organization of the administration of taxes in the different States so far as shall be required for the unified and regular fulfillment of the national tax laws.

2. The organization and functions of the officials charged with supervision of the execution of the national tax laws.

3. Balance accounts with the confederated States.

4. The reimbursement of the costs of administration in the execution of the national tax laws.

ARTICLE 85.—All revenues and disbursements of the nation must be computed for every fiscal year and entered in the budget. The budget shall be confirmed before the beginning of the fiscal year by law. The expenses shall regularly be appropriated for one year; in special cases they may be approved for a longer period. In other cases provision in the budget law extending beyond the fiscal year or not relating to the revenues and expenses of the nation or its administration shall be prohibited.

The Reichstag, in the drawing up of the budget, may not increase or add new expenses without the consent of the National Council. The consent of the National Council may be replaced according to the provisions of Article 74.

ARTICLE 86.—For the employment of all national revenue the Minister of Finance shall in the following fiscal year, to cover the responsibility of the administration, submit an account of reckoning to the National Council and to the Reichstag. The auditing of this account shall be regulated by national law.

ARTICLE 87.—In the matter of credit, moneys shall be procured only in case of extraordinary need and regularly only for expenses connected with promotion. Such procuring of moneys, as well as the assumption by the Government of a security obligation, may occur on the strength of a Government law.

ARTICLE 88.—The post and telegraph services, together with the telephone service, concern the nation exclusively. The postage stamp symbols shall be the same for the whole nation.

The Government Administration shall, with the consent of the National Council, issue decrees laying down principles and duties in the use of means of communication. With the consent of the National Council it may extend this authority to the Postmaster General.

The Government Administration, with the consent of the State Council, shall appoint a supplementary council for advisory co-operation in postal, telegraph, telephone communications, and the regulation of prices.

Only the Government shall conclude treaties dealing with communications with foreign countries.

ARTICLE 89.—It is the nation's duty to take over railroads serving general traffic, with all their property, and to manage them as a unified system of communication.

ARTICLE 90.—With the taking over of the railroads the Government shall also take over the right of property alienation and the supreme State rights relating to railway organization. The National Supreme Court shall decide the scope of such rights in case of disputes.

ARTICLE 91.—The Government Administration, with the consent of the State Council, shall issue decrees regulating the construction, the management, and the traffic of railways. With the consent of the National Council it may extend this authority to the proper Government Minister.

ARTICLE 92.—The Government railways, irrespective of their budget and their accounts in the general budget and general accounts of the nation, shall be administered as an independent economic undertaking, which shall defray its own expenses, including interest and cancellation of the railway debt, and shall set aside a railway sinking fund. The amount of the cancellation and of the sinking fund, as well as the objects for which money shall be applied, shall be regulated by special laws.

ARTICLE 93.—Acting for the Government railways, with the consent of the National Council, the Government Administration shall appoint supplementary councils for advisory co-operation in matters of railway traffic and transportation charges.

ARTICLE 94.—In the event that the Government has taken over into its administration the railways of a certain district which serve general transport needs, within that district new railways serving such general transportation needs may be built only by the Government or by its consent. In case such construction of new railways, or alterations of existing railway organizations, concern the sphere of authority of the State police, the Railway Administration, before decision, must grant a hearing to the State officials.

In case the Government has not yet taken over the railways, it may administer on its own account railways considered essential for general transportation, or for national defense, by virtue of Government laws and despite the opposition of the States which they traverse, yet without infringing sovereign State rights, or it may give over construction rights to another, if necessary, also according to right of alienation.

Every Railway Administration must consent to connection with other railway lines at the latter's expense.

ARTICLE 95.—Railways for general traffic not administered by the Government are subject to the supervision of the Government.

The railways thus subjected to Government supervision are to be controlled and equipped according to the same principles, to be determined by the Government. They shall be maintained in safe condition and to be extended as necessity demands. Transportation of persons and goods shall, as need arises, be provided for and equipment furnished.

In the supervision of the cost of transportation, the supervisors shall work toward a uniform and a low railway rate.

ARTICLE 96.—All railways, including those not serving general traffic needs, must comply with the demands of the Government for use of the railways for the purpose of national defense.

ARTICLE 97.—It is the duty of the Government to take over for administration all waterways serving general communications. After such taking over, such waterways serving general communications may be applied or extended only by the Government or with its consent. In administering, extending, or reconstructing such waterways the needs of agriculture and irrigation shall be preserved in co-operation with the States affected. The claims of the latter shall also be regarded.

Every administration of waterways must agree to amalgamation with other inner waterways at the cost of the undertakers. The same obligation exists for the construction of a connecting way between inner waterways and railways.

In taking over the waterways the Government shall assume the right of alienation and authority over transportation cost and the policing of waters and navigation.

The task of building water communications in connection with the extension of natural waterways in the Rhine, Weser, and Elbe regions is to be undertaken by the Government.

ARTICLE 98.—Supplementary councils shall be formed with the consent of the National Council by specific decree of the Government Administration for co-operation in matters affecting waterways and national waterways.

ARTICLE 99.—Expenses on natural waterways shall be incurred only for such works, establishments, and other institutions as are destined to facilitate communication. In the case of State and community institutions they must not exceed the expenses required for repair and maintenance. The costs of repair and maintenance for institutions not intended exclusively to facilitate communication, but also to further other purposes, may be increased by navigation expenses only to a relative degree. Sums paid for interest and debt cancellation shall be included in costs for maintenance.

The provisions of the preceding clause apply to the disbursements incurred for artificial waterways as well as for constructions on such and in harbors.

The total costs of a waterway, a river district, or a system of waterways may be reckoned as fundamental in matters of inner navigation for the estimation of navigation expenses.

These provisions apply also to timber floating on navigable waterways.

Only the Government may impose other or higher taxes on foreign ships and their cargoes than on German ships and their cargoes.

For the procuring of means for the maintenance and equipment of the German system of waterways the Government may call on the participants in navigation for contributions in other ways.

ARTICLE 100.—To cover the cost of maintenance and construction of inner navigation routes any person who in any other way than through navigation derives profit from the construction of dams that shut off valleys may also be called upon for contribution, whenever several States are involved, or the Government bears the cost of the outlay.

ARTICLE 101.—It is the duty of the Government to take over as its own property and into its own administration all sea signals, especially lighthouses, lightships, buoys, floats, and beacons. After such taking over sea signals may be repaired or improved only by the Government or with its consent.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ARTICLE 102.—Judges shall be independent and subject only to the law.

ARTICLE 103.—Regular justice shall be administered through the national courts and through the State courts.

ARTICLE 104.—Judges administering regular justice shall be appointed for life. They may be permanently or temporarily removed from office, or transferred to another office, or retired against their will, only by virtue of judicial decision and for the grounds and in the forms provided by law. The law code may fix age limitations, on reaching which Judges may be retired. The temporary relief from office consequent on law is not affected by this article.

In case of a change in the organization of the courts or their jurisdiction districts the administration of justice in the provinces may decree transfer against desire to another court or removals from office, but only under allowances of full salary.

These provisions have no application to commercial Judges, rural Justices, and jurymen.

ARTICLE 105.—Extraordinary courts are illegal. No one shall be removed from the jurisdiction of his legal Judge. Provisions made by law for martial courts and military courts are not affected hereby. Military courts of honor are suspended.

ARTICLE 106.—Military justice is to be suspended, except in time of war or on board warships. Further details are regulated by national law.

ARTICLE 107.—Administrative courts both of the nation and the States must, according to law, protect the individual against dispositions and provisions of administrative officials.

ARTICLE 108.—According to national law a National Supreme Court is established for the German Nation.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF THE GERMANS—THE INDIVIDUAL

ARTICLE 109.—All Germans are equal before the law. Men and women have fundamentally the same civil rights and duties. Public advantages or disadvantages of birth or rank are to be suspended. Titles of nobility shall be accepted only as part of a name and may not be conferred any longer. Titles may be conferred only when they designate an office or a profession; academic degrees are not affected by this provision. Orders and insignias of orders may not be conferred by the State. No German may accept a title or order from a foreign Government.

ARTICLE 110.—Citizenship in the nation and the States may be acquired or lost, according to the provisions of national law. Every citizen of a State is at the same time a citizen of the nation. Every German in every State of the nation has the same rights and duties as the citizens of the State itself.

ARTICLE 111.—All Germans enjoy the right of free travel throughout the whole nation. Every one has the right of sojourn and settlement in any place within the nation, the right to acquire real estate and to pursue every means of livelihood. Limitations require the issuance of a Government decree.

ARTICLE 112.—Every German has the right to emigrate to countries outside Germany. Emigration may be limited only by national law. All citizens of the nation have right of protection by the Government both within and without the national boundaries as against foreign countries. No German may be delivered over to a foreign Government for prosecution or punishment.

ARTICLE 113.—Those elements of the nation speaking a foreign language may not be impaired judicially or administratively in their free and popular development, especially in the use of their mother tongue for instruction, or in matters of internal administration and the administration of justice.

ARTICLE 114.—Freedom of the person cannot be impaired. An impairment or withdrawal of personal liberty through public power is admissible only as prescribed by law. Persons, whose freedom is taken from them, are to be informed at latest on the following day by what official and on what grounds their liberty was taken from them, and they shall immediately receive an opportunity to present objections against this loss of freedom.

ARTICLE 115.—The home of every German is his place of refuge and cannot be violated. Exceptions are admissible only as prescribed by law.

ARTICLE 116.—No action can be penalized, if penalty is provided by law, before the action has been committed.

ARTICLE 117.—Secrecy of letters and of postal, telegraph and telephone services cannot be impaired. Exceptions may be admissible only as prescribed by national law.

ARTICLE 118.—Every German has the right within the limits of the general laws to express his opinion by word, in writing, printing, by picture, or in any other way. No connection with his labor or employment shall hinder him in the exercise of this right, and no one may injure him if he makes use of this right.

No censorship exists, though different provisions may be passed by law in the case of moving pictures. Legal measures are also permissible for combating obscene and indecent literature, as well as for the protection of youth at public plays and spectacles.

THE SOCIAL LIFE

ARTICLE 119.—Marriage, as the foundation of family life and of the maintenance and increasing of the nation, is under the particular protection of the Constitution. It is based upon the equal rights of both sexes. The maintaining of the purity, the health, and the social advancement of the family is the task of the State and the communities. Families with numerous children have a claim for compensating care. Motherhood has a claim upon the protection and care of the State.

ARTICLE 120.—The education of offspring to physical, mental, and social efficiency is the highest duty and natural right of parents, whose activities are watched over by the political community.

ARTICLE 121.—Illegitimate children are to be provided by legislation with the same conditions for their physical, mental, and social development as those of legitimate children.

ARTICLE 122.—Youth is to be protected against exploitation, as well as against a lack of moral, mental, or physical guarantees. The State and the communities are to take the necessary steps to this end. Compulsory measures for welfare can be ordered only on the basis of the law.

ARTICLE 123.—All Germans have the right to gather in meetings peaceably and unarmed without announcement or particular permission. Meetings in the open may be made liable to previous announcement by a national law and, in the presence of immediate danger to the public order, may be forbidden.

ARTICLE 124.—All Germans have the right to form societies or associations for purposes not contrary to the penal law. This right cannot be limited through preventive measures. The same provisions apply to religious societies and unions.

Every association has the right to acquire legal character in accordance with the civil law. No society may be refused this right because it pursues a political, social-political, or religious object.

ARTICLE 125.—Liberty of the suffrage and its secrecy are guaranteed. Details will be laid down by the election laws.

ARTICLE 126.—Every German has the right to appeal to the competent authorities or to the representatives of the people with written requests or grievances. This right may be exercised by individuals as well as by several persons together.

ARTICLE 127.—Communities and community associations have the right of self-administration within the limits of the law.

ARTICLE 128.—All citizens of the State, without distinction, are to be admitted to public office according to the provisions of the law and their abilities. All exceptional regulations against female officials and employes are set aside. The principles of official relations are to be regulated by a national law.

ARTICLE 129.—The employment of State officials is for life, in so far as it is not provided differently by law. Pension-salaries and pensions for relatives and dependents are regulated by law. The legally acquired rights of the officials are inviolable. The legal way is open to officials for their property-claims. The officials can be suspended, either temporarily or definitely, or transferred to another position with smaller salary, only under legal provisions.

Against every demand for punishment in the service a form of appeal and the possibility for a reopening of the trial are to be provided. In the investigation of the person of an official, facts against the official are to be recorded only when the official has had the opportunity to express himself as to the complaint. The official is to be permitted to inspect the complaint.

The inviolability of the acquired rights and the maintenance of the legal way for property complaints are especially assured to the professional soldier. For the rest, their position is regulated by national law.

ARTICLE 130.—The officials are servants of the whole community, not of a party. To all officials freedom of their political beliefs and right of association is assured. The officials receive, according to special provisions in the national law, special representation as officials.

ARTICLE 131.—In case an official during the exercise of his public duties violates the duties which he owes to a third person, the responsibility comes upon the State or the authority in whose services the official is. The right to take counteraction against the official is reserved by the State. The regular lawful way shall not be excluded. The detail regulation comes under the apportioning legislation.

ARTICLE 132.—Every German, according to the provision of the law, has the duty to accept honorary offices.

ARTICLE 133.—All citizens are obliged, according to law, to perform personal service for the State and the community. The duty of military service is regulated according to the National Army law. This determines also how far certain fundamental provisions are to be restricted for the members of the army in order that they may fulfill their duties and that military discipline may be preserved.

ARTICLE 134.—All citizens, without any distinction, shall contribute according to their means to carrying all public burdens, according to the provisions of the law.

RELIGION AND RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES

ARTICLE 135.—All inhabitants of the nation shall enjoy complete liberty of worship and conscience. Undisturbed enjoyment of religious liberties is assured by the Constitution and is under national protection. This provision leaves the general national laws untouched.

ARTICLE 136.—Civic rights, State rights and duties are neither conditioned nor limited by the enjoyment of religious liberties. The enjoyment of civic and State rights as well as admission to public office are independent of religious beliefs. No one is bound to reveal his religious belief. The authorities have the right to ask for the affiliation to a religious society in so far as rights and duties depend thereon, or in case a lawfully organized census demands such information.

No one is to be forced to participate in church duties or church festivities, or to take part in religious exercises, or be compelled to give a religious oath.

ARTICLE 137.—No State Church is recognized. Freedom of organization for religious purposes is assured. The union of religious societies within the nation is not restricted. Every religious society regulates and administers its affairs independently within the limits of the law. It appoints its officers without the co-operation of the State or the municipality. Religious societies acquire legality according to the prescriptions of the civic laws. The religious societies remain organizations of public law, in so far as they were such before. To other religious societies at their request the same rights are to be accorded, if by their constitution and the number of their members they give the guarantee of permanency. An amalgamation into a federation of a number of such public religious societies makes of such federation a public corporation.

Religious societies, which are recognized public corporations, are entitled, on the basis of the civic tax lists, to raise taxes according to the provisions of the respective State laws.

Societies which have as their aim the cultivation of a world conception of life are put on an equal footing with religious societies.

In so far as the carrying out of this provision requires a further regulation, it comes under the respective State laws.

ARTICLE 138.—State contributions to religious societies based on public law, contract or special legal titles are abrogated by State legislation. The fundamental laws pertaining to this come under national laws.

The right of property and other rights of public religious societies and religious assemblies in connection with institutions devoted to purposes of worship, teaching and charity purpose, as well as religious foundations and other forms of property, are guaranteed.

ARTICLE 139.—Sunday and national holidays remain lawfully protected as days of rest and spiritual elevation.

ARTICLE 140.—To the members of the army is given the necessary time for the fulfilling of their religious duties.

ARTICLE 141.—In so far as the need of worship and spiritual advice exists in hospitals, Houses of Correction, or other public institutions, religious societies are permitted to hold religious meetings. No compulsion shall obtain.

EDUCATION AND SCHOOLS

ARTICLE 142.—Art, science, and their teachings are free. The State accords them protection and takes part in their promotion.

ARTICLE 143.—The education of the young is to be provided for through public institutions. In their establishment the nation, States, and communities work together.

The instruction of teachers is to be regulated on a uniform basis for the nation according to the generally recognized principles of higher education.

The teachers in the public schools have the rights and duties of State officials.

ARTICLE 144.—The entire school system is under the supervision of the State; it can accord participation therein to the communities. The school supervision will be exercised by technically trained central officials.

ARTICLE 145.—There shall be general compulsory attendance at school. This duty will be principally attended to by the popular school with at least eight years of instruction, and the following continuation schools up to the completion of the eighteenth year. Instruction books and other apparatus in the popular and continuation schools are free.

ARTICLE 146.—The public school system is to be organically constructed. Upon a basic school for every one is erected the intermediate and high school system. For this superstructure the rule for guidance is the multiplicity of life's callings, and the acceptance of a child in a particular school depends upon his qualifications and inclinations, not upon the economic and social position or the religion of his parents.

Nevertheless, within the communities, upon the proposal of those entitled to instruction, there shall be erected popular schools of their faith or view of the universe, in so far as this does not interfere with a regulated conduct of the schools in the sense of Paragraph 1. Details will be laid down in the State legislation, according to the principles of a national law.

For the attendance of those in poor circumstances at the intermediate and higher schools, public means are to be supplied by the nation, States, and communities, with especial assistance to the parents of children regarded as adapted for education in the intermediate and higher schools, until the instruction period is ended.

ARTICLE 147.—Private schools as a substitute for public schools require the approval of the State and are subject to the provincial laws. Approval is to be given if the private schools are not inferior to the public schools in their objects, their equipment, and the scientific competency of their teaching staffs; and when a division of the pupils according to the amount of property possessed by their parents is not demanded. Approval is to be withheld when the economic and legal status of the teachers is not sufficiently guaranteed.

Private popular schools are to be allowed only when, for a minority entitled to instruction, whose desires must be considered according to Article 146, Paragraph 2, there exists in a community no public school of a given faith or world conception; or when the educational administration recognizes a particular pedagogical interest. Private preparatory schools are to be abolished. The existing law for private schools that do not serve as substitutes for the public schools remains in force.

ARTICLE 148.—Moral education, civic sentiment, and personal and professional ability in the spirit of popular Germanism and of international reconciliation are to be striven for in all the schools. In giving instruction in public schools care must be taken not to hurt the feelings of those who think differently. Civics and labor instruction are branches of instruction in the schools. Every pupil will receive a copy of the Constitution upon completing his school duties. The system of popular education, inclusive of the popular high schools, is to be promoted by nation, States, and communities.

ARTICLE 149.—Religious instruction is a regular branch of school instruction, except in the case of schools acknowledging no creed, or worldly schools. The imparting of religious instruction will be regulated by school legislation. It will be given in accord with the principles of the religious societies concerned, without prejudice to the State's right of supervision.

The imparting of religious instruction and the using of church forms are left to the desire of the teachers, and the participation of the pupils in religious studies and in church solemnities and acts is left to those who have the right of determining the child's religious education.

The theological Faculties of the colleges are maintained.

ARTICLE 150.—The monuments of art, history, and nature, as well as the landscape, enjoy the protection and care of the State. It is the affair of the nation to prevent the removal of German art possessions to foreign lands.

ECONOMIC LIFE

ARTICLE 151.—The regulation of economic life must correspond to the principles of justice, with the object of assuring to all a life worth living. Within these bounds the economic liberty of the individual is to be assured.

Legal compulsion is admissible only for the safeguarding of threatened rights or in the service of predominant demands of the public good.

The freedom of trade and industry is safeguarded according to the national laws.

ARTICLE 152.—There is freedom of contract in economic relations within the limits of the law. Usury is forbidden. Legal arrangements that are in conflict with decent customs are null and void.

ARTICLE 153.—Property is safeguarded by the Constitution. Its composition and limits are defined by the laws.

Confiscation can be carried out only for the benefit of the community as a whole and with due process of law. There will be appropriate compensation, as far as a national law may not otherwise prescribe. In the case of dispute as to the amount of the compensation the ordinary courts may be appealed to in so far as national laws do not provide otherwise. Confiscation by the nation from States, communities, and societies organized for the public welfare may be effected only with compensation. Property implies a duty. Its use should at the same time be a service to the general welfare.

ARTICLE 154.—The right of inheritance is safeguarded according to the civil law.

The State's part in the inheritance will be provided for by law.

ARTICLE 155.—The division and use of the land will be checked over by the State in such a way as to prevent its misuse and to promote the object of insuring to every German a healthful dwelling and to all German families, especially those with numerous children, a dwelling and economic homestead corresponding to their needs. War veterans are to be specially considered in the home-stead law to be created.

Real estate, the acquisition of which is necessary to meet housing needs, to encourage settling and bringing of land under cultivation, or to promote agriculture, may be expropriated. Entailments are to be dissolved.

The working and exploitation of the land is a duty of the land owner toward the community. An increase of value of land arising without the applying of labor or capital to the property is to be made to serve the community as a whole.

All mineral treasures and all economically useful forces of nature are under the control of the State. Private rights are to be turned over to the State through legislation.

ARTICLE 156.—The nation may through law, without detriment to compensation, and with a proper application of the regulations covering expropriation, transfer to public ownership private economic enterprises adapted for socialization. The nation may itself take part in the administration of economic undertakings and societies, or transfer such right to States or communities, or insure itself a dominating influence in some other way.

Furthermore, the nation, in case of pressing necessity for the purpose of public business, may combine through law economic enterprises and societies on the basis of self-administration, with the object of insuring the co-operation of all the working sections of the people, of allowing employers and employees to participate in the administration, and of regulating the production, preparation, distribution, use and prices, as well as the import and export of economic goods, according to general economic principles.

The co-operatives of industry and husbandry and their associations, upon their request and with consideration for their composition and peculiarities, may be embodied in the common system of economics.

ARTICLE 157.—Labor power is under the special protection of the nation. The nation will create uniform labor laws.

ARTICLE 158.—Intellectual labor, the rights of the discoverer, the inventor and the artist, enjoy the protection and care of the nation.

The creations of German science, art and technique are to be protected and promoted abroad through international agreement.

ARTICLE 159.—The right of combination for the defense and promotion of labor and economic conditions is guaranteed to everybody and to all professions. All agreements and measures which attempt to limit or impede this liberty are illegal.

ARTICLE 160.—Any one employed as an office employee or a worker has the right to the time off necessary to exercise his civic rights and, so far as it does not materially injure the business, to fill public honorary offices conferred upon him. The law will define how far he may demand compensation.

ARTICLE 161.—For the purpose of conserving health and the ability to work, of protecting motherhood and of guarding against the economic effects of age, debilities and the vicissitudes of life, the nation will create a comprehensive system of insurance, with the authoritative co-operation of the insured.

ARTICLE 162.—The nation favors an international regulation of the legal status of the workers that strives for a general minimum measure of social rights for the whole working class of the world.

ARTICLE 163.—It is the moral duty of every German, without prejudice to his personal liberty, so to use his intellectual and physical powers as is demanded by the welfare of the community.

Every German shall receive the possibility of earning his living through economic labor. In so far as the appropriate opportunity to work cannot be given to him his necessary maintenance will be looked after. Details will be arranged through special national laws.

ARTICLE 164.—The independent middle class in agriculture, industry, and trade is to be favored in legislation and administration, and is to be protected against being overburdened and made victims of extortion.

ARTICLE 165.—The workers and office employees are qualified to take part with equal rights and in co-operation with the employers in the regulation of wage and labor conditions, as well as in the entire economic development of the productive forces. The organizations on both sides and their unions are recognized.

The workers and office employees receive legal representation in the Factory Workers' Councils, as well as in the District Workers' Councils grouped according to economic districts, and in a National Workers' Council, for the purpose of looking after their social and economic interests.

The District Workers' Councils and the National Workers' Council meet together with the representatives of the employers and of other interested circles of people in District Economic Councils and a National Economic Council for the purpose of carrying out the joint economic tasks and for co-operating in the putting into effect of the laws of socialization. The District Economic Councils and the National Economic Council are to be formed so as to provide for the proper representation therein of all the important trade groups according to their economic and social importance.

Social political and economic political drafts of laws of fundamental importance are to be submitted by the National Government to the National Economic Council for its opinion before presentation. The National Economic Council has the right itself to propose such plans of laws. If the National Government does not agree with it, it has the right, nevertheless, to present the proposal to the Reichstag with an exposition of its standpoint. The National Economic Council may have its proposal represented by one of its members before the Reichstag.

The Workers' and Economic Councils may have conferred upon them the powers of control and administration in the fields turned over to them.

The building up of the Workers' and Economic Councils and the defining of their duties, as well as their relations to other social self-administrative bodies, are exclusively matters of the nation.

TRANSITORY AND FINAL REGULATIONS

ARTICLE 166.—Until the establishment of the National Administrative Court the National Court will take its place in forming the Court for Examining Elections.

ARTICLE 167.—The regulations of Article 18, Paragraphs 3 to 6, become effective two years after the announcement that the Constitution has gone into force.

ARTICLE 168.—Until the promulgation of the State law provided for in Article 63, but at the most for only one year, all the Prussian votes in the National Council may be cast by members of the Government.

ARTICLE 169.—The National Government will determine when the regulation laid down in Article 83, Paragraph 1, is to become effective.

ARTICLE 170.—The Postal and Telegraph Administrations of Bavaria and Württemberg will be taken over by the nation not later than April 1, 1921.

If no understanding has been reached over the terms of their taking over by Oct. 1, 1920, the matter will be decided by the Supreme Court.

The former rights and duties of Bavaria and Württemberg remain in force until the act of taking over. Nevertheless, the postal and telegraph traffic with neighboring foreign countries will be regulated exclusively by the nation.

ARTICLE 171.—The State railroads, waterways, and ocean signal systems are to be taken over by the nation not later than April 1, 1921.

If no understanding has been reached over the terms of their taking over by Oct. 1, 1920, the matter will be decided by the Supreme Court.

ARTICLE 172.—Until the national law regarding the Supreme Court becomes effective its powers will be exercised by a Senate of seven members, four of whom are to be elected from among its members by the Reichstag and three by the National High Court. This Senate will arrange its own methods of procedure.

ARTICLE 173.—Until the enactment of a national law according to Article 138, the existing State contributions to the religious societies based upon law, agreement, or special legal titles will continue.

ARTICLE 174.—Until the enactment of the national law provided for in Article 146, Paragraph 2, the legal status existing will continue. The law will pay special attention to districts of the nation where a system of schools not separated according to faiths legally exists.

ARTICLE 175.—The regulations of Article 109 do not apply to orders and decorations conferred for services in the war years of 1914-1919.

ARTICLE 176.—All public officials and members of the army are to be sworn upon this Constitution. The details will be fixed by an order of the national President.

ARTICLE 177.—Where in the existing laws it is provided that the oath be taken in connection with a religious form, the taking of the oath can be made legal by having the swearer say, leaving out the religious form, "I swear." For the rest the contents of the oath provided for in the laws remains undisturbed.

ARTICLE 178.—The Constitution of the German Empire of April 16, 1871, and the law covering the temporary exercise of the national authority of Feb. 10, 1919, are annulled.

The other laws and regulations of the nation remain in force, in so far as they are not in contradiction with this Constitution. The arrangements contained in the Peace Treaty signed on June 28, 1919, at Versailles, are not affected by the Constitution.

Ordinances of the authorities legally issued on the strength of previously existing laws retain their power until annulled through other ordinances or legislation.

ARTICLE 179.—In so far as reference is made in laws or ordinances to regulations and institutions which are abolished by this Constitution their places will be taken by the corresponding regulations and institutions of this Constitution. In particular the place of the National Assembly will be taken by the Reichstag, that of the Committee of States by the National Council, and the place of national President elected on the strength of the law covering the temporary exercise of the national authority, by the national President elected under the authority of this Constitution.

The power to issue ordinances conferred upon the Committee of States through the former provisions is transferred to the national Government; the Government in issuing ordinances requires the approval of the National Council as laid down in this Constitution.

ARTICLE 180.—Until the convening of the first Reichstag the National Assembly will function as the Reichstag. Until the installing of the first national President his office will be filled by the national President elected on the strength of the law covering the temporary exercise of the national authority.

ARTICLE 181.—The German people have adopted and decreed this Constitution through its National Assembly. It goes into effect upon the day of its publication.

Weimar, July 31, 1919.

Depositing the Peace Treaty

Solemn Ceremony in Which Premier Clemenceau Placed the Original Document in the French Archives

IN an impressive ceremony, Premier Clemenceau, soon after the signing of peace with Germany, deposited the momentous Treaty of Versailles in the archives of the French Chamber of Deputies. The Chamber was crowded, many persons being unable even to find standing room. M. Clemenceau, as President of the Peace Conference, sat on the ministerial bench, surrounded by his colleagues. Before him lay the thick volume of the Peace Treaty. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon the main actors in this historic ceremony had arrived, followed by M. Pichon bearing the treaty. On entering, the French Premier was immediately surrounded by a throng of Deputies seeking to shake his hand. At ten minutes after the hour M. Paul Deschanel, President of the French Chamber, opened the sitting. In a few sentences he proclaimed the act which had been accomplished in the Galerie des Glaces at Versailles, where "Bismarck, forty years before, had consummated his crime."

The Deputies rose three times in approval of his words when he declared that the thoughts of all in that memorable moment went forth toward Alsace and Lorraine, "our dear provinces, which have suffered so much," * * * to "our fallen" * * * and to the soldiers, "the greatest in history."

As President of the Chamber he then announced that "Conformably with the last will of Jules Grosjean, who, on Feb. 28, 1871, brought to the tribune of the National Assembly the protest of the Deputies of Alsace-Lorraine, I deposit in the archives of the Chamber the original text of this immortal document. And in your name I address to his daughter, who has transmitted it to us, the homage of our gratitude."

M. Clemenceau then entered the tribune; he drew a few sheets of paper from his pocket. Meantime the usher had placed the volume of the treaty before him and M. Clemenceau then read the following statement:

I have the honor of placing on the bureau of the Chamber for ratification the treaty which on the 28th of June in Versailles received the signatures of the allied Governments and associates after those of the plenipotentiaries of the German Empire. I add to these the Anglo-French and Franco-American conventions.

It was easy to see that M. Clemenceau was very much moved. He said that he did not wish to anticipate the discussion of the treaty, but that at the "hour when the greatest drama of history was closing, when we are still quivering from the strain of supreme duties magnificently accomplished, the first outburst of our feelings must be toward French as toward humanitarian hope." He continued as follows:

What unlimited joy it is that this definitive declaration can be made from this tribune! The work of salvation which placed the world in such danger has been accomplished by France and her allies. Only on the condition that we remain conscious of our duty can the old spirit of warlike dominion be forever overcome. The day has come when force and right, which were terribly separated, must be reunited for the peace of the peoples and for work. May humanity rise to live its full life.

These words were greeted with long continued applause by the whole Chamber.

M. Clemenceau went on to say that this peace would be achieved with a will which could never be made to flinch, as the war had been pursued without weakness or theatrical pride, but with the infrangible resolution to carry ever higher that France which was the very frontier of liberty.

"We have given our all," cried M. Clemenceau, with a gesture which thrilled the whole assembly, "and now right is standing again triumphant, and the peace of right is setting out on its course."

The conclusion of the Premier's address was as follows:

And now, let all get to work for the accomplishment of the duties of tomorrow, and of today, above all for the necessary reparations. Social union, no less indispensable in peace than in war, remains the very foundation of the country. On one side there must be concessions in the organization of modern labor. On the other hand, there must be learned the lesson of moderation, of self-government. There must be mutual sacrifices springing from a better comprehension.

The Government must set the example. They must not be asked for any coups de théâtre. A people could not pass suddenly, without any transition period, from the upheavals of a defense to the orderly life for which they all longed.

Rhineland Occupation Terms Modified

Details of High Commission's Powers

AS the result of two formal protests by the German Government against some of the provisions for the administration of the Rhine Provinces to be occupied by allied troops during the fifteen years expected to elapse before Germany shall have made her last indemnity payment, the Paris Council sent a reply apparently intended to be the last word in the controversy, and containing slight modifications of the terms of occupation as printed in the September issue of CURRENT HISTORY. The answer, as given in the Berliner Tageblatt of Aug. 2, reads as follows:

1 and 2. Introductory remarks: The allied and associated Governments have always had the intention so to shape the occupation as to make it the least oppressive possible for the population of the district on the left bank of the Rhine under the proviso that Germany will closely observe the conditions of peace.

3. Articles 3 and 5 of the agreement. The application of German laws: In the agreement the German Government declared its acceptance of the condition providing that the High Commission should have the right to issue regulations having legal force for the purpose of assuring the support, the security, and the supplying of the needs of the military forces of the allied and associated powers.

It is agreed that, under this reservation, the present and future laws enacted by the German Nation and the Federal States, inclusive of those enacted since the German revolution, are to be effective in the occupied territory. It will be the task of the High Commission to examine these laws in each individual case in order to see to what degree they may be detrimental to the security and needs of the military forces of the allied and associated powers.

4. Exercise of the legislative power of the High Commission: It can be unhesitatingly recognized that, with the above reservation, the population will enjoy the free exercise of its personal and civic rights, religious liberty, freedom of the press, elections and meetings, and that the political, legal, administrative, and economic relations of the occupied districts with unoccupied Germany will not be hampered nor will freedom of traffic between occupied and unoccupied Germany.

Nevertheless, the allied and associated powers cannot undertake the obligation of making the issuing of regulations dependent upon a previous agreement between the High Commission and the representative of Germany. The latter will be able to be heard, if it is a matter falling within his jurisdiction, except in urgent cases.

5. Establishment of a national commission:

(a) The establishment of a civilian national commission, representing the national authority, can be admitted by the allied and associated Governments.

(b) Nevertheless, it must be observed that this body is not provided for in the text of the agreement and that the person named needs the previous and revokable approval of the allied and associated Governments.

(c) The competence of the National Commissioner will only extend to those matters which, under the provisions of the German Constitution, are national affairs.

In fact, the allied and associated Governments cannot accept in the text a provision that the National Commissioner is, under all circumstances, the representative of the States, republics or provinces, because their internal legislation, which is subject to changes and alterations, must be respected.

If, however, the competent authorities of the different Federal States agree to appoint one and the same Commissioner, the allied and associated Governments will raise no objection; nevertheless, the High Commission will always reserve the right to enter into relations with all the local authorities, in so far as matters within their jurisdiction are concerned.

6. Number of the troops of occupation: The allied and associated Governments reserve the right to give information as to the effective strength of the troops that they maintain in the occupied territory.

7. Strength of the police troops: There is nothing in the way of the High Commission taking counsel with the German authorities concerned, but it has the right of regulating the organization of the police troops.

8. The drawing up of the commission's regulations: The High Commission can with profit, except in pressing cases, previously obtain the opinion of the National Commissioner, or of the competent German authorities, but without the existence of any obligation to do so. No such obligation is provided for in the agreement.

9. The conferring of a privileged legal status by the army commanders: It is true that the conditions under which this status is to be conferred can be still more closely described. It is recognized, in principle, that the privilege is not to be granted to German citizens.

On the other hand, the allied and associated Governments, which do not wish to see disturbances brought into the occupied districts, cannot allow the competent German authorities to institute legal actions on account of political or industrial acts occurring during the armistice period, if these acts have not already given the allied and associated Governments occasion for legal measures.

10. Privileges, administration of civilian affairs: The text of the agreement expressly provides that military persons, or persons accredited by the military commanders, are to be subject exclusively to the military justice of the allied and associated powers, in civil as well as criminal cases.

So far as the private contracts concluded by military persons or their families are concerned, it may be allowed, as demanded in the memorandum, that these affairs be brought before the German courts. The High Commission will, nevertheless, retain the right of countermanding in case of abuse. This observation does not apply in the case provided for in Article 3 (b) of the agreement. All cases having both a criminal and a civil character must be tried by the military courts.

11. Penal law: The German courts will apply the German penal code in the cases falling within their jurisdiction; but, in accord with the principles of international law, the military courts of the Allies and associates can only apply the laws that have been enacted in their native States.

12. Extradition of accused persons: The proposal in the German memorandum is not acceptable. The text of the agreement is exact and logical. It demands that accused persons charged with crimes or offenses against the person or property of the allied and associated military forces must be handed over to the allied and associated authorities, even if the accused persons have sought refuge in unoccupied territory. Besides, it is not a matter of extraditions in a legal sense, as the occupied districts are parts of German territory.

13. Administrative districts and political districts: The memorandum of the German Government is anxious to know if the ordinances of the commission will alter the administrative districts and the political districts for the needs of occupation. The agreement provides for nothing of the kind. It has not been the intention of the associated and allied Governments to enable the commission to alter the political and administrative boundaries.

14. Finances: It is agreed that the civil administration also includes the administration of the finances and that the revenues of the nation and of the Federal States in the occupied districts may be received and administered by the competent German authorities.

15. Right of recall of officials: The German memorandum's request would signify an alteration of the text of the agreement. Nevertheless, it may be understood that the work of recalling officials upon the orders of the High Commission without delay is promised to the National Commissioner, or to the competent German authorities, except in urgent cases. In all circumstances the High Commission reserves the right to recall officials itself in case of necessity.

16. Payment for requisitions: The allied and associated Governments intend to retain the right given to them by Article 6 of the agreement, but they do not decline to consult with the competent German authorities over a ruling for its application.

17. Quartering of the troops and officials: This is a question of fact that can only be arranged through the examining of concrete cases, and the Allies and associates will carry on this examination in a spirit of reconciliation in order to satisfy the legitimate needs of the public administrations.

18. Tax exemption: It is understood that the tax exemptions cannot be extended to cover national taxes originating through private business or deals and having no connection with the service. On the other hand, it is recognized that the High Allied Commission must institute a method of keeping check on the exercise of the privileges and tax exemptions granted to the troops of occupation and its civilian and military personnel by Article 9.

19. Customs regulations: At the present time the allied and associated Governments do not believe that they ought to make use of the provisions of Article 270; but they expressly reserve for the future their decision as to the seasonableness of the application of this article.

21. Postal and telegraph service: It is possible, as suggested by the German memorandum, to alter the present regulations. This will be effected through an ordinance of the High Commission. The freedom of communication by letters, telegrams, and telephones between the occupied and unoccupied districts will be restored under a general reservation of the rights of the High Commission, or of the consequences of the state of siege, if this should be proclaimed.

22. As the state of siege is a function directly concerning the security of the army, the obligation of consulting with the National Commissioner in all cases, and especially in urgent cases, cannot be assumed. It is a matter of course that the allied and associated Governments, which count upon the loyal co-operation of the German authorities, will not fail to consult them in every case, when the circumstances permit it.

24. Ordinances of the different military offices: As a matter of principle and in accord with the request expressed in the German memorandum, it is the intention of the allied and associated authorities to annul the various ordinances issued by the military offices of the occupying forces for the period of the armistice after the treaty of peace shall have become effective; nevertheless, it is the exclusive task of the High Commission to arrange the necessary transitional regulations. The High Commission will announce the abolition or modification of these regulations through an ordinance. This ordinance will be issued as soon as possible after the treaty has gone into effect.

25. Expulsions: The orders forbidding residence in the occupied territory have been issued for reasons involving the maintenance of public security and for the purpose of making the regulations legally laid down during the armistice by the military authorities of the allied and associated Governments respected. It cannot be admitted that the expelled persons may return to their homes merely because of the fact that the Peace Treaty has gone into effect. Those who wish to return will have to apply to the High Commission, which will examine each individual case in a spirit of reconciliation.

26. Jurisdiction: Reference is made to the observations above to Paragraphs 9, 10, and 11 of the German memorandum.

27. Administrative districts: The agreement provides that the local German administrations, as well as the administrations of the districts and provinces, shall retain their legal competence.

28. Sovereignty of the Federal State Governments: It is absolutely impossible to agree with the proposal contained in this paragraph, i. e., that the expression "under the sovereignty of the Central German Government" be explained to mean "under the sovereignty of the Central German Government and of the Governments of the German Federal States."

Article 3 of the agreement, which forms an annex to the Peace Treaty, leaves no room for a more far-reaching interpretation. Of course the legal division of authority will be respected, but it is impossible for the allied and associated Governments, which have concluded peace with the Central German Government, and which have no intention of meddling with the internal organization of Germany, to sustain by force the organization of States whose possible alterations are provided for by the Constitution itself. So, as has been said above in connection with paragraph 5 regarding the "establishment of a national commission," the allied and associated Governments cannot, without violating international law, embody anything in the text obligating themselves to maintain the internal organization and legislation which the German population might see themselves induced to change.

29. Officials: As is observed in the German memorandum, after the Peace Treaty becomes effective there will be no more agents charged with the supervision of the German authorities in the circles, &c. But the High Commission has the power, in the interest of the population, to maintain permanent representatives, charged with the work of establishing connections between the local German administrations, the local military authorities, and the High Commission itself. Regarding the officials, the German memorandum recognizes the right of the High Commission to recall them. Hence it follows that the High Commission has the option of not agreeing to the appointment of officials whose presence might cause disturbances.

30. Instruction: The public instruction constitutes, as is noted in the German memorandum, a constituent part of the German civic administration and will be guided by German laws. Therefore, the German Government has no occasion to fear that instruction in foreign languages will be introduced by order of the occupying powers.

31. Legislation: This question has been handled above in connection with Paragraph 3 of the German memorandum.

32. Collections: The German Government requests that the exercise of the right of making forced collections (Beitreibung) be restricted as much as possible. The allied and associated Governments are fully in accord with the German Government in the opinion that collections are rarely to be made and are to be justified by special circumstances. In this connection the High Commission will be able to listen to all observations made to it, and it will issue a regulation in the spirit of fairness and reconciliation. Nevertheless, it is not possible to accede to the request presented in the German memorandum at the end of this paragraph, i. e., that the collection is only to be made through the National Commissioner.

33. Distribution of troops and quartering: The distribution of the troops and the examination of the questions relating to the quartering of the officers and their families will be made the object of a thorough examination by the commission. The result will be communicated shortly.

All the previous observations are composed under reservation of the rights given to the High Commission, of the possibility of declaring a state of siege, and of the exact carrying out of the terms of the Peace Treaty by Germany.

PASSPORT REGULATIONS

Following a conference of the Inter-allied Commissioners at Wiesbaden, definite regulations for governing the movement of Germans and others between occupied and unoccupied Germany were made public in Berlin. As found in the Koelnische Zeitung of Aug. 20, these regulations are as follows:

1. Germans, or other former enemies, and neutrals living in unoccupied Germany, will be permitted to enter the occupied territory upon presentation of a German passport provided with a visé by the allied military authorities of the Army of Occupation.

2. Citizens of the allied powers may enter occupied Germany with a permit issued by the military authorities of the Allies at the point where they enter, and, with a visé, by the German civil authorities.

3. Germans, or other foreign enemies, and neutrals who wish to go from occupied into unoccupied Germany need nothing but a permit from the military authorities of the Army of Occupation.

4. Passport bureaus are to be established on both sides of the frontier. They will be under the military control of the allied army in occupied Germany and under civilian control in the unoccupied districts. It is planned to set up such bureaus in the following cities: In occupied Germany at Neuss in the Belgian zone, at Cologne in the British zone, at Coblenz in the American zone, and at Ludwigshafen, Mayen and Landau in the French zone; in unoccupied Germany at Düsseldorf for the Belgian and British zones; at Limburg for the American zone, and at Karlsruhe, Frankfurt and Mannheim for the French zone.

5. For the purpose of delivering passports an automobile service will be established between the corresponding bureaus in occupied and unoccupied Germany.

6. Members of the German army in active service must wear civilian clothing when entering occupied Germany.

7. Personal permits good for three months will be issued to deputies from the occupied districts. Temporary special permits are to be issued to German civilian officials who enter occupied Germany in the exercise of their functions. Through the instrumentality of the Armistice Commission steps will be taken at once to announce the date for the establishment of the civilian pass bureaus in unoccupied Germany.

German Property in the Allied Countries

Berlin to Reimburse Its Own Nationals

ACCORDING to the terms of the Peace Treaty, the method of dealing with property belonging to German nationals in allied countries and debts incurred between allied and German nationals was defined as follows:

Two Clearing Houses are to be established in either country for the settlement of debts, to be known respectively as the Creditor Clearing House and the Debtor Clearing House, provided that within one month after the deposit of ratification of the treaty Great Britain (or another allied country) give Germany notice of its intention to adopt this scheme.

The Creditor Clearing House will ascertain and give notice to the Debtor Clearing House of all debts claimed by the respective nationals, and in common with this supplementary organization reach an agreement on the exact amount due. Dispute is to be settled by (a) arbitration, (b) the decision of a mixed tribunal, composed of a representative of each Government and a third member selected by agreement who is to act as President; in case of disagreement this third member is to be selected by the President of the Swiss Confederation; (c) at the instance of the Creditor Clearing Office the dispute may be referred to the courts of the place of domicile of the debtor; thus, if the British Creditor Office claims a sum as being due from a German national in the German Debtor Clearing Office, the amount due will be determined by the German courts. Conversely, if the German Creditor Clearing Office claims on behalf of a German national a sum due from an allied national through the allied Debtor Clearing Office, then the question of the amount due will be determined by the allied courts. Where the respective nationals were solvent at the date when the debts were incurred, the Governments of the allied national and Germany respectively undertake to see that such debts are duly paid and they are vested with the right of obtaining the amount due from their respective nationals.

Where this scheme is adopted there is no other method by which creditors can obtain payment of their debts except through the Clearing Office scheme. Each month a balance is to be struck, and where the balance is in favor of the allied national the Germans must pay over through their Clearing Office the amount shown due to such creditors. Where, however, the balance is shown due to German nationals, then the amount of such balance is to be retained by the allied Clearing Office until complete payment has been effected of the sums due to that country and its nationals on account of the war.

Germany undertakes to compensate its nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property rights or interest in allied States, and in that way the doctrine of the inviolability of private property is preserved.

The effect of the treaty is to appropriate toward the indemnification of allied subjects all property rights and interest and all debts owing to Germans by allied subjects, and that in so far as there is any balance over, such balance will be applied in satisfying pro tanto the indebtedness of Germany to the respective allied country on account of claims of its nationals for reparation.

These principles will be applied through all British colonies and throughout the territories of every allied and associated power. German nationals will, as a consequence, be stripped of all their wealth, whether in the shape of property rights or interests, or of debts due to them, and their only remedy will be against their Government, from whom they can claim compensation for property rights and interests, and probably also for debts. Such property can only be restored to its rightful owners by the German Government taxing its subjects generally—that is to say, by making all its subjects contribute on an equitable basis to the loss sustained by the particular subjects whose property has been appropriated by the Allies.

Valuable privileges are also conferred on the Allies in connection with trade marks and secret processes. Where such were used in connection with a subsidiary company operating in an allied country, although the product of German brains, the subsidiary company, which will have expelled all German interests, is to have the exclusive use of such trade marks and processes in all countries other than Germany itself, and the right of Germany to make use of such inventions outside its own territory is expressly prohibited.

Stages of the German Collapse

History of the Peace Offer

THE German White Book published at Weimar on July 31, 1919, contains all official documents relating to the period from Aug. 13 to Nov. 11, 1918, in so far as they refer to the peace offer of Oct. 3 and the armistice agreement of Nov. 11. The German Government says in the preface that it has decided on the publication of all the material because the people wanted to know the truth.

The council of Aug. 14, under the Presidency of the Kaiser, was the beginning of the peace action. Whereas in the middle of July General Ludendorff had maintained that the enemy would be definitely and decisively defeated in the offensive then proceeding, it was now assumed to be impossible to win the war militarily. But the Kaiser decided to await an opportune moment to try to come to an understanding with the enemy through neutral mediation, which moment, in the Chancellor's words, would be the moment of the next German success in the west.

On Sept. 3 Count Hertling, in the Prussian Cabinet, rejected the idea of an immediate peace offer, and when Austria, notwithstanding Germany's opposition, issued a direct appeal to the belligerents, Germany decided still to adhere to neutral mediation, which, however, failed in its purpose.

Then came Bulgaria's collapse, and on Sept. 21 the idea of a direct appeal to America appears in the documents for the first time. A few days later the Foreign Office was ordered to communicate this proposal to Turkey, and if Turkey agreed the new Government which was being formed in Germany was to dispatch a peace offer to President Wilson, "so that the proposal would emanate from a new Government."

Admiral von Hintze's communication adds: The peace action then entered upon a new phase. Changing its attitude, the Supreme Army Command requested the urgent dispatch of the peace offer owing to the acute danger of the military situation. Quite a number of telegrams and telephone messages from Main Army Headquarters reached Berlin on Oct. 1 to the effect that a breakthrough might occur at any moment. In the evening of the same day General Ludendorff declared that the army could not wait another forty-eight hours. Prince Max of Baden, however, offered energetic objections to such peace action being taken at a moment of military distress, and he records this in his report of Oct. 11, in which he remarks incidentally, "The Chancellorship was offered to me on the evening of Oct. 3 along with a request that I should immediately ask President Wilson for his peace mediation."

On the evening of Oct. 2 General Ludendorff telephoned to Berlin the draft of a note to America, which in its main features accorded with the note subsequently dispatched. On Oct. 3 Prince Max asked Main Army Headquarters whether they were aware that a peace action under pressure of military distress involved the loss of the German colonies and German territory, especially Alsace-Lorraine and parts of Poland. Marshal von Hindenburg replied that the Army Command insisted on its demand for an immediate offer of peace. Under this pressure, the White Book says, the note to America was dispatched on the night of Oct. 3. On Oct. 6 Prince Max declared that he considered the dispatch of the note premature, and added, "We must now find out how things are at the front."

The idea of Prince Max and the Secretaries of State obviously was that General Ludendorff, owing to his nervous breakdown, had come to an exaggerated conclusion as regards the situation at the front. The result was a conflict with the Supreme Army Command which ran right through all the negotiations till Oct. 26. Dr. Rathenau's plan of a levée en masse was discussed, but rejected.

Following President Wilson's reply on Oct. 5, General Ludendorff at a conference held on Oct. 9 represented that Germany was not obliged to accept all the demands, but he gave only vague replies to the question of how long the army could hold out. On President Wilson's second reply, on Oct. 15, opposition broke forth on all sides in the army. The Supreme Command wanted to break off the peace attempts.

The rejection of the armistice, the White Book adds, was impossible. Since the Allies had agreed to President Wilson's Fourteen Points as the basis of peace, the German people considered the war as terminated. Wherever an attempt to delay the conclusion of the armistice was suspected the troops rose up against it. All differences with the Supreme Army Command were dropped. On Nov. 11 the armistice came into force.

COUNT CZERNIN'S PREMONITIONS

The Austro-Hungarian Premier, Count Czernin, had forecast the coming collapse of the Central Powers many months before Ludendorff and the German military leaders had admitted its possibility. Among the numerous revelations published in the German press in August, 1919, was a confidential report made by Count Czernin to Emperor Charles on April 12, 1917, in which he said:

It is perfectly clear that our military strength is approaching its end. * * * I need only point to the decline in raw material for the production of munitions, to the completely exhausted human material, and, above all, to the dull despair, mainly due to underfeeding, that has overpowered all classes of people and renders it impossible for them to bear the sufferings of war much longer.

Although I hope that we shall succeed in holding out during the next few months and pursue a successful defensive, I am perfectly clear that another Winter campaign is entirely out of the question—in other words, that an end must be made at all costs in the late Summer or in the Autumn. It is certainly most important that peace negotiations should begin at a moment when our fading strength has not become apparent to the enemy. * * *

Painful as it is to me, I cannot ignore the theme that gives force to my entire argument. It is the revolutionary danger that is rising on the horizon of all Europe. * * * The astonishing ease with which the most powerful monarchy has just been overthrown may help to produce serious reflection. Let no one reply that things are different in Germany or Austria-Hungary. Let no one reply that the firm roots of the monarchical idea in Berlin or Vienna exclude such an event. This war has begun a new era in the history of the world; * * * the world is not the same as it was three years ago. The statesman who is not blind or deaf must surely realize the dull anger that rages among the broad masses. * * *

Hungary in the Grip of Rumania

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 15, 1919]

THE disputed question as to who was responsible for the setting up of the Government of Archduke Joseph in Budapest was clarified to some extent by an official British statement issued in Paris on Aug. 22, which declared not only that the Archduke, on exposing his plan of effecting a coup d'état to the British military representative, General Gordon, received no sanction of this project, but that General Gordon and Colonel Causey, the American representative, went to the Rumanian commander, General Holban, and obtained from him a guarantee that the Peidl Cabinet would be protected. The inference from the ensuing forcible expulsion of this Cabinet—that the Austrian Archduke effected his coup d'état with the approval of the Rumanian Army—was confirmed by statements made by Herbert Hoover on his return to Paris from Budapest, in which he categorically charged that the arrest of the Peidl Cabinet while in session was supported by Rumanian guns trained on the windows of the Ministry in Parliament Square.

Soon after the establishment of the Archduke's dictatorship it was reported from Budapest that 7,000 men and women, including former Ministers Garbai and Janosek, had been arrested as a result of anti-Bolshevist raids made by the Rumanians, assisted by the new Hungarian police force. Many aristocrats personally aided in ferreting out the Bolsheviki. The reciprocal exchange between Rumania and Hungary of all hostages up to the age of 14 recommended by the Swiss Red Cross was agreed upon. Austria, in reply to a request for extradition of refugee Hungarian Communists, had declared that these men were being carefully watched, and that extradition was not necessary. The body of Tibor Szamuely, a member of the former governing triumvirate in Budapest, had been exhumed at the frontier, and the head sent to the capital to determine whether Szamuely had been murdered or had committed suicide. The President of the Interallied Danube Commission had arrived to organize transportation on the Danube and to free the river of mines laid by the Government of Bela Kun. Several British monitors and two patrol boats arrived on Aug. 13 to guard Danube shipping, and their crews received a joyful welcome from the Hungarian populace.

A "DILEMMA" CABINET

The new Cabinet appointed by Archduke Joseph on Aug. 16 included Stephen Friedrich as Premier, Martin Lovassy as Foreign Minister, and Baron Sigismund Perenyi as Minister of the Interior. Three portfolios were reserved for Socialists; the latter, however, headed by Paul Garami, announced that they would refuse to enter the Government of Herr Friedrich unless Archduke Joseph abandoned the regency. The latter's attitude was voiced by Herr Friedrich on announcing the formation of the new Cabinet in the following words: "Archduke Joseph makes no promises now, as his withdrawal would lead to civil war."

Vienna dispatches to Berlin newspapers on Aug. 16 characterized the new Government as a "dilemma makeshift." In Paris on the same date there was not the slightest intimation that the Supreme Council would reply to the Archduke's message announcing that he was head of the new Hungarian Government, and hope was semi-officially expressed that the Archduke's Government would fall of its own weakness. Efforts made by Austrian dignitaries to induce the former Austrian Emperor to take a more active part in Austrian affairs had failed, but the publication of a letter purporting to have been written by Charles to the Archduke, deputing the latter to hold power in Hungary pending the former's return, had made the position of the Archduke more precarious.

MR. HOOVER TAKES A HAND

The last of the families housed in the Archducal palace on Castle Hill by the Communists moved out on Aug. 16. In a desk in the palace the Archduke found 50,000,000 crowns abandoned by the Communists in their hurried flight from Budapest. At this date the Archduke agreed to resign as temporary dictator because of the Socialists' objection to him, but consented to remain as Governor of Hungary temporarily under pressure of certain peasant and reactionary leaders. The Rumanians had begun to co-operate with the Hungarians to re-establish transportation facilities, in order that Budapest might be adequately fed. The food situation showed some improvement. The arbitrary actions of the Rumanian commanders occupying Budapest, however, especially in the matter of requisitioning food and other supplies, continued, and were bitterly denounced by Herbert Hoover on his return to Paris on Aug. 21.

Mr. Hoover stated both to the Supreme Council and to American correspondents that decisive diplomatic action should be taken at once to displace Archduke Joseph as head of the Hungarian Government, and to give Hungary a chance to establish a popular Government. The new countries of Central Europe, he declared, were being terrorized by the tolerance shown toward the setting up of a Hapsburg Government in Hungary. He intimated that the Archduke's Government could be forced to resign within five days by the taking of a firm stand. The Rumanians, he declared, were still requisitioning Hungarian food. On Aug. 21 the Rumanians, under the eyes of American officers, had seized eight truckloads of medical supplies and food destined for the children's hospitals of Budapest, in defiance of the warnings of the Supreme Council, necessitating the performance of operations without anasthetics; the cutting off of milk supplies had caused the death of eighteen babies in a single day. Filled with wrath over this situation, Mr. Hoover called for immediate and decisive action.

ALLIES FORCE RESIGNATION

Partly as a consequence of the convinced and aggressive attitude of Mr. Hoover and of the revelations made by him, the Supreme Council drew up and dispatched an ultimatum to Archduke Joseph, demanding that he resign. This ultimatum was delivered by the allied Military Mission in Budapest on Aug. 20, together with a letter announcing that the mission would give the Archduke two hours to take this action. Otherwise, he was notified, the mission would publish the council's telegram broadcast. At 8 o'clock Saturday night, Aug. 20, Premier Friedrich notified the mission that Archduke Joseph and the other members of the Government under him had resigned.

Premier Friedrich, after receiving a request from the mission to manage affairs until a new Cabinet could be formed, declared that a new Ministry would be formed within three days, and that three seats in the new Government would be given to Socialists. Premier Friedrich then bade farewell to Archduke Joseph, thanking him for the services he had rendered. Deeply moved, the Archduke replied that his activities deserved no thanks; he was proud that he could be of some help to his beloved country. He retired, he said, with a serene conscience and the conviction that he had done his duty to his country.

The Allies had thus triumphed in the matter of the reactionary Government of the Hungarian Archduke. But the vexed question of the Rumanian occupation still remained to perplex the council. On Aug. 23 the Supreme Council approved the note drafted by the Reparations Committee, warning the Rumanian Government that retaliatory action would be taken if the Rumanian army in Budapest continued to make requisitions. The note was signed by Premier Clemenceau and forwarded to Bucharest. Referring to reliable information that large supplies of foodstuffs, farming machinery and other materials were being sent into Rumania, the note stated that all goods taken in Hungary would be deducted from the indemnity accruing to Rumania.

Premier Clemenceau on Aug. 29 moved that a peremptory order be dispatched to the Rumanian Government forbidding it to continue the removal of material from Hungary. The Italian Foreign Minister, Tittoni, however, reminded the conference that its previous message to the Rumanians had only reached Bucharest the day before, and that the Rumanian Government had had no time to examine and reply to it. Further action, consequently, was held in abeyance.

FRIEDRICH CABINET RESIGNS

Meanwhile intimations were received that considerable hostility to the temporary power of Premier Friedrich had developed in Budapest, on the ground that he was more reactionary than the Archduke, and that a new Cabinet had been formed in opposition, headed by Franz Heinrich, a wholesale hardware dealer and business man of Budapest. Friedrich showed an obstinate determination to retain power, but the opposition pressure increased, and on Sept. 1 the Government of Herr Friedrich resigned en bloc. It was stated at this time that it would be succeeded by the Ministry formed by Heinrich, which included Jules Peidl, the former Premier; Paul Garami, Minister of Justice in the Peidl Cabinet; Karl Payer, former Minister of Home Affairs; Martin Lovassy, Foreign Minister in the first Friedrich Cabinet, and Stephen Szabo, Minister of Small Farmers in the existing Friedrich Ministry.

Certain conditions were attached to the resignation of the Friedrich Cabinet. The Entente, it was declared, must recognize and negotiate with the new Government as representing the constituted authority of Hungary, and permit it to organize a new army and police force. It was likewise stipulated that the Rumanians should gradually leave the country, and should discontinue, meanwhile, such acts as disarming Hungarian officers and requisitioning supplies.

Ten days after the dispatch of the allied note to the Rumanians demanding that such requisitions cease, the lootings complained of were still continuing, and all the notes and radio-telegrams sent by the Supreme Council had been utterly ignored. Time limits, conceded because of the report that telegraph wires had been blown down, and that the difficulties of communication were admittedly great, had passed all reasonable bounds. The council was also disturbed by reports of a possibility that Rumania, defying and ignoring the council, might seek to conclude a separate peace with Hungary. On Sept. 3, in view of these and other considerations, the Supreme Council decided to send an ultimatum to the Rumanian Government regarding its acts in Hungary. The envoy chosen to bring the message to Bucharest was Sir George R. Clerk of the British Foreign Office. Couched in firm but cordial language, the allied note recalled to the Rumanian Cabinet the engagements it had entered into, and set forth the necessity of their being kept. The text of the communication was not officially given out. On his departure from Paris on Sept. 7 this envoy bore with him seventy-five radiograms which had been sent from Paris by the council, but which the Rumanian Government declared had never been received.

RUMANIAN PROBLEM ACUTE

On Sept. 5, however, J. J. C. Bratiano, Rumanian Premier, advised Nicholas Misu, Rumanian representative in Paris, of the receipt of the latter's dispatch advising him that the Supreme Council had prohibited shipment of arms and war material from Hungary to Rumania. M. Bratiano's telegram declared that notes sent to Bucharest by the Supreme Council had not been received, and asked M. Misu especially to call the attention of the Supreme Council to "the dangerous and pernicious character of the policy it has adopted toward Rumania." The telegram continued as follows:

The Rumanian Government is absolutely convinced that in destroying Bolshevism in Hungary it has rendered eminent service to the allied cause. As a consequence of the conditions imposed upon Rumania, without taking account of her sacrifices of men and materials, the Rumanian Government may be obliged to consider the advantages of withdrawing her troops across the Dvina, in Southern Russia, and declining all responsibility for the chaos to which that part of Europe may be reduced by the dissensions of the Bolsheviks, Royalists, and Reactionaries.

GOODS SEIZED BY RUMANIANS

Later news from Budapest stated that the Szolnok Bridge across the Tisza had been repaired, and that 6,000 Hungarian freight cars laden with material seized by the Rumanians had already crossed this bridge and were en route to Rumania. General Mardaresco, commanding the Rumanian troops occupying Budapest, was reported to have received orders to evacuate the Hungarian capital and to withdraw behind the Tisza River. It was stated at this time that most of the Rumanian troops which had been occupying Hungary would be rushed to the Banat of Temesvar, in which region hostilities between the Serbs and Rumanians were imminent. The British Admiral Trowbridge, meanwhile, with ships at Budapest, was prepared if necessary to take naval action against the Rumanians.

The Rumanian Bureau at Berne stated on Sept. 6 that the Rumanian troops, after their entry into Budapest, discovered 270 bodies of victims of the Communists under the Parliament Building. Among champagne bottles in a factory sixty more bodies were discovered, while in a Catholic monastery eighty priests were found who had been imprisoned and starved to death. The worst case of Bolshevik brutality, said this report, was that of a Magyar priest and orator named Hoch, who was found crucified before his church. All these crimes were committed on written orders of the notorious Tibor Szamuely.

Poland and the Silesian Conflict

Germans and Poles at War in Disputed Province

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 15, 1919]

THE outstanding feature of the events in Poland during the month was the armed clash between the Germans and the Poles in Upper Silesia, which began on Aug. 18 and continued into September. In the Silesian district, whose essential industry is coal mining and where the mine-owning class is made up almost wholly of Germans, the Polish element representing the miners, a lockout in a single mine precipitated a general mining strike which had been brewing for some months. The workers in other mines were at once called out, and numerous armed conflicts occurred between the Germans and Poles, intensified by mutual hatred, due to the possibilities of the coming plebiscite decreed by the Treaty of Versailles.

The German method of repression, according to dispatches, was ruthless; many Poles were arrested and executed, others badly beaten; the wounded were allowed to die in preference to calling in doctors, who, by examination, would learn of what had occurred; wives and families of Polish "insurrectionists" who had fled across the frontier were deported in gangs. Meanwhile some 100,000 Polish nationals massed at the frontier could with difficulty be restrained from crossing the boundary line and going, arms in hand, to the aid of their mistreated compatriots in Silesia.

To complicate the situation, the Polish delegates negotiating with the Germans in Berlin over the boundaries of the disputed territory broke off all discussions quite unexpectedly, on the ground of a state of civil war in Silesia. The next day, however, (Aug. 21,) the following resolutions were adopted at a conference of the German and Polish Commissioners attended by Herr Noske, Minister of Defense, and the French representative General Dupont:

1. The Germans will refrain from further executions.
2. The interallied mission shall start for Upper Silesia on Aug. 22.
3. The Polish mission now in Berlin will go to Warsaw and remain there until the interallied mission has made a report on the situation in Upper Silesia.

ALLIED COMMISSION DISPATCHED

On the same date the Allied Council, alarmed by the ominous trend of events in Silesia, one of the great coaling purveyors of Central Europe, and by the possibility that the Central European railway systems would be tied up because of lack of coal, decided to send the Interallied Commission referred to in the resolution cited above, with members from at least four powers, to study and control the dangerous situation in Silesia pending the taking of the popular vote. The possibility that each of the main allied powers might send troops to maintain order in the disaffected province until after the plebiscite was seriously considered.

On Aug. 25 Germany officially declined such intervention until the expiration of the fifteen days following the plebiscite prescribed by the terms of the Peace Treaty. Allied occupation, however, was foreshadowed by General Dupont, representing France, on Sept. 9. Protest was made in the United States Senate on Aug. 27 against American participation in such a policing project. Fighting at this time was still continuing in Silesia. In food riots that occurred on Sept. 10 some ten persons were killed by machine guns turned by the German authorities on the protesting populace.

The dispute between Poland and Czechoslovakia over possession of the Teschen coal mine district, a quarrel that had long vexed the Peace Conference, and which the Czechs and Poles seemed to be unable to settle for themselves, despite negotiations lasting through many months, was brought one step nearer solution by the agreement reached in Paris on Sept. 11 between the Polish and Czechoslovak delegates to refer the disputed territory to a plebiscite. This decision was taken to mean in Paris that the district would go to Poland, inasmuch as the majority of the people in this region are Polish.

Food conditions in Poland continued to be deplorable. The country was overrun with homeless refugees, moving about in freight cars and subsisting on charity. The city of Minsk was captured from the Bolsheviks early in August, and was thus saved from starvation, as the Bolsheviks had been about to requisition the crops of that region. Herbert Hoover ended his investigations in Warsaw on Aug. 14. On that date men and women representing the Socialist Party in Poland, accompanied by the Minister of Labor, called upon Mr. Hoover and presented him with a memorial expressing Poland's gratitude to America for her aid in sending food and supplies. Before his departure Mr. Hoover reviewed a parade of 5,000 Polish children, representative of the million fed by the American Relief Administration.

MR. HOOVER ON POLAND

The whole situation in Poland was graphically described by Mr. Hoover when he returned to the United States on Sept. 13. Urging the necessity of immediate ratification of the Peace Treaty, he said:

Consider one single instance out of the eighteen countries that could be cited in Europe—the instance of Poland. Here is a Government, spread over 35,000,000 people, now only six months old, a country devastated by famine and destruction. A third of their land is out of cultivation because their agricultural implements have been destroyed. Their people are cold and underclad.

These people have been under repression for a century to the extent that there is scarcely a living Pole with experience in government. Yet these people have put down Bolshevism. They have restored order. They have established all the normal functions of democratic government. They have an organized and disciplined army.

We have taken the lead in all the world in demanding the restoration of the independence of Poland and we have some moral responsibility in this matter. What do we find this new Government struggling against? First, they are holding a line 1,500 miles long against the Russian Bolsheviks. In this service they are the outposts of civilization. It is a service they must perform for the rest of the world.

They have even greater burdens. The German Army is gradually pulling itself together in discipline and reorganization. It has certainly an effective body of 400,000 men under arms with large equipment. It has a large number of troops massed in Silesia. These troops are persecuting the Poles to influence the conditions under which the plebiscite is to be taken that will determine whether their territory goes to Poland. Nothing can be done until peace is complete. * * * When I left Europe the Germans were busy hauling the entire harvest out of this section into Germany, and there is no possibility of intervention until peace.

REHABILITATION MARKING TIME

The boundary lines between Poland and Czechoslovakia and Poland and Lithuania are not to be determined until after peace is ratified. There is a good deal of friction along these lines and this has demoralized coal production in that area until railway services are being suspended for lack of fuel.

Again, the Peace Treaty calls for the division of the railway rolling stock and the river craft in Europe. This cannot take place until after the ratification. In the meantime, every State is holding its material with the hope of keeping it. The result is that traffic between States is fearfully impeded.

Again, until peace, Poland has no outlet to the sea except through German territory, and the Germans do not facilitate traffic. The treaty provides that Danzig is to become a free port under the League of Nations. The Germans are refusing to feed Danzig because they do not wish to exhaust their foodstuffs on a city that will become non-German. The only way Danzig is being fed is by draining the slender food resources of Poland.

With all these pressures, it is impossible for Poland to arrange foreign loans. She is unable to provide raw material; her textile mills are idle and her people are in rags. There can be no hope of rehabilitating economic life and of assuring the political independence or stability of these people until peace is completed. This is typical of fifteen other States in Europe. The whole economic and political life is in a state of suspension that in many particulars is even more disastrous than war.

Charges that the Germans, in their evacuation of Lithuania, were sacking the country, stripping the towns, houses, farms, removing metal door knobs, window glass, furniture, bedding, beds, horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, knives, forks, machinery, sawed lumber, motors, wires, fruits, grains, and that they were even desecrating the coffins of the dead near Kovno, were made by Thomas Nareuchevitch, a well-known engineer and member of the Lithuanian delegation to the Peace Conference, who returned from a tour of Lithuania on Aug. 19.

The Polish Diet sitting in Warsaw on Aug. 5 voted unanimously the breaking up of all landed estates exceeding from 750 to 1,000 acres of land.

Under the agreement concluded between the Petlura Government of Ukraine and Poland, according to a Moscow wireless of Aug. 29, the former renounced all claims to Eastern Galicia, and Poland undertook not to enter territory occupied by the Petlura troops: both Governments were to combine military operations against the Bolsheviki.

An official announcement was made by the Polish Consulate in New York on Aug. 29 to the effect that Prince Casimir Lubomirski, who was at the head of the State Council in Poland during the German régime, was on his way to Washington with a legation to take up his duties as Polish Ambassador to the United States. In the official party was Francis Pulaski, a grandson of General Pulaski of American Revolutionary fame, who is to set as First Secretary for the legation.

Paderewski, who stands as the symbol of all that Poland has fought for, will be the commanding figure in the monument which the natives of Poland in this country are to erect in Warsaw to commemorate the rebirth of the Polish Nation. Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor, is now working on the sketches. The figures for the monument will be taken from life and will include those prominent here and abroad in obtaining Poland's freedom. Mr. Borglum said:

The statue is to embody all the heroism and ideals of Paderewski, the truly great figure of the great war, and it is to be made the commanding object of the new Warsaw. All the other figures, important as they may be, will give place to this towering personality, whose impulse has been the cleanest in the world.

Paderewski is the one man of the present time who has not been governed by the military class, the capitalist, or anything sordid. Today he stands triumphant—the symbol of the practical accomplishment of ideals. He is as near the Utopian figure as you can get and stands unswervingly for principle and justice. * * * During the Winter I will go to Warsaw to complete the plans for the monument.

Russia's Struggle With Bolshevism

Withdrawal of British Forces From Archangel and Increasing Gains by the Soviet Government

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 15, 1919]

THE fluctuation in the struggle of anti-Bolshevist Russia against the Soviet Government continued throughout August and September, with a general trend in favor of the Reds. A new Government was formed at Reval on Aug. 10, at which General Marsh, on behalf of the allied and associated powers, convened a meeting of Russian political notabilities of all parties, pointing out that the position of the Russian Army was critical, and that it was essential that the Russians should form a democratic Government capable of undertaking the administration of the northwestern provinces when freed, and restoring general confidence in the democratic intentions of the Russian leaders. He especially recommended recognition of the independence of Esthonia, as without that recognition the Esthonians refused to move on Petrograd.

The outcome of this meeting was that a new northwest Government was organized, including Pskov, Novgorod, and Petrograd Provinces, under General Judenitch and Premier Lianozov. The new Government at once began to print 350,000,000 rubles in banknotes bearing the signature of General Judenitch to replace interim notes. Large quantities of munitions and supplies were sent to Reval by the British Government; British warships were active in the Baltic, and a powerful British fleet was reported on its way, foreshadowing a coming offensive on Petrograd in combination with the Russian and Esthonian Armies.

In the south, meanwhile, the victories of Denikin and Petlura on the west continued; through Denikin's loss of Kamyshin, however, the possibility of his linking forces with Kolchak's western army was destroyed, and the Bolshevik advance into Siberia continued. Reports that Kolchak had been ousted from Omsk proved false, but on Sept. 12 a Bolshevik wireless announced the capture of 45,000 of Kolchak's men, practically the whole of his southern army in the region of Aktiubinsk.

Meanwhile Ambassador Roland S. Morris, after a thorough investigation of the conditions prevailing under the Kolchak régime, reported favorably on recognition and aid by the United States, and a large loan was being negotiated in London. An interview given by Lenin to a representative of The Associated Press depicted life in Soviet Russia in roseate colors, but reports brought by Norwegian and American investigators developed a very different picture. A war council held in Stockholm by representatives of the new anti-Bolshevistic North Russian Government was joined by the Grand Duke Nicholas, former Commander in Chief of the Russian Armies of the Czar against the Germans, who, after two years' disappearance, had returned as from the dead.

THE NORTHERN FRONT

The North Russian allied army won brilliant successes under General Ironsides on Aug. 5 at Lake Onega. The first news from the Archangel front after Aug. 11, when the municipality of Archangel and the Zemstvos of Archangel Province issued an earnest appeal to the allied nations not to withdraw their troops, came in the form of an official dispatch to the British War Office from General Ironsides, who announced the recapture by Russian and Australian troops of the town of Emptsa, south of Obozerskaya, on the Archangel-Volga front, in which ten guns and 500 prisoners were taken.

On the Petrograd and western front an advance on Petrograd by Russian volunteer forces under General Judenitch, supported by Esthonians, was officially announced on Aug. 15. The Bolsheviki suffered some reverses along the south coast of the Gulf of Finland, and were driven back to the Luga River. Several battalions of Soviet troops were annihilated, and large quantities of supplies captured. Other local engagements of minor importance occurred in this region and east of Pskov.

Naval engagements in the Gulf of Finland on Aug. 18 resulted in the sinking of the Bolshevik battle cruiser Petrovavlovsk and a Bolshevik destroyer by British naval forces. This naval battle was connected with the offensive by General Judenitch referred to above, and coincided with the arrival at Reval, where the new Government for Northwest Russia was being formed, of a large number of British tanks and quantities of munitions. Following the defeat of the Red squadron and the sinking of the Bolshevik submarine depot ship Viatka, the British warships bombarded Kronstadt, the naval port of Petrograd. The Bolshevik battle cruisers were sunk by coastal motor boats, the smallest and speediest units in the British Navy. The Bolsheviki still possessed three dreadnoughts and other craft in the Baltic. Another bombardment of Kronstadt occurred on Aug. 27. On Aug. 30 the British destroyer Victoria was torpedoed and sunk. A large British squadron passed Königsberg, East Prussia, bound eastward in the direction of Libau, Riga, and the Gulf of Finland on Aug. 31. On Sept. 3 the British destroyer S-19 struck a Russian mine and sank. The Captain and 90 men were saved.

BOLSHEVIKI CAPTURE PSKOV

Pskov, the most important city on the Baltic front, was captured by the Bolsheviki on Aug. 27, after several days of heavy bombardment. The Russian White Guard was pushed back 15 versts. The combined Russian and Esthonian troops showed signs of demoralization, the soldiers declaring that their officers were betraying them to the Bolsheviki. A few days previously Colonel Stojakin, Chief of Staff to General Belakhovitch at Pskov, was found guilty by court-martial of accepting a bribe of 1,000,000 rubles from the Bolsheviki to turn over a part of his line to the Reds. Other officers had deserted to the Bolsheviki. Official reports by the staff of both the Russian and Esthonian armies charged the Bolsheviki with atrocities in the fighting before Pskov. The fall of Pskov was said to have been due to the lack of harmony in the anti-Bolshevist troops, as well as to German intrigues. Peace negotiations between the Esthonian and Bolshevik Governments began in Pskov on Sept. 10. The Bolshevik envoys at Reval had offered to recognize Esthonian independence under certain conditions.

BRITISH WITHDRAWAL

The British troops in North Russia were being gradually withdrawn during the first half of September, and it was conceded that the experiment in that region had proved a failure. Major Gen. Sir Frederick B. Maurice, a London military expert, summed up the case in these words on Sept. 11:

The prime object of the Archangel adventure was to form a nucleus round which the anti-Bolshevist elements in North Russia would rally. It is well known that the British had in the Spring of this year an ambitious program and that it was hoped to organize an army largely composed of Russian troops, which would be able to advance toward Petrograd from the north along and to the east of the Vologda Railway, effect a junction with Kolchak's right, and establish a sure barrier against Bolshevism in the north. It was hoped also to organize a combined advance against Petrograd from the west by uniting the Finns, Letts, and Esthonians and furnishing them with British money and material.

All these plans have broken down from one and the same cause—the incompetence of the various anti-Bolshevist forces which have been supported and the impossibility of organizing any effective military forces from the elements which the British have tried to rally around them. The policy of attempting to set them on their legs has broken down, and as regards Archangel the only result of allied interference is likely to be that the last state of that part of Russia will be worse than the first.

A statement published on Sept. 12 by order of Winston Churchill, British War

SCENE OF THE CHIEF OPERATIONS OF GENERAL DENIKIN AND OTHER ANTI-BOLSHEVIST LEADERS IN RUSSIA

Secretary, said concerning the withdrawal:

General Lord Rawlinson has been placed in supreme command of the British forces both in the Archangel and the Murmansk regions, has been supplied with everything he has asked for, and has been accorded the fullest discretionary power as to the time and method of evacuation. There is no reason to suppose he will not succeed in his task at an early date. At the same time the peculiar difficulty of the operation of withdrawal must be realized.

The Russian national forces both at Archangel and Murmansk are much more numerous than the British. The forces of the enemy on those fronts may well be equal to the British and National Russians combined. The attitude of the National Russians as well as that of the civil population must inevitably be affected by the impending British withdrawal and by the fact that after we are gone they will be left to continue the struggle alone. Thus the task of extricating the British troops, while doing the least possible injury to the chances of the Russian National forces, is one of great complexity.

Further, his Majesty's Government have considered it their duty to offer means of refuge to all those Russians who, having compromised themselves by helping us since we landed in North Russia, might now, otherwise, find themselves exposed to Bolshevik vengeance. Considerable numbers of persons, including women and children, in addition to the British troops, have therefore to be evacuated by sea. Yet all the time the front has to be maintained largely by Russian troops against an enemy who is well informed of all that is taking place.

Mr. Churchill added that the decision to evacuate Archangel and Murmansk had been reached last February on the advice of the General Staff, but when Admiral Kolchak's advance offered new hope of success General William E. Ironsides had been instructed, with the approval of the Cabinet, to prepare a plan for the junction of the British and Kolchak forces. But by September the Kolchak armies had been driven so far back that all hope of such a junction was abandoned, and the British Government was compelled to return to "the difficult and painful alternative" of evacuation.

GERMAN-BALTIC SITUATION

A complication in the Baltic provinces was the continued presence of the German troops of General von der Goltz, who had refused to evacuate. Various German papers extenuated the refusal of these German Baltic troops to leave Russia, but Vorwärts, which is a Government organ, declared that the German Baltic policy showed political intrigue and was "all wrong." The initial mistake was made, it asserted, when the Baltic junkers were allowed to raise a volunteer army for the defense of the Baltic provinces. This army was recruited simultaneously with the imperial army, and the junkers were using their troops for purposes which did not harmonize with the interests of the German Government. The advantage of retaining possession of the Baltic lands was openly admitted by the German press, the Berliner Tageblatt advising the evacuation only because of the possibility of civil war. A secret army order issued by von der Goltz on July 31 and published in Freiheit had advocated combination with the Russian counter-revolutionary armies operating in the Baltic region. All sections of the German press appreciated the dangerous situation engendered by von der Goltz's schemings, and some inveighed against him.

On Aug. 28 reports reaching Paris from Lithuanian sources said that a German army of 40,000 well-equipped troops was concentrating in Lithuania, nominally under command of the Russian General Bergman, but in reality subject to the supreme control of von der Goltz himself. This large force, made up of 37,000 Germans and 3,000 Russians, all in German uniforms, claimed allegiance to the All-Russian Government of Admiral Kolchak, thus exempting themselves from orders issued by Marshal Foch or the Interallied Council. Numerous Russian prisoners were being sent from Germany to join this army at Shavli, while in the way of equipment the Germans had brought 680 airplanes, 100 automobiles, and one armored train into the territory. Although the Lithuanian Government at Kovno had sent many notes to the Germans demanding their withdrawal, and although the allied officials had ordered them out, they had paid no attention to these demands.

General von der Goltz himself, on his return to Mitau from Berlin on Aug. 29, declared to allied representatives that the evacuation would be carried out, but could not be completed before Sept. 1. Meanwhile high-handed proceedings by his troops continued; Lettish headquarters in Mitau were attacked by them, and 50,000 rubles seized; three members of the British Mission to Lithuania in Mitau were arrested by them, but subsequently released. It was alleged that the Germans were also conducting intrigues with the Bolsheviks, who have overrun all territory abandoned by the Germans in the southern part of Lettland.

GERMAN OFFICIAL ATTITUDE

The official attitude of the German Government to all these proceedings was explicitly stated on Sept. 7 in a note addressed by it to the Entente powers. This note expressed regret that the evacuation ordered by the Peace Conference was impossible, owing to the insubordination of the German troops still in Courland. The note continued as follows:

In consequence of the restrictions imposed by the allied Governments Germany is not in a position to compel the obedience of its troops by military means. There is nothing the German Government can do but try by persuasion to bring the troops to reason. As a result of the extremely excited feeling among the men it is impossible now to prepare a plan of evacuation and return the troops to the sea.

On the Lithuanian and Polish fronts some successes against the Bolsheviks were gained. On Sept. 2 the Reds asserted that they had captured the outer fortifications of Dvinsk, on the right bank of the Dvina, where it was crossed by the railway from Petrograd to Warsaw; the Lithuanians, however, declared that the Bolshevik force on that front had been surrounded and had made overtures of peace. An American brigade for service in the Lithuanian Army had been formed of demobilized American officers and discharged enlisted men. The Lithuanian Government had taken steps to protect these men, and to insure them along the lines followed by the American Army's War Insurance Bureau. The American Red Cross had cabled for permission to form a medical and welfare unit to serve with this brigade. Meanwhile Lettish and Lithuanian troops drove the Bolsheviks from Novoalexandrovsk, fifteen miles southwest of Dvinsk, pursuing successes won on Aug. 15, capturing large numbers of prisoners and guns; on Sept. 1 the Poles took the fortified town of Bobruisk, eighty-five miles southeast of Minsk, capturing 500 prisoners, with the aid of tanks, the first they had used in their campaign.

THE SOUTHERN FRONT

According to the observations of General Holman of the British Army, the anti-Bolshevist forces of General Denikin were in great need of equipment, clothing, medical supplies. The population of the Don district was also in great need, especially of British manufactured goods. Poltava, recaptured from the Bolsheviks by Denikin, showed scenes of desolation and ruin. The population had been compelled to do forced labor, as in the times of serfdom; miserable and half starved, they welcomed the forces of Denikin joyously, and prepared a great celebration, including a church parade in the cathedral square of all troops in the garrison.

On Aug. 18 the Bolsheviks were driven from Odessa, the most important port on the Black Sea. At this time the non-Bolshevist Ukrainians were inviting the Poles to help them capture Kiev, in consideration of the delivery to the latter of crops which otherwise the Bolsheviks would seize.

Stories of atrocities inflicted by the Bolsheviks on the population of the Upper Don were received by London on Aug. 21. Continuing their victorious advance, Denikin's forces took Kherson and Nikolaiev, and marched on Kiev. East of Kiev they occupied all the important railway centres as far as the Volga, a distance of 650 miles. Along the Volga they were moving north toward Saratov. Denikin thus gained control of a great section of European Russia, and held the sources of the chief coal and oil supplies. On Aug. 24 it was reported that Petlura had taken the whole of Podolia, large parts of Volhynia, and the Government of Kiev, and that the Ukrainian armies were approaching the Dnieper River along the entire line. The peasants were everywhere rising in support of the Ukrainian anti-Bolshevist forces. By arrangement the Poles had handed over to Petlura the recaptured town of Bovno and two other cities.

Three days later the Bolsheviks gained successes on the Volga in General Denikin's territory. On Aug. 27 they confirmed their reported capture of Kamyshin, 120 miles southwest of Saratov; at this time their forces were advancing toward Tsaritsin, 100 miles further south on the Volga. They admitted, however, that Cossack forces under General Kamentov had broken through their front, and a message from that leader himself stated on Aug. 28 that 13,000 Bolshevik soldiers had been captured, and that a Red regiment had joined his forces, which were marching northward of Tambov.

At this date General Denikin was advancing rapidly and had reached a point within ten miles of Kiev and twelve miles from Petlura's forces. Denikin's cavalry and armored trains were leading an advance to the northeast. On Sept. 4 the occupation of Kiev, after two days of heavy fighting, was officially confirmed. This capture not only threw open the 600-mile road between Lemberg and Kharkov, but also uncovered the most promising base from which operations could be made against Moscow, the Bolshevik capital.

KOLCHAK'S REVERSES

The reverses of the southern army, however, continued, and on Sept. 11 a Bolshevik wireless dispatch announced the capture of 12,000 prisoners from Kolchak's forces in the region of Aktubinsk and Orsk. The next day the capture of the remainder of that army was claimed by the Reds, who declared that they had taken a total of 45,000 men from the Kolchak forces within a week.

The Admiral continued to press his offensive, however, and an official dispatch of Sept. 15 stated that he had broken the Bolshevik front in three places and was threatening to outflank the Red forces advancing from Tobolsk.

The continuance of American forces in Siberia elicited strong protests before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Aug. 23. After listening to a delegation of nine Chicagoans, parents of soldiers on service in Siberia, who urged President Wilson to recall the drafted men at once, the committee decided to summon Secretary of State Lansing and Secretary of War Baker before it to elicit information on the Government's plans for withdrawal. In Washington, two days later, Secretary Baker, in an interview, stated that the 6,500 American troops in Siberia would be recalled before Winter; the next day President Wilson, in a letter made public on that date, gave assurance that the drafted men would be brought home as soon as possible; volunteers, however, would take their place, as the Government had no intention of withdrawing American forces at this time.

IN SOVIET RUSSIA

Under the Bolshevik Government the policy of repression of labor continued through July and August. On Aug. 11 a report of the execution of 150 strike leaders by the Bolshevik authorities was received in Copenhagen. From a report made to the Norwegian Socialists by Mr. Puntervold and Mr. Stang, who had investigated conditions in Soviet Russia, confirmation was received of accounts of bloody conflicts developing out of the insistence of Lenin and Trotzky upon increased production of the civilian and military supplies so sorely needed by their followers. As a logical consequence of this attitude strikes were forbidden by a decree reading in part as follows: "The system of production is no longer a matter of indifference to the proletariat, and must no longer be disturbed by means of strikes." Puntervold, however, noted that strikes had occurred despite this decree, while measures taken against them had become more and more drastic. Nevertheless, production had increased, but so had the cost of production. Efforts were being made to apply the highest technical and business knowledge to the task of simplifying production, and avoiding useless transportation and labor. All the capitalistic incentive measures, including piecework and bonuses, were being used to increase production.

Living conditions in Petrograd were depicted as extremely bad by David S. Aronson, an engineer in the Russian Army in the early days of the war, on his arrival in New York toward the end of August. Mr. Aronson left Petrograd on July 14. At that time the former capital's population, from two and a half million, had been reduced to a million. Finland and Sweden swarmed with refugees. The railroad system was badly disorganized. The food shortage was severe, and horse meat was being publicly sold. Illegitimate traffic in food at high prices continued. Garbage rotted in the grass-grown streets. The sewer system was disorganized and pestilence raged; there was neither food nor medicine available in the hospitals. Few physicians remained. There occurred an average of 600 executions daily for all sorts of offenses, many relating to the illegal handling of food. Clothing was worn threadbare. A concluding statement intimated that the influence of Trotzky had grown immensely during the last few months; that Trotzky had virtually become sole dictator, and that Lenin was rarely seen in public.

Colonel John Ward, M. P., of the British Army, who returned to London on Sept. 4 after three years' sojourn in Siberia, declared that the horrors of the Bolshevik rule had been in no wise exaggerated. The Red Army, he declared, had munitions enough to last for years. Every one was in fear of denunciation. The Bolsheviks dominated the richest manufacturing districts. Anti-Bolshevik attacks had to be made from sparsely populated agricultural districts. The importance of sending munitions and supplies to the armies of Denikin and Kolchak, he stated, could not be overestimated.

BOLSHEVIST PROPAGANDA

The triumphant onward march of the Red Army in August was described in a manifesto sent by the Soviet Government to China. It read in part as follows:

The People's Commissaries address fraternal words to all the peoples of China on the day when the Soviet troops, having crushed the counter-revolutionary despot Kolchak, victoriously enter Siberia. Soviet Russia's Red Army, after two years of struggle and incredible strain, is marching onward to the east across the Urals. Not in order to enforce their will on other nationals, not to enslave them nor conquer them—we are bringing freedom to the people, liberation from foreign bayonets and from the yoke of foreign gold, which is throttling the enslaved peoples of the East, particularly the great Chinese nation. We are bringing help not only to our own working masses, but to the Chinese.

General Denikin had sent a commercial attaché to Stockholm to aid the Russian Legation in stimulating trade between Sweden and the section of Southern Russia controlled by the Denikin forces, where farming equipment was urgently needed. The extent of British aid to Denikin as published in the British White Paper was estimated at £69,000,000. The London Chronicle pointed out that this value of stores and other equipment sent to Denikin was three times that sent to Admiral Kolchak, and that with their aid Denikin had won brilliant successes. The Daily News, however, declared that "never within living memory have the British people been required to foot a bill involving responsibility so obscure or an adventure more deplorable than this immense expenditure, already approaching half the cost of the South African war."

THE SIBERIAN FRONT

Early in August the Kolchak Government at Omsk was still engaged in reorganizing its armies in the field. Large quantities of supplies were sent by it to Archangel and to the army of General Judenitch in the west, including nearly 10,000 tons of wheat.

The Carpathian Russians in Siberia had formed a volunteer corps and joined the Siberian Army. Many Czechoslovaks likewise had joined the volunteer forces and had asked to be dispatched immediately to the front.

More than 200 delegates attended the fifth extraordinary congress of the Siberian Cossacks. The congress approved the mobilization of the Cossacks up to the age of 55 years, and expressed its readiness to make all sacrifices necessary for final victory over Bolshevism. It adopted the following declaration unanimously:

In this time of great trial for our native country we, the Siberian Cossacks, are placing all our strength at the disposal of Admiral Kolchak, who is leading the Russian armies against the enemies of the Russian people and under whose leadership the Russian armies are fighting for the regeneration of a united, great and democratic Russia.

Admiral Kolchak, the head of the Omsk Government, appeared before the congress and in an address thanked the representatives of the Siberian Cossacks for their display of patriotism.

Refugees who arrived from Turkestan, on which the Soviet offensive had concentrated, declared that the country had been thoroughly devastated by the Bolsheviks. They reported the cotton plantations destroyed and the population impoverished.

Answering the protest of the allied Governments against the interference of General Semenov with the operation of the railways in the trans-Baikal region, the Omsk Government stopped all supplies to the recalcitrant Cossack General and expressed a desire to co-operate with the allied attempts at reorganization of the railroads, even waiving the Russian laws interfering with the allied program. The General Staff of the Siberian Army on Aug. 15 issued a proclamation to the rank and file of the army and to the Siberian population expressing cordial support of Admiral Kolchak's régime and the fixed determination to fight to victory against the Bolsheviks. The Russ, the organ of the Agricultural Co-operative Societies, declared that in this critical period of the Siberian struggle new evidences of patriotism were multiplied upon all hands; volunteers were flocking to the Kolchak standard, and parties were uniting to support the army in its fight for the regeneration of Russia.

RECOGNITION DELAYED

On Aug. 18 Roland S. Morris, American Ambassador to Japan, concluded his investigation of the Omsk Government after a long conference with Admiral Kolchak. It was announced from Washington on Aug. 25 that he had recommended favorable action by the United States in the matter of recognition and immediate tangible aid to the Kolchak Government. In the conferences held at Omsk the British, French, Japanese, and American Governments had been represented. A far-reaching and comprehensive plan was drawn up covering all the features of the situation, including provision for operation of railroads, economic assistance, supplies for the anti-Bolshevist armies, financial aid, Red Cross relief and other matters. In following cables Mr. Morris recommended immediate recognition to save the situation, on the ground of the great moral effect the announcement would have on the soldiers and population of Siberia. Admiral Kolchak's armies by that time, however, had suffered such serious reverses that recognition of his Government was postponed indefinitely.

The Red Army had been pushing its successes vigorously. The anti-Bolsheviks were forced to abandon Tiumen, east of the Siberian border, and the Bolsheviks captured Iletsk, forty miles southwest of Orenburg, after fierce fighting. Petrograd reports stated that the Bolsheviks, determined to follow up their successes closely, had even sent cadet school reserves against the Kolchak forces. An explosion of the main ammunition dump of the Kolchak army at Nizhny-Novgorod was said to have been instigated by the Bolsheviks. A dispatch from Omsk on Sept. 3 said that the leader of the All-Russian Government had issued a stirring appeal to all Russians capable of bearing arms to join the ranks, and declared that the destiny of Russia was at stake.

The official organ of the Bolsheviks, the Pravda (Truth) of Moscow, edited by N. Bukharin, has taken an attitude of violent opposition to the League of Nations. The League is represented as a great capitalistic scheme to strangle the proletariat revolution, to establish an international "White Guard," and to exploit the colonies and weaker countries. A virulent attack was made by this publication on President Wilson and Americans in general.

It was stated on Aug. 27 that the Soviet Government had nationalized the estate of the late Count Tolstoy at Yasnaya Polyana, in order to preserve the great writer's memory. The Government had invited the members of the Tolstoy family to enter the service of the administration and manage a projected institution for the enlightenment of the people.

Like a ghost from the grave the Grand Duke Nicholas Nicolaievitch, uncle of the late Czar, arrived in Stockholm from London on Aug. 20. The Grand Duke, one of the most picturesque figures of the first three years of the war, was sent to the Crimea by the Bolsheviks after their accession to power. For the last two years he has been in hiding and has repeatedly been reported killed. Gathered with the Grand Duke at Stockholm were General Judenitch, Premier Lianozov of the new anti-Bolshevist Government of Northwest Russia, and General Skoropadsky, former Hetman of the Ukraine. The watchword of these members of the War Council at Stockholm was reported to be "Down Lenin first; let the future take care of itself."

Mr. Bullitt's Report to the Peace Commission

WILLIAM C. BULLITT, who, as an attaché of the American Peace Commission at Paris, submitted a report to President Wilson upon conditions in Russia studied by him during a brief trip to that country in company with Lincoln Steffens, informed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Sept. 12 that the President had never acted on this report, and laid the document before the committee, together with reports and records of conversations held by him with the President, Mr. Lansing and other prominent members of the American Commission.

In his report Mr. Bullitt said that only a Socialist Government could "save Russia." The element of the Communist Party, headed by Lenin, he declared, was as "moderate as any Socialist Government that can govern that country." He advocated accepting the proposal of the Lenin Soviets to make peace. Along with his report, Mr. Bullitt submitted to the President a proposal for peace between the Soviet Government and the allied and associated powers, which, he said, represented the minimum terms that Lenin and his followers would accept.

Embraced in the proposed terms of peace were provisions that the existing de facto Governments of the territories of Russia and Finland were to remain in control, and to hold those territories, excepting such as might otherwise be disposed of by the peace conferees. The Soviet Government would have control of all railroad lines, and all economic blockades would be lifted. Amnesty would be granted to all political prisoners.

Mr. Bullitt pictured Lenin as having "gained on the imagination of the Russian people," making his position almost that of a dictator. The Russians, he said, had confidence in him and a peace made with the Lenin element would be a tangible one. Dwelling on the advisability of making peace with this element, Mr. Bullitt, in summing up his conclusions, wrote:

1. No Government save a Socialist Government can be set up in Russia today, except by foreign bayonets, and any Government so set up will fall the moment such support is withdrawn. The Lenin wing of the Communist Party is today as moderate as any Socialist Government which can control Russia.

2. No real peace can be established in Europe or the world until peace is made with the revolution. This proposal of the Soviet Government presents an opportunity to make peace with the revolution on a just and reasonable basis—perhaps a unique opportunity.

3. If the blockade is lifted and supplies begin to be delivered regularly to Soviet Russia, a more powerful hold over the Russian people will be established than that given by the blockade itself—the hold given by fear that this delivery of supplies may be stopped. Furthermore, the parties which oppose the Communists in principle, but are supporting them at present, will be able to begin to fight against them.

4. It is, therefore, respectfully recommended that a proposal following the general lines of the suggestions of the Soviet Government should be made at the earliest possible moment.

Going into general conditions of Russia in his report, Mr. Bullitt wrote that the country was in a state of "acute economic distress." The blockade by land and sea, he said, together with the lack of essentials for transportation, was the cause. As a result of the hindrance to transportation, it was possible to bring from the grain centres to Moscow only twenty-five carloads of food a day, instead of the 100 that were needed, while Petrograd was cut down from the customary fifty carloads to fifteen.

The energy of the Russian Government, he said, was being brought to bear upon constructive work, the destructive phase of the revolution being over. He wrote further as follows:

Good order has been established. The streets are safe. Shooting has ceased. There are few robberies. Prostitution has disappeared from sight. Family life has been unchanged by the revolution. The theatres, opera, and ballet are performing as in peace. Thousands of new schools have been opened in all parts of Russia. The Soviet Government seems to have done more for the education of the Russian people in a year and a half than Czarism did in fifty years.

All efforts to induce President Wilson to act on this report and open negotiations with the Soviet Government were unavailing, and Mr. Bullitt later resigned from the minor position which he held with the American Commission.

The most sensational feature of Mr. Bullitt's testimony before the Senate Committee was his revelation of conversations held with Mr. Lansing in Paris, in which the latter was said to have declared himself opposed both to the treaty with Germany and to the League of Nations. Mr. Lansing declined to comment on Mr. Bullitt's disclosures of his attitude. The Russian Soviet bureau in New York confirmed the making of the proposals by the Soviet Government embodied in Mr. Bullitt's report.

Ukraine's Fight for Freedom

By K. VISHEVICH

The following article, rewritten from the Russian and vouched for by the Ukrainian National Committee of the United States, makes clear the Ukrainian nationalists' attitude toward Russia, Bolshevism, Germany, the Poles of Galicia, and the Entente. Ukraine, with General Petlura as its military leader, is fighting Soviet Russia for independence. Regarded as a separate nation, it is the largest new State created by the war, the second largest country in Europe, in population the fifth, and in national resources one of the richest.

NONE of the peoples ground down by the iron heel of the Imperial Russian Government suffered more than did the Ukrainians.

From the time of Peter the Great they had been marked out for extinction, and a determined, continuous effort was made to convert them into Muscovite serfs. Their culture was destroyed; their schools were abolished; books in their native language were forbidden. Especially severe was the persecution in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Intellectuals who spoke in Ukrainian were exiled to Siberia as criminals. Only the peasants were allowed to use the Ukrainian language, and that was because they knew no other.

To some degree the efforts of the Muscovite oppressors were successful. The landed gentry, the Government officials, and the priests became Russified. The peasantry, rendered stubborn by oppression, began raising a new Ukrainian intelligentsia. The Government persecuted these intellectuals, jailed them, exiled them en masse to Siberia, but always the gaps in the ranks were filled by more and more devotees of Ukrainian culture. Ukrainian literature, its growth stifled in Russia, began to flower in Galicia, the Austrian part of Ukraine, from where books and periodicals were smuggled to the eager Ukrainian masses in Russia.

The revolution of 1905 gave only temporary relief. The uprising, conducted under the shibboleth of political freedom, at once acquired in Ukraine a purely national character. Newspapers in the Ukrainian language appeared, and demands were made for Ukrainian schools. But the Russian Duma was obdurate. The Ukrainian intelligentsia, clashing with the Russian intelligentsia, saw that not alone the imperialists, but the Russians of all parties, were opposed to the growth of Ukrainian culture.

Soon freedom of speech and of the press began to be stifled anew. With all its might the Government strove to deprive the Ukrainians of the few small privileges they had gained by the revolution. Heavy fines were imposed upon the newspapers for every word about which there could be the slightest question. Ukrainian schools were closed upon the flimsiest pretexts. Government officials who spoke to the people in Ukrainian were removed from Ukraine. The complete edition of "Kobsar," by Shevchenko, the greatest poet of Ukraine, was confiscated, new books were rigorously censored, and the importation of Ukrainian books from Galicia was taxed prohibitively. Educational societies were disbanded.

CLIMAX OF RUSSIAN OPPRESSION

At the outbreak of the world war the oppression reached its height, for it was realized that the Ukrainians, conscious of their nationality, could have no desire for victory to the arms of Russian imperialism. Victorious Russia would acquire Galicia and stamp out the sole remaining centre of Ukrainian culture. As soon as war was declared Ukrainian newspapers were suppressed and all the leading Ukrainian patriots, including Professor Hrushevsky, the eminent historian, were arrested and exiled far into the interior of Russia.

Soon the Russian armies occupied Galicia and began their repressive measures there. More than 100,000 Ukrainian in-tellecuals, unable to escape, were hanged, shot or exiled to Siberia. The fifteen Ukrainian gymnasiums and the 500 lower grade schools were closed. The Ukrainian libraries and book stores were pillaged. The Uniate clergy were supplanted by Russian Orthodox priests, who were paid enormous salaries by the Russian Government to Russify the people. The Ukrainian national spirit seemed crushed forever.

With the first gust of freedom afforded by the Russian revolution of 1917 the spirit of the Ukrainian people flamed up again. The Ukrainians were the first to declare themselves a separate people with full rights to self-determination. Unaided by capitalists or outside Governments, they raised a national fund. The first Ukrainian National Convention, meeting in Kiev, elected a Central Rada, or Parliament.

From neither the Coalition Government of Prince Lvoff nor the Socialist Government of Kerensky was any encouragement received. Unable to control the powerful national movement in Ukraine, they strove to hinder it. The Provisional Government opposed the nationalization of a Ukrainian army. For several months it delayed recognition of the General Secretariat the Ukrainians had organized as an executive governmental organ, and even then stripped the Secretariat of practically all its functions. All the old Russian institutions were retained and were kept wholly independent of the Secretariat. Permission was granted for the teaching of the Ukrainian language in the public schools, but in the first year only.

FIRM AGAINST BOLSHEVISM

To the vigorous protests made by the Ukrainians the invariable reply of the Provisional Government was that the final decision on all questions could be made only by the Constituent Assembly. The Assembly, however, opposed and attempted to discredit the Ukrainians at every step. Here was one more instance where the great Russian people, no matter what their Government, were determined to stifle every Ukrainian national aspiration.

When Bolshevism swept over Russia in October, 1917, and plunged the country into anarchy, Ukraine alone stood firm. This was to be expected, for the Ukrainian people are and always have been thoroughly nationalistic. Their age-long traditions are such that the radical principles of socialism and internationalism can never find a foothold among them. Such evidences of Bolshevism as may appear in Ukraine are confined to the newcomers in the large cities. The vast majority of the Ukrainians are farm workers, among whom the mob spirit never has been aroused by the emissaries of organized lawlessness.

When nearly the whole of Russia was covered with the Soviets of workers' and soldiers' delegates Ukraine remained aloof. Face to face with anarchy, she unhesitatingly chose independence and orderly government. Even the most confirmed federalists abandoned their idea of a federation with Russia.

UKRAINIAN STATE ORGANIZED

Difficulties in organizing the Ukrainian Government were many. Few of the intellectuals had escaped exile by the Russian Government, and there were not leaders enough to fight the people's battles or fill the necessary State offices. Great Russian intellectuals and Russified Ukrainian renegades insidiously opposed the Government at every step. They gave unexpected support to the Bolsheviks, who began to carry on a vigorous campaign of propaganda among the masses of the cities not racially Ukrainian, and among the soldiery.

In spite of the Bolshevik propaganda, the Government established order and received recognition from France and from England, both of whom sent diplomatic representatives to Kiev.

Then came news that Bolshevik Russia had made peace with Germany. The Ukrainian people were war weary; the Bolshevik propaganda had been of some effect among the soldiers; they realized that the German armies, withdrawn from the Russian front, would soon annihilate them. The Central Rada was faced with the choice of negotiating peace with Germany or delivering the country into the hands of the Bolsheviks.

Hardly had the peace negotiations begun when the Soviet armies invaded Ukraine. The Kiev Bolsheviks, composed of men not racially Ukrainian, revolted and pledged their allegiance to the invaders. This revolt was quelled in five days by 200 Galician volunteers.

The main body of the Ukrainian troops, under their great leader, Petlura, advanced to meet the Soviet armies. Against his few hundred men and scanty light artillery were tens of thousands of Bolsheviks with heavy siege guns. The Ukrainians were gradually forced back to Kiev with severe losses. In Kiev Petlura held out for nine days against heavy bombardment. Then the Central Rada, unwilling to sacrifice the lives and property of the peaceful citizens, removed to Zhitomir with the troops.

Now began a record of Bolshevik rule written in innocent blood. Every intelligent man and woman who uttered a word in Ukrainian was shot; everything Ukrainian was destroyed. In the three days the Bolsheviks remained in Kiev about 5,000 persons perished. For three weeks the Bolsheviks ruled in Kiev and their sway was a continuous mockery of the rights of humanity. The railroads were filled with freight cars bound for Russia and carrying millions of pounds of flour requisitioned by force of arms, but the population of Kiev was near starvation.

THE BREST-LITOVSK PEACE

Peace negotiations having been completed at Brest-Litovsk, the German and Austrian troops undertook, in return for food supplies, to assist in ejecting the Bolsheviks. The campaign was successful, and it was only a short time before the Bolshevik forces were driven back in disorder. The Bolshevik Government at Kiev fled to Kharkov and then to Great Russia as victorious Petlura pressed forward and entered Kiev.

But the radical element of the population had been growing and it was only a short time before the moderate Government was overthrown and the Social Revolutionaries took command. Holubovich was placed at their head. The task of reconstruction, however, proved too much for these radicals and the Germans began to take advantage of them.

It was not long before the German troops began to requisition food.

Discontent grew fast. A new Landowners' Party was organized. The ancient Ukrainian title of Hetman was revived and given to Skoropadsky, a wealthy land owner and a former General in the Russian Imperial Army. The Russian and Polish land owners joined with the Germans in supporting him, for it was felt that his rule alone would preserve the big estates intact and would insure a supply of food to the Germans. Russian officers, supported by German soldiers, arrested members of the Government, dispersed the Central Rada, and placed Hetman Skoropadsky in power.

Skoropadsky failed in his efforts to organize a combined Russian Ukrainian Government. Patriotic Ukrainians refused to accept the positions he offered them, or to work with the Russians he placed in the most important offices, or with the Germans who were supporting him. Only one real Ukrainian, Doroshenko, was placed at the head of a department, and he was obliged to leave his party in order to accept the post.

Soon the Ukrainian employees were discharged from practically all the Government departments. Ukrainian newspapers were censored. Ukrainians were imprisoned in great numbers on the ground that they were Socialists. The Russians declared the arrests were due to the Germans, while the Germans asserted they were merely performing guard duty and that the Hetman's Government was doing the arresting.

NATIONAL UKRAINIAN UNION

To oppose the oppressive tactics of Skoropadsky's régime, the Ukrainian political parties formed the Ukrainian National Union. Nikovsky, a Socialist-Federalist editor, was placed at the head of this union. When illness forced him to resign he was succeeded by Vinnichenko, a well-known writer and member of the Social Democratic Party.

As the discontent grew and Skoropadsky saw that his Government was doomed to fall as soon as the supporting German bayonets should leave him, he began to make overtures to the Ukrainian National Union, promising to convoke a Diet as soon as possible. The union called for a national conference to decide what kind of co-operation, if any, there should be.

Then came the revolution in Germany. Victory for the Entente was assured and the Russians and Russophiles began to denounce their former German friends. Skoropadsky, believing the Entente stood for a single undivided Russia which should include Ukraine, forbade the convocation of the national conference. The Government offices were filled only by Great Russians—no Ukrainian was tolerated. A fictitious federation of Ukraine with Russia was declared, and a new so-called South Volunteer Army of Russian officers was formed to renew oppression on everything Ukrainian.

That the National Union should gain in strength by such oppression was natural. It elected a Directorate, organized a People's Army of 60,000 men, and declared war on the Hetman's Government. Skoropadsky was overthrown and the National Union became master of Ukraine.

QUESTION OF RECOGNITION

Russian agitation alone is responsible for the failure of the Entente to recognize the Ukrainian Government. These Russians, whose chief desire is to incorporate Ukraine as a part of Great Russia, are endeavoring through every conceivable kind of propaganda to make it appear that the Ukrainian National Union is Bolshevik, that Petlura's armies are bands of robbers, and that the bands of Russian officers make up a liberating volunteer army.

No one who has seen these officers' detachments in Kiev could think of them as liberators. These officers are adventurers whose aim is to live without work. They fight the Bolsheviki because the Bolsheviki robbed them of their privileges and easy livelihood. They fight the Ukrainians, Finns, and other nationalities of the former Russian Empire with even greater ardor, for they know that Russia, shorn of these rich territories, will have far too few sinecures with which to reward her adherents. They can make but little impression against the Bolsheviki. Knowing this, they are vainly relying upon the Entente to free them from the Bolsheviki, to restore Ukraine and the other "lost provinces" to an undivided Russian Empire, and to place a new Nicholas upon the throne.

Ukraine is fighting for her national life. The true Ukrainian patriots are standing solidly behind Petlura. On one side they are fighting the Bolsheviki to secure the moderate orderly Government they have set up. On the other they are fighting the Poles to keep their land and their people from the domination of a foreign flag. And always there are the insidious attacks of the Russian monarchists.

Ukraine has declared for liberty, democracy, and independence. For those ideals he will continue to fight until the last drop of true Ukrainian blood has been shed.

Five Months in Moscow Prisons

By LUDOVIC NAUDEAU

[CORRESPONDENT OF THE PARIS TEMPS]

WE were writing in the office of the Journal de Russie in Moscow, at about 10 o'clock in the morning, Tuesday, July 30, 1918, when the echo of heavy boots resounded in the antechamber. Immediately there appeared a young officer of the Red Army and a soldier of colossal stature. The officer was obviously of a race which Russia has persecuted. The soldier was a Lett, with a yellow mustache; bristling with arms, he looked like a Redskin who had dug up his battle axe. The officer greeted no one, sat down without waiting for an invitation, and exhibited a document which I did not read; it was only too easy for me to divine its content. He then declared that by order of the Extraordinary Commission the Journal de Russie was suppressed because of its counter-revolutionary propaganda; our officers were to be searched, and as for the manuscripts which I had just finished before his arrival, he insisted that they be handed over to him forthwith.

"Very good," said I; "and now all we have to do is to go home."

"That depends," rejoined the youthful Maccabeus; "you are, I believe, the chief and responsible editor of this paper. You will therefore not go home, but will come with me. This document is an order of the Extraordinary Commission, by virtue of which I am to place you under arrest."

"The devil!" I thought; "this is going rather far!"

Nevertheless, I tried to show no signs of emotion. The suppression of the Journal de Russie had neither astonished nor displeased me. I saw therein a fortunate opportunity to put an end to a campaign which had become useless, and this without the necessity of taking my own decision. To close up shop and return to France would have seemed to me most desirable; the idea that I must go to prison, on the contrary, was most unpleasant. I had, of course, many times foreseen during the year 1918 that I might end by being arrested, yet I had inclined to believe that this would not happen, or at least that I would be warned in time and would have an opportunity to disappear. Henceforth, however, it was impossible to turn back, and useless to cherish vain regrets. I was caught!

Walking between the young officer and the athletic Lett, I got into a very correct automobile; they followed me, and the car left immediately for Bolshaia Liubianka Street, where the fear-inspiring Extraordinary Commission had its headquarters. Thus my captivity in Moscow began, a melancholy period; yes, truly the most sombre period of my whole life, which, I must confess, had been quite fertile in adventures. * * *

CAUSE OF ARREST

What had been my crime? It had been set forth, in full detail, on Sunday, July 28, two days before my arrest, in an article in the Pravda signed "Niourine," a pseudonym behind which was concealed a high functionary of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. M. Niourine himself was not a Russian. If I do not say what he was, it is because I do not wish to give the impression of condemning generally a race for crimes whose responsibility the individuals themselves should bear. Although the Journal de Russie had appeared since February, 1918, in Moscow, after having been published for several months in Petrograd, and had been frequently quoted by the Russian press, the article of M. Niourine was in reality the first that contained accusations and violent expressions against me.

In language singularly filled with hatred I was denounced on July 28 as a counter-revolutionary agitator and as an agent of the French bank. Constructing against me, not a polemical article, but a police document, a veritable indictment, the contemptible editor of the Pravda had accumulated, to vilify me, a mass of fragmentary quotations, treacherously chosen from the principal articles in which, for some time, I had defended views which no Frenchman living in Russia could have helped supporting. It was obvious that this sly rascal, for months at a time, had silently drawn up a dossier, with the intention of producing it at a favorable moment. Noteworthy the fact that this Javert, disguised as a journalist, though admitting in his article that my controversy in the Journal de Russie had always been moderate and restrained, heaped the most violent reproaches on my head for my articles published in the Temps, which he denounced as venomous and infamous. The long diatribe ended with this exclamation, printed in French, "Fermez votre crachoire!" (Shut your mouth.)

It has never before happened, I suppose, at any time or in any country, that vehement invectives printed in a newspaper have been equivalent to a kind of writ or warrant issued by a police Judge. If I had seen in M. Niourine what he really was, a police agent, the most elementary prudence would have led me to consider myself sufficiently warned, and to cease immediately the publication of my French paper and take flight. But I was so simple as to think that I ought to reply, with the pen, to one who had attacked me with the pen. It was precisely at the moment when I was drawing up this reply that M. Nourine's acolytes came to take possession of my person. * * *

SUDDEN OFFICIAL CHANGE

The Journal de Russie had never had a clandestine character. They had always granted me permission to issue it. And as it was important to avoid the suppression of our sheet, we did not fear to adopt the most democratic, even the most socialistic policy. * * * Several French people of our colony considered that our paper was too "red." * * * Some weeks before my arrest I had had a long conversation with Tchitcherine, Minister of Foreign Affairs, who was very courteous and gave me no intimation that I was in danger. On July 18, having dined at the French Military Mission, I met there one Captain Sadoul, whom I had known since my arrival in Russia, and in whom I saw a kind of habitual intermediary between the French authorities and the Bolsheviks. Sadoul had asked Leon Trotsky himself if, in case of allied intervention, he would expel the French or persecute them, and Trotsky had returned an emphatic negative. If Sadoul had believed there was danger, I am certain he would loyally have warned me. * * *

The assassination of Count von Mirbach, the German Ambassador, and the uprising of the Revolutionary Socialists of the Left which followed it led to the issuing of a decree that all newspapers except those edited directly by the Soviets should cease publication. I obeyed this decree. * * * Three days later a new authorization was delivered to me in good and due form, and we began to print our sheet again. But the Commissariat, after having again authorized all the suspended papers to resume publication, had suddenly revoked this new decision; its emissaries had ordered the printers to cease their work definitively. Our relative insignificance, however, as foreigners had caused us to be forgotten in the general proscription. During the last five days of July the Journal de Russie was the only non-Soviet organ that continued to be sold side by side with the Pravda and the Izvestia. Glory was in our grasp! But on July 28 the indictment of the Pravda came like a cannon shot, and on the 30th I was arrested and suddenly thrown into prison, without definite knowledge of what the police agents of the Soviet accused me of.

PLACE OF CONFINEMENT

I arrived at the den of the famous Extraordinary Commission, whose very name filled Moscow with terror. The huge quadrangular building in which it was located had previously housed the central branch of an insurance company in the time of Nicholas. Thereafter it became a place of terror, before which the passerby, with furtive glance, walked hastily and fearsomely. The automobile which bore me stopped in an interior court incumbered with vehicles piled together, with shrapnel guns, with pieces of cannon and soup caldrons. Sailors whose chests were exposed almost to their waists, soldiers whose hair fell in ringlets almost over their eyes, marched back and forth; all the issues were guarded by watchful sentries. Evidently it was much easier to get into this retreat than to escape from it.

Through dusty corridors I was brought to a kind of antechamber, where a boy less than twenty years old, a sly, suspicious, blonde little chap, took from me the papers and documents I carried on my person, seized my cane and my knife, and absent-mindedly began to question me, while two or three low-browed sailors watched me with sneering smiles. There was no trouble about my age and profession, but a misunderstanding arose when my questioner insisted on knowing to what political party I belonged in my own country. "I am a republican citizen," I said. "Write down 'Republican Party.'" "Republican Party?" repeated the young terrorist, staring at me. Slowly he wrote "Respublikanetz." The sailors began a discussion among themselves, evidently somewhat disconcerted. "Well," said the blonde fellow, "you are a counter-revolutionary, and that's enough."

He made a sign. Some soldiers took me away, and soon, after a door had closed behind me, I found myself definitely separated from the world of reason. I remembered that I went down a corridor, flanked to right and left by a row of improvised cells, whose pine doors were new and unpainted. In the middle of each door was cut out a rectangle, just big enough to frame a human face. Two rows of prisoners gazed at me with feverish eyes while my feet brought me on to the unknown, and I noted the pallor of handsome, pensive faces. Most of them seemed to belong to young naval officers. * * *

WRETCHED FELLOW-PRISONERS

A door opened. What I first beheld was a throng of what seemed to be lunatics crowded together within the four walls of a large square room. It was like the waiting room of some fantastic station, whence all traffic had been withdrawn and by which no trains ever passed; a waiting room whose ceiling was supported by iron columns, and whose wide windows were grated with iron bars. How many there were here! Why were there so many? Here were people of the middle class wearing dirty linen, yet who still preserved a semblance of respectability. There were soldiers here, workmen, long-haired priests, bewildered old ladies, young men, old men with shaking heads. What were all these nondescript people doing here? And what fate awaited me? Why was I joined to this throng of lunatics? I found out why a little later.

I was startled suddenly by wild cries. An old man, attacked by some mystical madness, was improvising hymns in honor of the saints, or else composing satires, vaguely rhymed, in which he revealed the vices of the members of the Soviet. The other prisoner shrank in terror from the dangerous old man; every one feared the consequences of his heedless audacities, but he continued howling at the top of his voice. Jailers appeared and ordered him to be silent, threatening to shut him up in a cell; but suddenly they withdrew, disconcerted by the inspired fury which took from him all fear and evoked it in others. A terror-stricken woman sobbed in a corner, and beside her a group of men, gravely united in a circle, discussed calmly the news of the day. * * *

NAUSEATING PRISON FOOD

In a corner of the room a hairy young man, who seemed to be a fluent talker, was seated before a table, moving about record books, taking notes, drawing up lists, a whole complicated bookkeeping. He also asked me my name, my age, and the reason for my arrest. * * * I soon learned that he was a prisoner like myself who fulfilled in the room, despite his youth, the functions of starche, that is to say, dean or monitor.

The starche, with a very important air, gave me a rustic wooden spoon, and I saw that all the other prisoners were getting out a similar instrument. * * * Buckets were brought; each of these receptacles contained food for eight people. In turn, we plunged our spoons into an insipid liquid where cabbage leaves and shreds of smoked fish were floating; almost all who surrounded me devoured this concoction greedily. Hungry prisoners tried to scoop up more substantial spoonfuls, containing, above all, solid substances. The fish bones and shreds of cabbage, after having been sucked, were ejected upon the table or on the floor, where they soon accumulated in a sticky mass.

Thus, in a few hours, I had passed from civilized life to an atmosphere of degradation. On the morning of July 30 I was still a man possessed with the sentiment of human dignity; on the afternoon of the same day I was nothing but a human beast, condemned to dispute in a trough with other human beasts shreds of nauseating food. A little kasha, or barley gruel, ended our miserable repast, but certain prisoners, who had received some provisions from outside, offered me a glass of tea. The mystical madman, despite the exhortations of his neighbors, continued his sinister psalms. Frightened, they warned him that he would get himself shot; he would stop a moment, but immediately again his piercing voice would be upraised.

DESPAIRING PRISONERS

Sobs were heard every moment; some unfortunate wretches gave way to fits of despair; a woman beside me lamented, telling the circumstances of her arrest in a station when she arrived in Moscow with her old father and her children. What would become of these poor people, who were without resources? And when liberated, how could she find them again in the big city? In contrast with these depressed beings, others astonished one by their calm. Some prisoners who had made themselves coffee sipped it quietly around a case transformed into a table; others, stretched on their pallets, seemed to be sleeping quietly. About 5 o'clock some brutal-looking soldiers in the courtyard approached the bars of our windows, and found it amusing to point their guns at us, but withdrew without shooting any of us down. A fat little man who was very shabby and on whose chin an eight days' beard made a brown smudge slipped up to me and said:

"You see the Russian revolution, Sir. It's splendid, isn't it? What is going on here is madness, pure madness, a monstrous nightmare. All honest, well-educated, respectable men are in prison, while malefactors reign. * * * "

Sometimes, while we were talking together, some improvised police agent appeared, reading with difficulty some document while all were silent. He would call out a family name, followed by a Christian name, and, according to Russian custom, the father's name. Usually it meant a summons to one of those examinations, both terrible and burlesque, so many of whose incidents had been commented on all over Moscow. Some unhappy wretch would then rise and depart, with pale face and bent head.

The sinister vagabonds, the ignorant heroes who had accepted the post of inquisitors, the very Judge of the commission, were mostly men of limited intelligence and of evil temper. Strangers to the most elementary principle of justice, almost always incapable of understanding the very questions which they were charged to clarify, they overwhelmed the prisoner with shouts and insults, and it was sometimes at the point of a revolver that they ordered him to confess and to reveal his accomplices. What was the destination of the prisoner thus summoned by one of them? Death, perhaps. How many had already departed after such a summons, and had never again been seen? But sometimes, also—Oh, very rarely!—resounded, after the utterance of a name, the phrase: Na svobodu. (In liberty.) And then there were explosions of joy; handclaps and warm congratulations saluted him whose chance had come to escape from this filthy place.

AN APPEAL TO TCHITCHERIN

Toward 6 o'clock in the evening my own name was suddenly called by one of the jailers. * * * But they only gave me a package of preserves, a pillow-case, and a coverlet which had been sent me by my collaborators on the Journal de Russie. Disillusion! But an idea came to me. Why had I not thought of it sooner? I would write to Tchitcherin, Minister of Foreign Affairs; he knew me; he had even had a conversation with me a few days before, and he knew that I had always conducted my journalistic campaign openly. When this member of the Bolshevik Government learned what had happened to me, I thought he would have me released. So I drew up a letter carefully, and handed it to the starche, who, every evening, collected the correspondence of the prisoners with the warning that he could accept it only if it was left unsealed. My letter went and evidently reached its address, but M. Tchitcherin refrained from helping me, or, rather, did not wish to do so.

A WRETCHED NIGHT

Evening came, bringing a hideous vision of famished beings who, like wild Indians, sat grouped in a circle, crouched over soup pots, from which, with all kinds of loud noises, smackings, indrawings, gurglings, they lapped up a liquid covered with fish grease. Ah, not for me! I did not even have the energy to open a can of preserves; I munched a biscuit and stretched myself out on a corner of the pallet between a female soldier, who squinted and wore spectacles, and an old priest. The latter, snoring reverberantly, slept untroubled by the lice and bedbugs which kept us awake all night. I think it must have been about midnight when armed sailors appeared at the door and imperiously called a name. Many heads were raised, many faces bore an anxious expression. One unhappy wretch rose like a ghost with a livid face. With a trembling voice he asked if he should take with him the different articles that he possessed. "You will not need your things where you are to be sent," replied a mocking, sinister voice; "leave all that here." The jailers divided his possessions among themselves.

On the morning of July 31, what a gloomy awakening in that menagerie all saturated with the exhalations of sleeping humanity! That whole day I passed hovering between hope and prescience of misfortune. * * * Toward 4 o'clock in the afternoon the rumor spread that many of us were to be sent to the official prisons. This report proved to be true. The roll was called, and soon I found myself in a line marching to the courtyard, where a kind of "Black Maria" awaited our trembling band. Again, before piling us into this vehicle, our names were verified. A young soldier of the Soviet Army, a rosy youth with a blonde tuft of hair, and who seemed to play an active part in all the institution, noticed among us a man from the Caucasus, with a face of the color and apparent consistency of gingerbread, and with burning eyes. "Ah, you are the fellow who shot against us the second day of the battle of Jaroslav," he said to him. "Your account will be settled!" Then fixing on me his small blue eyes gleaming with a species of malevolent stupidity, and pointing his finger at me, he said, his voice filled with hatred: "That Frenchman will be shot in two or three days."

They pressed us in, they packed us together standing in that dark unventilated vehicle, which had borne so many victims to their death. Standing face to face, our breath and perspiration met and mingled. Our limbs, dovetailed together, could not be moved, but tensed at every jolt, seeking instinctively some point of support. Under my left arm, extended horizontally, a young boy was weeping bitterly, so lamentably that I suffered from his suffering. * * * Interminably the vehicle jolted on. Some of those near the wall next to the driver's seat peered between some cracks. "Tagannka! They are taking us to Tagannka!" they cried. "Tagannka!" commented others; "we are lucky. That prison is much more comfortable than Butirky. We're in luck!"

IN TAGANNKA PRISON

Violent shocks and joltings; we divined that the prison van was swiftly turning. We heard heavy doors swing back. Then our vehicle opened, and like a load dumped from a tipcart we poured forth upon the stones of a courtyard encompassed on all sides by red brick buildings, whose windows were barred. * * * Verification of names again, new searchings. The jailers of Tagannka Prison were very different from those of the Extraordinary Commission. It was evident that we were in a prison destined for thieves and assassins. With four others, under the guidance of a jailer, I was brought to Room 5, to which I had been assigned. Iron doors grated and closed again; we traversed a vast rectangular gallery, where to right and left, with geometrical symmetry, three floors of cells were built, one above the other; their small white doors opened uniformly upon a kind of long balcony, patrolled by jailers.

We went down a stairway, passing by many embrasures, where, behind iron bars, the pale, curious faces of prisoners recognizable from their long white cassocks as common law convicts watched us go by. Bewildered we passed in front of four gratings, higher and wider than any we had seen before, inclosing a large room where I saw a crowd pressed against the bars and evidently seeking to identify the new arrivals. A throng. It is incredible how many men a prison can contain! Thirty or forty steps more and we reached Room 5. The door had just been bolted behind us, and I had scarcely taken a few steps in the dim light of this cell, inhabited by about twenty captives, when a young man with a black beard came to me and held out his hand. "Ah, here you are!" he said. "We heard you had been arrested, and we knew you were at the Extraordinary Commission. Welcome! I am the starche of this cell, and we will do all we can to make your stay here as comfortable as possible. But I see you do not remember me. My beard puts you off the track. I am Vininkin, the orderly of General Gurko, at the northern front, at Dvinsk."

EXECUTING THE ABLEST MEN

The appearance of Vininkin aroused in me a throng of memories. His aspect recalled to me pre-revolutionary Russia during the war. I remembered my adventures at the northern front. I saw again the moving departure of Russian troops to the French front, and also I thought of the brilliant horse races at Dvinsk, in whose organization Vininkin had taken an active part. Who could have foreseen that—* * * But the Captain continued:

Six of our comrades who lived in this cell until today have just been taken away. The same prison van which brought you here came for them at 3 o'clock and will take them to a barrack, where they will probably be shot tomorrow morning. Six splendid young officers, the best of what remained of the Russian Army! One of them fought on the French front. Besides the Cross of St. George he received the Legion of Honor, the French War Cross, and the English Military Medal. Brave of the brave! That is the way they massacre the energetic elements who under more favorable circumstances might have tried to save Russia. Fifteen of us in this cell were members of the old "League for the Defense of the Russian Fatherland." Only three, myself included, are left. The others have all been shot, or soon will be.

If they are going to kill us all, why don't they do it all at once? What's the use of inflicting this perpetual anguish upon us? Every time a jailer approaches each of us wonders if he has not been sent to bring us to the place of execution. Every name called makes us tremble. If at least we were sure of meeting a quick and decent death, that would be some consolation. Some unhappy wretches, wounded only in the legs or in the stomach, have lain groaning on the ground for hours before any one thought of dispatching them with a revolver shot. All this certainly isn't gay. But in spite of everything we are philosophical. It is probably our life at the front that enables us to endure without too much depression this vegetative existence in this sombre room in a space so narrow we can scarcely move about, in this sinister antechamber to the cemetery. You will see that we are not degenerating.

This was true, for I saw a group of seven or eight officers, young men of fine physical development, performing with great precision movements of Swedish gymnastics. Most of them before long would lie beneath the earth. They knew this, but they acted as though they did not know it, and the smile never vanished from their lips. * * *

WITH NEW COMPANIONS

Soon afterward I was transferred to Room 1. A warm reception greeted me there. Besides two Frenchmen, Adjutant Guillon and a chauffeur named Dubuis, this room, the largest of the whole prison, contained twenty Czechs and forty Poles arrested at the same time with them at the railway station. The room also contained about twenty Russians. A man was pointed out to me, short and obese, bald, with a keen and yet also furtive gaze. He walked up and down with long strides, frowning and preoccupied. This was a Bolshevik Commissary charged with dishonesty in office. The other prisoners lowered their voices when this ambiguous person approached; they feared that he might seek to rehabilitate himself by spying and informing. There were also among us some members of Russian Socialist parties independent of that to which the Bolshevik usurpers belonged. There were many interesting personalities which the police of the Czar's régime had often tracked down, judging their ideas subversive. And yet these men excited suspicion in the Extraordinary Commission, which accused them of counter-revolutionary activities.

Room 1, like all those which formed part of the prison, was contiguous to the long corridor through which I had been brought on July 31. This passage was a gallery, whose barred windows, above inner courts and encompassing walls, opened like a row of sinister eyes fixed from above far out over a suburb of Moscow. Four monumental windows with pointed arches, fortified by iron bars before which the most formidable wild beasts would have felt their impotence, premitted us to look out upon this corridor, through whose openings we could see gardens in which worked cultivators and carters; woodsheds, scattered houses, empty land, and among green foliage the polychrome hues of an ancient monastery with golden bulbs and high turrets, from which came the sound of tolling bells. The contrast between that sunlit horizon, where the radiant Summer light played, and the hideous cage in which we were imprisoned was poignant. We were in a room that was gray and dusty, with a macadamized floor. In long, close alignment stood some 90 or 100 beds provided only with a vermin-infested mattress. The promiscuity and uncleanness inflicted on the prisoners were most lamentable.

ATTACKS OF ENEMIES

In the idleness of those hours, which passed heavily, the reading of papers was our main diversion. The two official organs of the Bolsheviks, the Izvestia and the Pravda, were impatiently awaited every morning. From the day of my arrival these papers often spoke of me, and in such a tone that it began to get upon my nerves. One day an article of the Pravda represented me as a man of shameful crimes, an agent of the monarchy; the next day the Pravda jesuitically attacked me as though I were still a free agent. When I was already imprisoned in my cage at Taganka the Pravda quoted fragments of my old articles deliberately to create the impression that their publication was quite recent. And the Pravda ended its long malediction with this ominous phrase: "But is not something disagreeable going to happen to you, Monsieur Naudeau? Take care! take care!" This fact that I was the personal object of the violence of the Bolshevik press won for me among my companions a consideration which I would have preferred to do without. This flood of outrage at a moment when I could neither answer nor discuss had a singularly depressing effect upon my nerves. More than once I remained prostrated on my pallet, with scarcely strength enough to take my food.

On Aug. 7 I was suddenly called to the prison office, and recognized the French Vice Consul, M. Labonne, accompanied by a big man, M. Morel, who had been the bookkeeper of the Journal de Russie and also Secretary of the Consulate. I uttered a cry of joy. A representative of the Extraordinary Commission accompanied them. He told us that if we spoke any other language than Russian for a single moment he would immediately interrupt our conversation. M. Labonne and I thereupon began to talk in Russian. He tried to console me with words from which I saw with extreme sadness that he could not do much for me, but I learned from him for the first time with deep joy that events on the French front seemed to be entering upon a new phase, and that a great victory was in sight. * * *

FRENCH MISSION FOOD

My transfer to Room 1 had the advantage of enabling me to share in the provisions distributed three times a week by the French Mission to the French, Czech, and Polish soldiers. On other days we had to get along on the prison diet, which was a myth, an odor rather than a substance, consisting mainly of a piece of black bread, cabbage soup at noon, and at 6 o'clock in the evening another soup of the same kind.

Under pretext that I had not yet been examined, I was kept absolutely isolated from the outer world. But as it was indispensable that the heavy pots should be brought to us from the prison office, a group of prisoners from our room was called on for this task. I always managed to be one of this group. Interviews which it would have been impossible for me to obtain in my own person I secured as a humble porter. Once in the prison office I met four or five of the young Russian officers whose comrade I had been for two days in the sinister Room 1. They were handsome, strongly built young men, courteous and frank. Two of them, with that impulsive heedlessness characteristic of Russians when they are in love, held their fiancées closely embraced in their arms, and I learned that one of these young girls, whose charm had struck me especially, was the Princess Turkestana. These love-intoxicated couples, exalted by hope born of despair, tried in the brief period of one of these meetings to realize the whole eternity of a dreamed-of happiness. * * *

We lived at Tagannka in an atmosphere of piety not without its charm. Weekly masses in the prison chapel afforded us the enjoyment of beautiful music and the fragrance of incense, while the Patriarch of Moscow, who was one of our fellow-prisoners, blessed and embraced us. Often, outside the regular services, the church bells began to toll. A panikhida, or mass for the dead, was to be solemnized. A group of us took up a collection for the celebration of a requiem for the soul of some friend executed the day before.

the prison at Tagannka. The day's exercise, the mechanical task of eating, long hours of despairing, brooding. The main jailer often appeared in the evening with a bit of paper; he would call out a name; the one called rose, pale and trembling, departed, and was never seen again. Newcomers took their places. An American Major of the International Red Cross visited the prison to study conditions; in a brief interview with M. Naudeau he held out no hope of release, and counseled patience. Hopes of allied intervention, of an advance from the east by Czechoslovaks or Japanese were not fulfilled. The Red Terror of Moscow continued; the prisoners daily yielded their quota of victims to the executioner. The Extraordinary Commission sent Dzerzhinsky, its President, to Tagannka, to expedite the condemnations. Thin, dark, with drooping mustache, with feverish, bloodshot eyes, he appeared and examined many of the prisoners, one by one, very calmly; many of those questioned by him were shortly afterward taken out and shot, among them M. Naudeau's friend, Captain Vininkin, after indescribable moral torture. Every time a file of these condemned prisoners departed through the gallery on their way to execution the inmates of Room 1 gave way to despair. A sudden perquisition took from the prisoners, especially those who lived in the cells, every bit of food or means of comfort which they had managed to secure. On Aug. 31 the prisoners learned from the Bolshevik papers that in Moscow on the day before the life of Lenin had been attempted, and that in Petrograd on the same day Uritsky, Commissary of Internal Affairs of the Northern Commune, had been killed. The Izvestia and the Pravda were filled with sombre fury, and devoted whole pages to horrible threats and projects of reprisal. The anxiety of the political prisoners increased. The inmates of Room 1 soon learned that they were to be withdrawn from Tagannka and removed to the prison of Butirky, which had a sinister reputation. Before they left, one of their number, who was too sick to rise from his bed, was taken out and shot; a Polish officer, severely attacked by pneumonia, was allowed to die without medical attention. The narrative of M. Naudeau continues]:

IN BUTIRKY PRISON

Horrible was our state when we finally arrived in the courtyard of the prison of Butirky. I thought I had already been very unhappy during the preceding two months. I was soon to learn that a still more miserable fate awaited me, in comparison with which the memory of Tagannka would leave me with the greatest regrets. Man is a wolf for man.

When we reached the prison of Butirky, bowed under the weight of our cumbrous, shapeless packs, the jailers ordered us to stand in rows of twos, and we waited thus for a long time in the dark hall of the ground floor. * * * Thieves and assassins poured out for nearly two hours. These wretched beings, like those of Tagannka, were clothed in long gray cassocks; the jailers pushed and pulled them about like inanimate objects; we saw that the habit of controlling criminals had transformed these State agents into brutes with human faces. As soon as we appeared they also addressed us roughly and pushed us about. * * * The hall in which we were waiting was dilapidated; its cracked plaster hung in greenish crusts, oozing with dank moisture. All that we saw was impregnated with wretchedness and filth. Butirky, decidedly, deserved its sinister reputation. The ugolovni, (common-law criminals,) flabby, sallow beings, dressed like so many Pierrots, sneered as they passed us, seeing so many honest men waiting to take their places. * * *

Finally the jailers drove us up three flights of stairs, through long corridors; some twenty-five of us at hazard were forced into a room which we filled, and the door was locked behind us. It was a small room with a vaulted ceiling, where we could scarcely move about without colliding. The beds, raised vertically against the wall during the day, almost touched, and when they were taken down at night they occupied three-quarters of the room's area. The cement floor was covered with a slime which we could not remove. The room was vilely malodorous. The Bolshevik creators of a new world thus precipitated us, unjust and uncondemned, into a dungeon where, a short time before, twenty-five criminals had been living. Without disinfection, without cleaning, we were installed in slime, in sweat, in all the accumulated filth of these wretches, and their parasites were already pumping our blood.

All the criminals had not been removed; we met them three times a day in the toilet rooms, where we were all mingled together. Those of us assigned to do manual labor and whose duty it was to descend to the kitchens to bring the enormous caldrons of soup had to mix with dense throngs of these bandits, and actually come to blows with them. The same jailers watched over us both; they used the same language when they had orders to give. Nothing was more painful than to hear the incessant clamors of these rough jailers and the bursts of devilish laughter of the criminals in the long corridors which re-echoed them.

STRANGE BEDFELLOWS

In our cell at Butirky chance had united some very curious types of our Russian world. I slept between a Colonel, veteran of many great battles, and the manager of a metallurgical factory. Among us were one of the most eminent lawyers of Petrograd, a young sailor of the Socialist Revolutionary Party of the Left accused of being one of the assassins of Mirbach, and a Captain whom I did not at first recognize, but who turned out to be one of my friends in Manchuria. We had with us also two rural landlords who had been possessed of large estates, a priest, a former brewer of Petrograd, and some peasants.

But, above all, our company was noteworthy for the number of Socialists of all parties that it contained. * * * Subtle controversies were engaged in. These militant Socialists were theoretically as hostile to capitalism as the party in power. And during these prolonged debates, the rural proprietors nodded their heads, very bewildered and supremely afraid of giving offense; disconcerted, they made big eyes or lowered their gaze modestly, to hide their disapproval, thinking that decidedly they had fallen into queer company. Sometimes they exchanged a furtive glance, which said: "The main point these people are discussing is our own death."

When the fine days of Autumn came to an end, a new affliction came upon us, that of bad odors. From October on, with the first frosts, the Polish soldiers, like Russians in this, began to manifest great fear of air. They had attributed the death of their officer at Tagannka to a draft, and they remained impressed by this. Crouched, shivering at the foot of their beds, these haters of air began to shake as soon as we tried to freshen the fetid atmosphere of our prison. But, as they were in the majority, we had to resign ourselves. Man, that evil-tempered animal, is also a malodorous animal. The communism of bad smells is that form of communism most easily realizable.

Also we had to resolve, we who did not eat, to allow ourselves to be eaten by myriads of insects who had lived on the flesh of criminals. And to think, I reflected, one feverish night, when nauseated by the exhalation of breaths and other odors, harassed by the resistless attack of innumerable and indestructible insects, I tossed on my bed, that it is with the object of making humanity finer and happier that the Bolshevik fanatics pack together thousands of intelligent beings to rot away in prison! One day, about Oct. 10, the jailer appeared, and through the door held ajar hailed my friend Guillon, and told him to take all his baggage and leave the room. What was his destination? We did not know. I learned a little later that he, as well as Dubuis, had been liberated. About an hour after my compatriot had left I was also called by the jailer and ordered to take my things and leave the room. The Poles pressed around me, overwhelming me with congratulations, but some presentiment kept me from rejoicing. The jailer took me through long corridors. I went down a flight of stairs and through gratings, and reached a part of the prison which I did not know; a door was opened, and I found myself, not in the street, but alone in a narrow cell, whose bolts, as they were pushed, reverberated behind me.

German New Guinea as an Australian Colony

THE German New Guinea territory, handed over by allied mandate to Australia, is very nearly twice the size of the British Isles. It includes German New Guinea, (the northern part of the mainland of New Guinea,) New Britain, New Ireland, several small adjacent islands, the Admiralty and Hermit groups, and Buka and Bougainville of the German Solomons. The white population, mostly Germans, is about 4,000, the native population about 750,000. This territory is one of the most fertile in the South Pacific, and has been well developed by the German settlers. Germany loses an excellent territory, which, besides its political and strategic importance to the British Empire, has wonderful commercial possibilities. Under wise and progressive administration, in ten years' time it might vie with the Dutch colony of Java. It possesses splendid harbors and rivers, and as a naval base (Germany's intention) the whole possession offered ideal conditions.

The capital, Rabaul, is the best planned town in the South Pacific islands. Blanche Bay, its harbor, can carry the deepest of oversea steamers; German men-of-war were able to tie up to the fine jetty within the small inner harbor, directly in front of the town. Every street is laid out with uniform care and regularity, and is shaded by beautiful tropical trees. The botanical gardens, laid out and managed by a gardener from the ex-Kaiser's own Berlin gardens, is without doubt one of the finest in the whole Southern Hemisphere. There are huge business warehouses, ornate public buildings, and elegant and comfortable private bungalows. Everything has been done for color and effect.

It was in September, 1914, that an Australian naval contingent landed at Herbertshohe to seize the German territory and to silence the powerful wireless station up in the hills about three miles away. The Germans promised no opposition, but no sooner had the Australians landed than mines were exploded, and from secure trenches German soldiers fired upon them. The march of the Australians on to the wireless station through almost impenetrable jungle was accounted one of the fine deeds of the war.

Forty-six Months a Prisoner

By ANDRÉ BANDONI

[ILLUSTRATED WITH DRAWINGS BY THE AUTHOR]

The author of this article, a French soldier and artist, was captured by the Germans in the very first fighting in Alsace—after all the other men in his squad had fallen—and remained a prisoner until the signing of the armistice. He is a brother of Lieutenant Georges Rodger Bandoni, who was sent to the United States as a member of the French Advisory Mission, and who spent a whole year in Camps Sheridan, Jackson, and Doniphan as instructor of artillery. When André Bandoni was released at the close of hostilities he prepared for the French Ministry of War a brief account of what he had seen and endured, and this document, translated by his brother, is here presented in substance, with pen-and-ink drawings by the author.

FORTY-SIX months have passed since that fatal day in the Vosges Mountains when the first wave of the barbarians swept over the line of dead Frenchmen and made prisoners of the few unfortunates still left alive. Years of tortured waiting have intervened, and many of my comrades of those years now sleep in the graves of exiles.

So brutal was the treatment inflicted upon us that many clashes occurred between our captors and us until hunger and weakness drove us to surly submission. After we had been thoroughly searched and robbed of money, jewelry, and even the pictures and letters of our loved ones, we were driven to work at the point of the pistol or bayonet. Our first work was grave-digging. The burying of the vast masses of German dead gave us a grim satisfaction, while sorrow wrung our hearts over our own beloved heroes.

Finally, we were carried further from the front and the noise of the guns grew fainter and fainter. We listened eagerly for news. Had the French sunk under the blows of the terrible engine of militarism? Our captors delighted to keep us in ignorance. We knew not even when the hour of Joffre, the hour of the Marne, came. Weary months passed before that news sifted in to us.

Whenever we were transferred by rail from one point to another, we were huddled together, the sick, the wounded, the well, into cattle cars and sent on long, long journeys. We were greeted at the various stations by German men and women waving flags and singing "Deutschland über alles," and taunting us. Endless-seeming days at last terminated in various camps; some had barracks, some only canvas tents, while at other places the French were herded in the open, like cattle; they had to construct their own dugouts, or else perish in the rain and cold. An officer visited each camp to read orders, explain court-martial, and enumerate the hundreds of things that were "verboten."

Very soon after our arrival we were organized into squads for various kinds of work; some went to the quarries, some to the mines, some to the roads and railways, but all were subjected to a life of slavery and inhuman deprivation of food.

For months we were not allowed to send news of our whereabouts to our families. Imagine the agony of suspense on either side! At last came the first letters and packages—through the Red Cross. The letters filled our starving hearts, while the money orders and packages revived our starving bodies. The rigors of prison life were somewhat relaxed, and we were allowed to amuse ourselves with drawing, painting, woodcarving, and music. Yes, we sang! And then we arranged concerts and theatricals—anything to take our minds off our misery and cheer the fainting hearts of many comrades.

The prisons were becoming crowded, for now to our numbers were added Belgians, Russians, Serbians, Italians, and Rumanians. Strange dialogues took place, in which gesture and facial expression had more weight than words. Necessity overcame the barriers of unknown speech. I hope the Russian prisoners will never forget the cordial welcome we French gave them in November, 1914, at the Bavarian camp of Lech-field. But this fraternizing of the allied prisoners did not suit the Germans. They sought to sow dissension and distrust among us—and succeeded in only a few instances.

Some of the neutral nations sent committees into the prison camps to "investigate conditions." What could they see or learn except what the Germans desired? They had the stage set for the visits, and exploited the concerts, theatricals, and their activities. Then when the visitors had departed, we were "punished." The allied nationalities were separated into barb-wired camps, while armed sentries paced between to prevent communication. The French were also isolated into "blocks" behind barbed wire, being scattered thus on the ground that they were the most "unruly." Yet all this did not prevent escapes over or under the wire, and visiting went on between the allies, thus keeping up our spirits. Also, many practical jokes were played upon our stupid jailers, who could only reply with brutality.

So we came to know all the horrors of the various modes of punishment. In some camps "the stake" was used; to this the prisoner was chained and left, according to season, either in the burning sun until fainting or in the snow or icy rain until so frozen that only a remnant of life was left—often death released him. In other camps "the silo" was used. This was a horrible hole in the ground, with no covering overhead; and filthy stuff, given the name of food, was thrown to him just often enough to keep him from dying. But worst of all was "the cage"; this instrument of torture was of iron bars; it was too small for a man either to lie down in and stretch out, or to stand erect; his limbs were necessarily bent and cramped all the time.

Another "exquisite joke" of the Huns was to interrogate the prisoners, learn their former occupation and reverse violently all their former modes of life. Hence, the professional men were sent to quarries, mines, roads, or into the swamps or the turf-pits.

We welcomed being sent to the country to harvest the crops. Here we studied the peasants and learned their triple form of slavery under the vicar, the schoolmaster, and the Mayor, who all taught that the Kaiser was supreme. We French took delight in introducing ideas of liberty and democracy, and dealt some terrific blows to the passive habit of implicit obedience which had enslaved the German Nation.

These various experiences were a school for us, for we allied prisoners grew more to cherish the ideals for which we had fought and were now being tortured. Not even death could take from us the spirit of resistance to militarism. So thousands perished, not only through plain murder but through tortures such as I have described; and to these was often added the horror of epidemics of typhus and cholera. In the latter case allied doctors were permitted to come, but with empty hands, and the little they could do in the circumstances was bravely performed. In rare instances a few German doctors remained at their posts of duty, and some thus gave their lives; but the majority fled with the other officials from the doomed camps. As our weaker comrades thus yielded to disease, torture, hope deferred, we reverently regarded them. They were unsung heroes who went down under inhuman odds. They fill hallowed graves, the graves of heroes; yet they live in our memories, in our heart of hearts. They are the heroes of that awful list marked officially "missing."

Thus the weary years dragged on. Our struggle was to keep our faith, our cheerfulness, and to uphold the faint-hearted. Daily we climbed our gloomy calvary.

Now a steady stream of new prisoners came to bring despair. The battle lines, east and west, were raging; brothers and friends were falling. Dark, dark was the cloud, indeed! But we steadfastly believed that Joffre, Pétain, and Foch would yet turn that cloud into silver. By no means should the enemy break our spirit or our faith! They could place us once more on French soil, and at the point of pistol or bayonet force us, as unarmed men, to dig and serve, but only a small amount of labor could they wring from us, for many gave their lives rather than serve the enemies of France, while others fell victims to the shells and bullets of their own comrades just across No Man's Land.

At last, in May of 1917, there came a glorious light from the west; a light that had its origin beyond the ocean! And to the shout that had greeted it from London to Paris and on to Rome was added the open rejoicing of prisoners who refused to remain silent. America had entered the war!

The Germans looked on us and smiled. The newspapers made haste to reassure the anxious population. "The American army does not exist," they said. "Such forces as the Americans have are composed of idealists and business men, who would never dream of drawing sword against the Kaiser's cohorts; and even if they tried it, their ships would meet the fate of the Lusitania."

We waited feverishly. Then came the news of the formidable army landed on our beloved shores and eagerly training for battle! At last the Germans seemed suddenly to awaken to their danger. While there was yet time they must make a supreme effort—before those Americans were ready. So the line of battle swayed to and fro, while we watched Foch with bated breath. The wall of steel was holding now, for, marching, marching, came Pershing, and the Star-Spangled Banner floated beside our Tricolor in the storm of shot and shell and the haze of poisonous gas. American blood, noble and generous, and faithful to the memory of Lafayette and Rochambeau, flowed upon the martyred soil of France! The day of the Hun was over. The hour of victory for human liberty had struck.

Japan and the Peace Settlements

THOSE portions of the German Peace Treaty (Articles 156-158) which transfer to Japan the former German rights in Shantung Peninsula have become the subject of fierce dispute, first, between the Chinese and Japanese themselves, and, secondly, in the United States, particularly in the Senate, where certain Republican Senators have attacked the treaty especially upon this ground. That these articles were formulated under the combined pressure of the Italian withdrawal from the conference because of Fiume, the discontent of Belgium threatening a similar secession, and the imminent possibility that Japan, disappointed and incensed at the failure of her efforts to have a clause of racial equality inserted, would refuse to sign the treaty and the League of Nations covenant if she were refused her demands in the matter of Shantung, was repeatedly set forth by Paris correspondents in close touch with the proceedings of the Peace Conference. The further complication of the secret agreements made by Japan with Great Britain, France, and Italy in 1917, by which these nations, at a peculiarly difficult moment of the war, pledged themselves to support Japan's Shantung claims, and even of an agreement signed by China herself that the Shantung rights should be taken over by Japan from Germany, was likewise pointed out.

President Wilson has stated that the Shantung settlement was decided on only after emphatic assurances from the Japanese that the territory in question would be returned within a reasonable time; but the Chinese and their friends declare that these are idle promises, and insist that Japan should officially put itself on record in the matter. That this would be done by Japan was prophesied by President Wilson; in the event that it were not done, he intimated, he himself would issue a statement on the understanding reached at the Peace Conference.

The prediction of the President was fulfilled with the official statement of Viscount Uchida in Tokio on Aug. 3, reiterating Japan's intention "to hand back Shantung in full sovereignty to China, retaining only economic privileges," and intimating that an international and not a purely Japanese community would be established at Tsingtao. A reference to the Japanese-Chinese secret treaty of 1915 evoked from President Wilson a statement that at Paris he had explicitly repudiated any form of acquiescence in that treaty. Shortly afterward various patriotic Chinese societies organized in the United States made from Washington a formal reply to Viscount Uchida, in which it was pointed out, on the basis of Japan's own action in the past, that a return of sovereignty without the return of economic rights was meaningless, and that a full and unconditional restoration of the territory involved must be demanded. Similar views were publicly expressed by persons of prominence friendly to China, notably by Dr. E. T. Williams, technical adviser on Far Eastern matters at the Peace Conference, in testimony given on Aug. 22 before the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate.

SHANTUNG QUESTION IN PARIS

Dr. Williams stated that the President, in discussing the disposition of German-leased rights in Kiao-Chau Bay and Tsingtao, had told him in Paris last April that "the war appears to have been fought to establish the sanctity of treaties; and though some of them are unconscionable, they must be kept." His own view of the Shantung award was expressed as follows:

My opinion is that the decision was most unfortunate. I believe the Kiaochau territory and the railroads running from Tsing-tao through Shantung Province ought to have gone automatically to China at the Peace Conference. They were taken from China by a German act of piracy, and the fact that Japan got them from China afterward did not alter the fact that they should have reverted to China, the sovereign nation.

Reviewing the negotiations at Paris, Dr. Williams threw new light on the psychology of President Wilson in forming the ultimate decision. Dr. Williams, following the receipt by the American delegation of a protest from the legislative assembly of Shantung Province against awarding Kiaochau to Japan, had pointed out to the conference that, under the treaty with China in 1858, the United States was bound to protect China in this contingency. Instructed to put in writing his suggestion that a clause be inserted in the treaty providing for the return of Kiaochau to China, he did this; subsequently he was asked by the President to confer with the Far Eastern experts of Great Britain and France, and to file a report stating whether it would be better for China if the German rights in Shantung were transferred directly and unqualifiedly to Japan, or whether the Japanese-Chinese treaty of May 25, 1915, should be carried out. (This treaty included a promise by Japan to return to China all of Shantung on four conditions, involving perpetual and exclusive control by Japan of the port of Tsing-tao.)

On April 24 President Wilson told him that Great Britain and France were bound to fulfill their secret treaties with Japan. Dr. Williams then suggested that the award be made on condition of reversion to China within a year, and, at the President's request, put this in writing. On April 24 the combined report of the Far Eastern experts was sent. It expressed the view that it would be better for China to have the Shantung territory awarded to Japan outright rather than to fulfill the terms of the treaty of 1915. Dr. Williams and the British expert subsequently filed an independent memorandum insisting that neither of these things be done, but that a blanket return to China be provided for.

In the memorandum submitted by Dr. Williams to President Wilson the former said that the treaty of 1915 was obtained from China by force and duress; that Japan at the time had two divisions of crack troops in China and sent two more; and that she gave China only fifty-one hours to comply with an ultimatum. Regarding the President's Fourteen Points, which Mr. Wilson had told him previously did not, unfortunately, cover China's case, Dr. Williams in his memorandum pointed out that the President had broadened the scope of these principles in his address at Washington's tomb on July 4, and that he believed this portion of the President's peace program did cover the Shantung case; on this ground he urged abrogation of the secret treaties and a settlement of the Shantung question on its merits.

On April 30, however, he received word that the decision, in the form embodied in the Peace Treaty, had been arrived at.

In his further testimony Dr. Williams said that Chinese resentment over the award to Japan involved danger of further war, and that American prestige in China had been appreciably lowered, inasmuch as the United States had invited China to enter the war, and that China had thus expected the United States to stand by her at the Peace Conference.

MINISTER REINSCH RESIGNS

As a direct result, it was stated, of the Shantung award and the failure of the United States to support China's claims against those of Japan, Dr. Paul S. Reinsch, American Minister to China since the early days of the Wilson Administration, tendered his resignation, which was received at Washington on Aug. 26. It was the opinion of those in close touch with the Chinese situation, and with Mr. Reinsch's work at Peking, that his position with the Peking Government had become untenable as the result of his having given that Government assurance that China's interests would be supported by America at the Peace Conference, thus inducing China to declare war on Germany.

Meanwhile China's situation, after the refusal of her instructed delegates to sign the Peace Treaty with Germany, remained anomalous. On Aug. 17 it was announced from Peking that the edict declaring the war with Germany at an end would not be issued until the treaty with Austria was signed. The Chinese Government was then considering what measures would be taken when the mandate was issued, including the right of Germans to extraterritoriality. It still maintained unaltered its determination not to negotiate with Japan regarding the Shantung provisions of the Peace Treaty.

An important development in the Chinese-Japanese situation was the signing of the Austrian Peace Treaty on Sept. 10 at St. Germain by the Chinese delegates, whereby China became a member of the League of Nations. This step, when the League of Nations begins to function, will enable China to present her case with respect to Shantung and the 1915 treaties before the League.

KOREAN POLICY INDICTED

The defenders of China's attitude are numerous. One of these is Professor Homer B. Hulbert, for twenty-three years a resident of Korea and former official adviser of the Korean Emperor, who on Aug. 16 filed a statement with the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in which he said that the Japanese had ruled Korea against the will of the people with an iron hand, and in many ways had proved the hardest kind of taskmasters.

With the statement he filed copies of letters written by the Korean Emperor fourteen years ago to the President of the United States and the King of England, protesting against the act of Japan in assuming a protectorate over his country. In his letter to President Roosevelt the Emperor declared that "the so-called treaty of protectorate recently concluded between Korea and Japan was extorted at the point of the sword and under duress," and that he, as the head of the Korean Government, had never consented to the negotiation of the treaty. In the letter to the King of England he sought aid in bringing the dispute before The Hague tribunal for adjudication.

In his statement Mr. Hulbert said:

The time has come when it seems necessary to lay before the American people some facts bearing upon the request of the Korean people that they be freed from the tyranny of Japan. This request was made by millions of that nation in a perfectly peaceful way on March 1, 1919, and was met by a perfect orgy of abuse and persecution on the part of the military authorities there. Thousands of people were beaten, tortured, and even killed, and women were treated with obscene brutality.

PROTRACTED HOSTILITY

Professor Hulbert traced the history of Japanese-Korean relations from 600 B. C. to the present time, and said that there never was a time in all these centuries "when Japan did not exhibit a hostile and aggressive spirit toward the Korean people and Government." After describing the assassinations and intrigues of 1884 he continued:

The people of America have read in all the papers indescribable atrocities of which Japan has been guilty during the last few months. And now Japan, whipped to it by public opinion, says that the military party has gone too far and reforms will be instituted. The apologists of Japan have been saying that the civil party will change all that. Well; I ask the American public to note that the following things were common occurrences in Korea when the civil party was dominant there and Prince Ito was the Governor General:

Because three Koreans, maddened by the fact that all their land had been taken by the Japanese for railroad purposes, without a cent of immediate or prospective payment, went out one night and tore up a few feet of a construction track, they were taken out and crucified and then shot to pieces. There are hundreds of photographs of this event.

When a telegraph line was cut near a country village by parties unknown but presumably by Korean guerrilla fighters, the Japanese came and burned down ten villages and left the people to freeze and starve during the Winter. One old man over eighty years old, on his knees, begged them to spare his home. The Japanese ran him through with their swords and threw his body into the burning rafters of his own home.

Within a stone's throw of my own house in Seoul a Korean lived who refused to sell his house to the Japanese for one-quarter of its value. One night six Japanese, stripped stark naked, broke into the house and shocked the inmates so that they deserted the house and fled to the country, and the Japanese got the place for nothing.

A Presbyterian hospital had forty cases in one month of Koreans who came begging to be cured of the morphine habit which the Japanese had taught them, and although Americans caught Japanese red-handed in the act of selling morphine to Koreans and notified the authorities, not a thing was done to stop the damnable traffic.

For a score of other reasons I affirm that Japan's proposal to effect reforms in Korea by establishing there a mixed civil and military régime is ludicrous. The very fact that they include the military shows that they propose to govern Korea by intimidation, whatever be the name under which it is carried out.

There is no right solution of the question except the restoration of the complete independence of the Korean people. They have always been so abused and insulted by the Japanese that the continuation of any Japanese control is simply unbearable. The Koreans will not consent to it, and either they must be made free or else the world must look on and see the rapid extinction of a nation of 10,000,000 people who are intrinsically far more "civilized" than are the Japanese themselves.

Japan, as at present conducted, is an anachronism. There is no room for brutal autocracy in this world from now on to the crack of doom. The sooner the Japanese people come to realize this and determine to take things in hand and oust the bureaucrats, the better for them and the better for the whole world. The question will never be settled without a complete revolution in Japan. The sooner it comes the better.

Japan's policy in Korea was also attacked by Kiusic Kimm, a Korean educated in the United States and head of the Korean delegation in Paris, on his arrival in New York on Aug. 21. In giving out the petitions submitted to the Peace Conference in May, Mr. Kimm declared that the "suffering of Korea under Japanese rule was worse than that of Belgium under the Germans," and that the independence movement leaders believed that the Japanese military class had the definite aim of denationalizing the race. He declared that the Japanese had about 150,000 soldiers in the country, but that the desire for independence was universal among 10,000,000 Koreans.

Japanese control had fastened itself upon the life of the people in many ways, the delegate added. Estates and property of Koreans are supervised by the Japanese, the educational system is controlled, and none of the students is allowed to study in foreign countries. Spreading of the Christian religion is opposed, and the selling of opium and the formation of vicious habits are encouraged.

Intimations that Japan was aiming at complete Asiatic dominance through use of China's man power and economic resources were embodied by the Korean delegates in a letter written to Lloyd George.

Similarly Thomas F. Millard, for twenty years a traveler and student in the Orient and editor of a Far East magazine, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Aug. 18 that all the American experts on Oriental affairs at the Peace Conference had agreed that the Shantung decision would breed war. He emphasized America's unpleasant position in view of her official promises, given by the Ambassador to China, Mr. Reinsch, after the United States had invited China to enter the war, to support China's claims at the Peace Conference. France and England, said Mr. Millard, had given rather colorless pledges of this import, and Dr. Reinsch, in view of the fact that the cables to the United States were not working, assumed the responsibility of making similar pledges for his own country. Statements of the same trend were made before the committee by Dr. John O. Ferguson, official adviser to the President of the Chinese Republic, on Aug. 20.

JAPANESE STATEMENTS

In contrast with the protests of China and her friends, the utterances of Japanese diplomats in July and August were optimistic in the extreme. On July 17 Viscount Ishii, Japanese Ambassador to Washington, on his arrival at Tokio stated publicly that there was no collision of vital interests between Japan and the United States: the latter country looked mainly to Europe and Latin America for her markets, and, contented with the strict observance by the powers of the open-door policy in China, had no thought of an economic monopoly of the Chinese market. The thinking people of America, he declared, were as a whole quite satisfied with the situation in the Far East. Talk of a possible eventual war between the United States and Japan, he intimated, was the work of propagandists.

A sterner and less conciliatory tone was adopted by Viscount Kato, who was the Minister responsible for the treaty of Japan with China in 1915, in a speech delivered in Tokio on Aug. 18. The import of this address was that Japan would back her Korean claims strongly, and would maintain her special position in China with all her power, though admitting the right of other nations to develop their own interests within proper limits. Viscount Kato characterized the attitude of the Chinese peace delegates as treachery toward Japan, in view of the agreement signed by China in 1915 that the rights in Tsing-tao should be taken over by Japan, and expressed great satisfaction, as prime mover of the 1915 treaty, that the Japanese claims had been accorded by the conference. The disturbances in China endangering the life and property of Japanese subjects were referred to by Viscount Kato, and it was intimated that, though Japan should seek friendly relations with China, the Japanese Government should preserve a "stern and dignified attitude."

On Aug. 27, in addressing a meeting of the Government party at Morioka, Japan, Premier Hara declared that the Chinese situation was caused by China's misunderstanding of Japan's sincere intentions. He said in part:

Japan has no ambitious designs against China. On the contrary, the Ministry is urgently advocating the importance of closer friendly relations. The day will come when China will realize the sincerity of Japan.

The attitude of the Japanese press during this period was of pronounced hostility to the United States Senators who had espoused the Chinese viewpoint on Shantung. Public statements made by Senator Borah regarding war with Japan were denounced as "wanton" by the Hochi, which declared that, despite the opinions of America, Japan would never hesitate to carry out her rights guaranteed by the Peace Treaty. American race riots were referred to in a significant tone. The Chinese question, by other papers, was placed on a par with the Mexican problem in the United States. America's attitude of encouragement to China's aspirations was declared by the Jiji to be dangerous in the possibilities it opened of widespread disturbances and incidents similar to those that happened in the Boxer war.

NEW PROMISES OF REFORM

As for abuses committed by the Japanese administration in Korea, the Japanese Embassy at Washington on Aug. 20 made public the text of an imperial rescript and a statement by Premier Hara issued in Tokio the preceding day, announcing the abolition of military rule in Korea and the introduction of a civilian régime. Both documents announced, further, that all distinctions between Koreans and other Japanese subjects, and between Korean and Japanese administration, would be abolished, and that a regulation police force under control of the local Governors would take the place of the present military gendarmerie. Only the riots in March, it was declared, had delayed the introduction of these reforms before. Two civilians, Admiral Baron Saito and Mr. Midzuno, had been appointed, respectively, Governor General and Director General of Administration. Mr. Midzuno would be charged with the actual administrative work, and had had training for this post throughout twenty years' service in the Home Office and as Secretary of the Interior in the Terauchi Ministry. He had been a frequent visitor to Europe, and was noted for his democratic ideas.

On Aug. 31 Baron Saito, just before his departure for Korea, sketched an extremely favorable program and announced that he would adopt a liberal policy and fair treatment to all. Koreans, he said, would be allowed to hold office. Korean traditions would be respected. There would be no ruling by the sword or intimidation by the military. Shortly before this Dr. Syngman Rhee, "President of the Korean Republic," had characterized the appointment of a civil Governor in Korea as a mere "face-saving" diplomatic expedient, inasmuch as the military administration would remain. Even if reforms were instituted, he declared, the growing spirit of independence in Korea would not be diminished.

Baron Saito arrived at Seoul on Sept. 2. As he and his wife were leaving the railway station, a bomb was exploded beneath his carriage. No one was killed, but several persons were wounded, including William Harrison, brother of former Mayor Carter Harrison of Chicago, and his wife, who were slightly injured.

On Aug. 26 the Supreme Court of Seoul, which had heard the appeal of the Rev. Eli Miller Mowry of Mansfield, Ohio, a Presbyterian Minister, from conviction on a charge of having sheltered Korean agitators, quashed the original judgment and remanded the missionary before the Court of Appeals. Mr. Mowry had been sentenced to six months' imprisonment at hard labor.

In a proclamation addressed to "the people of the world" the "Republic of Korea" was proclaimed in Washington on Aug. 31. The proclamation was signed by Dr. Syngman Rhee as "President of the Republic of Korea," and by J. Kiusic S. Kimm, Chairman of the Korean Commission to the Peace Conference. In the proclamation the sovereignty of Japan over Korea was repudiated, and the world was asked to accept Korea as an independent Government, founded on the principles expressed in the Declaration of Independence and in the utterances of President Wilson.

LOAN CONSORTIUM

The loan consortium determined on by representatives of Great Britain, France, Belgium, the United States, and Japan last May was still in the balance in September. On Aug. 22 it had been said that the Japanese militarists had won a victory in inducing the Japanese Cabinet to exclude Mongolia and Manchuria, where Japanese interests were firmly entrenched, from the scope of this consortium. It was stated that this decision had been opposed by Viscount Uchida, and that the action was contrary to Washington's view of the best Chinese financial policy. On Aug. 29 Yuko Hamaguchi, President of a prominent Japanese bank, made a statement in which he laid down the following principles, advocated by the Kenseikei Party, of which he was an influential member:

Economic loans should be excluded from the scope of the consortium. Manchuria, Mongolia, and Shantung should also be excluded. Existing loans should be recognized if desired. The economic loans of the new group should be restricted to large enterprises.

Fear was expressed by Hamaguchi that the international consortium project, devised to overthrow the spheres of influence and to contribute through the influx of capital to the development of China, might endanger the freedom of that country by substituting the great collective influence of the powers associated in the loan. His own opinion was that the system of free loans was preferable to that of joint ones. It was not, he thought, advisable for Japan to participate in the joint loans at the cost of her rights of priority already acquired in China. Because of his authoritative financial position the statement of Mr. Hamaguchi was received in Washington with the greatest interest.

NEW JAPANESE AMBASSADOR

A dispatch from Tokio Sept. 5 announced the forthcoming appointment of Kijuro Shidehara as Ambassador to the United States to succeed Viscount Kikujiro Ishii. The new appointee is one of the youngest Japanese to receive an Ambassadorial post, being only 47 years old. His diplomatic experience, however, has been extensive. He has been Consul at London and Antwerp and has served as Counselor of the Japanese Embassy at Washington. He became Minister to the Netherlands in July, 1914, but was recalled soon after the outbreak of the war to the post he has been holding, that of Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Peace of 1814-15

By HAROLD SPENDER

[OF THE LONDON CHRONICLE]

THE statesmen of 1814 patched up a peace with France far more rapidly than the Great Ten or Four have patched up a peace with Germany today. There was actually a peace with France within six weeks of Napoleon's first abdication. But the story only begins there; and there was soon the end of that beginning. For that peace was torn up into small fragments by the campaign of the Hundred Days, and the whole thing had to be done over again with infinite repetition of toil and labor. Even then, the second peace was only another beginning; for the complete resettlement of Europe after the wars of Napoleon may be said to have occupied two-thirds of the nineteenth century.

Those tremendous events are still worth recalling. The first abdication of Napoleon—at the end of that extraordinary fight which he put up, even after Leipsic, the Battle of the Nations—took place on April 11, 1814. The first treaty was signed on May 30. Except in one respect, it was a peace of clemency. No indemnities were exacted in that first peace—not even after twenty years of European war! The French colonies were almost all restored. France was deprived of her imperial conquests; but she was allowed to retain some of her revolutionary winnings, and she retained the boundaries of Nov. 1, 1792—the third year of the revolution. But the one exception was fatal. Louis XVIII.—that old tired Bourbon exile who had “learned nothing and forgot nothing”—was propped on the throne. He threatened the peasant proprietors with the loss of their land; he brought back the decayed nobles; above all, he abolished the Tricolor, the flag of a hundred battles and the symbol of a thousand liberties. He paved all roads for the return of Napoleon.

Meanwhile, the Allies had been helping him. The Congress of Vienna—the real parallel to the conference of Paris—was even slower at starting than its illustrious successor of today. France had handed over all her conquests to be dealt with by the conquering Allies, and in return she had a place in the congress. Five months passed before the congress assembled—at Vienna on Nov. 3, 1814. It sat for three months. Its proceedings exhibited the most amazing resemblances to the present conference. There were secret treaties to cumber the ground—stocks of them, contracted in the heat of struggle with Napoleon. There was the same difference of opinion about Poland. It was even worse. So fiercely did those precious allies differ—so dearly did they love one another—so subtly did Talleyrand intrigue for France—that their armies were actually in motion against one another when the sudden whisper of “Boney” sent them scuttling back to their barracks. But it was too late. On March 4, 1815, Napoleon landed near Cannes, enthralled his old soldiery, advanced to Paris, and the “Hundred Days” began.

Waterloo was a “near thing,” according to Wellington; and he had every reason to know. But it served. Europe was allowed a second chance; and Napoleon this time was sent too far away to be dangerous. On July 8 Louis XVIII.—poor France!—was shuffled back on his throne, this time a little sobered by destiny. Again the statesmen set themselves to fashion peace. This time it took a great deal longer. The second treaty with France was not achieved till Nov. 20, 1815. It was a harsher document.

The boundaries of France were thrown back to the limits of 1790—a fact of which Paris is very much aware today. The Allies now imposed an indemnity of $140,000,000—a small figure in our present lights, but a heavy burden for the impoverished France of 1815. Paris was compelled to disgorge all the art treasures “conveyed” by Napoleon from foreign capitals. An allied Army of Occupation was planted in the northeastern fortresses of France for five years.

But these terms were a featherweight compared to what Prussia desired. It is worth while for Frenchmen to remember today that it was British fair play which saved her from dismemberment in 1815. Prussia wanted Alsace and Lorraine in 1815 just as she afterward secured them in 1871. It was Wellington and Castlereagh who postponed that crime for nearly two generations.

Then the victors went back to their congress—but with a difference. This time the conquering alliance—Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia—claimed to call the tune. France was excluded. The minor powers were left on the doorstep. Then was formed that great "Quadruple Alliance"—the "Great Four" of those days—which was not so entirely different from the Covenanted League of today as some people suppose. True, it came to be called "Holy," and no one as yet has applied that term to the League of Nations. But that was due to the quaint religiosity of the Czar Alexander, who imposed on his reluctant allies a series of Crusading Christian vows which played little part in their subsequent proceedings.

People talk as if the Holy Alliance passed away like a Summer cloud. Nothing could be further from the truth. For ten years it bestrode Europe like a Colossus. It was a very effective League of Nations. It guaranteed the boundaries delimited by the Congress of Vienna. It went further—and here was its vital error. It guaranteed the forms of government imposed within those boundaries.

It was the British revolt against that doctrine that brought that great alliance to an end. But four Congresses sat before the end came. In 1821, at the Congress of Laibach, Castlereagh only protested when the Austrian armies marched against the Italians. In 1822, at Verona, Canning first threw out the idea of self-determination as a right when the French proposed to restore Ferdinand and the Inquisition to the throne of Spain. It was not until the French troops actually crossed the Pyrenees that England withdrew from the congress, and, in the Old World and the New, asserted the right of nations to decide their own destinies.

Romain Rolland's Plea for Post-War Unity

A Manifesto and a Reply

During the war the attitude of Romain Rolland, the author of "Jean-Christophe," was a source of irritation to patriotic Frenchmen, and his "internationalist" point of view was severely condemned. The following plea for post-war unity, written by M. Rolland and signed by a number of internationally known writers and publicists, was reproduced in a recent number of the French publication, L'Humanité:

WORKERS in the realms of thought, companions dispersed to the four corners of the globe, separated for five years by armies, by the censor, and the hatred of nations at war, we address to you, at this hour which sees barriers fall and the reopening of frontiers, an appeal that our brotherly union may be reformed—may rise again, a new union established on a more solid, safer basis than that which previously existed.

"War has scattered our ranks. Most intellectuals have put their knowledge, their art, their reason at the service of Governments. We do not wish to accuse any one, to reproach any one. We know the weakness of individual characters and the elementary force of strong collective currents. The latter overthrew the former immediately, for nothing had been foreseen, and there was no possibility of resistance. Let us at least make use of the experience we have gained in preparing for the future.

"First let us consider the disasters to which the almost total abdication of the world's intelligence and its voluntary enslavement to uncontrolled forces have led it. The thinkers, the artists, have added to the scourge which is filling Europe, body and soul, with an incalculable flow of the poison of hate. They have sought in the arsenal of their knowledge, of their memory and their imagination the reasons, both new and old, historic, scientific, and poetic, for hate; they have worked that the concept of love might be destroyed among men. And by thus doing they have robbed thought of beauty, they have lowered and degraded it; they who were the representatives of thought. They have made of thought an instrument of the passions and (without being aware of it, perhaps) of the selfish interests of a political or social clan, of a State, of a country, of a class. And now from this savage mêlée, from which the warring nations, conquerors and conquered, are emerging broken and impoverished and, at the bottom of their hearts—though they do not own it—ashamed and humiliated by their sudden madness, comes thought, having lost her diadem, compromised in the nations' struggle.

"Arise! Let us free thought from its compromising alliances, from its humiliating connections, from its hidden servitudes! Thought is no one's servant. We are the servants of thought. We have no other master. We are here to carry its torch, to defend its light, to rally beguiled men around its beacon. Our part, our duty, is to maintain one stable centre, to point to the north star, in the midst of the rush of passion and of night. Among these passions of pride and mutual destruction we make no choice; we reject them all. We honor truth alone, free, without frontiers, without limits, without racial or caste prejudices. We certainly do not lose interest in humanity. It is for her we work, but for her universally. We do not know peoples. We only know the people—unique, universal, the suffering, struggling people, suffering, falling, and rising again, advancing always on the stony path drenched with its tears—the people which all men recognize, all equally our brothers. And it is to enable them, like us, to become conscious of this fraternity that we uplift above their blind wars, the Arch of Alliance—free thought, one, multiple, and eternal."

This declaration was adopted on June 23, 1919, and bore the following signatures:

Jane Addams, United States; René Arcos, France; Henri Barbusse, Léon Bazalgette, France; Jean Richard Bloch, France; Roberto Bracco, Italy; Dr. L. E. J. Brouwer, Holland; A. de Chateaubriant, France; Georges Duhamel, France; Professor Einstein, Germany; Dr. Fredrick van Eeden, Holland; George Eekhoud, Belgium; Professor Forel, Switzerland; Verner von Heidenstam, Sweden; Selma Lagerlöf, Sweden; Professor Max Lehmann, Germany; Carl Lindhagen, Sweden; Mr. Lopez-Pico, Catalonia; Heinrich Mann, Germany; Marcel Martinet, France; Franz Masereel, Belgium; Emile Masson, France; Jacques Mesnil, Belgium; Sophus Michaëli, Denmark; Matthias Morhardt, France; Professor George Fr. Nicolai, Germany; Eugenio d'Ors, Catalonia; Professor A. Prenant, France; Paul Signac, France; Jules Romains, France; G. Thiesson, France; Henry Vandervelde, Belgium; Charles Valdrac, France; Léon Werth, France; Israel Zangwill, Bertrand Russell, England; Romain Rolland, France; Han Ryner, France; Stefan Zweig, Austria.

The Paris Temps in its comment on M. Rolland's appeal said that the author's intentions might be perfectly honest, but, even so, the text of the appeal was not satisfactory. Certain general and opportune formulas could be subscribed to. M. Romain Rolland's phrases were more or less happily composed. The Temps continued as follows:

The difficulty begins with the application which M. Romain Rolland gives them. The outcome of the whole appeal is this, that it puts Germany in the same rank as the Entente, the Governments of the Central Empires with those of the allied powers, all intellectuals, and all nations. "We do not wish to accuse any one, we reproach nobody." Such an excess of gentleness toward some results in a lack of justice to others. Equity does not permit that the balance shall be held equal between the guilty and the innocent, the murderer and his victim. "We know the weakness of individual characters and the elementary force of collective currents. * * * " That is very well expressed, but no strong current would have prevented plenty of Frenchmen from protesting if it had been their Government which had violated Belgium, burned libraries, and bombarded cathedrals. Besides, France was incapable of having a Government which could make itself guilty of such atrocities. * * * It is possible to understand that retrograde parties in neutral countries should have been Germanophile; it is even possible to understand the point of view of the Frenchman of the extreme right before the war, blinded enough by social preoccupations to regard the Berlin headquarters staff as a rampart of civilization. But what is beyond comprehension is that democrats like M. Romain Rolland and his companions should have indulgences for the home of Kaiserism and militarism. Judging this war quite apart from the point of view of patriotic sentiment, and solely from that of intellectual evolution, the victory of Germany would have been a disaster, while that of France has been the salvation of all those ideas for which M. Romain Rolland is supposed to stand.

The situation must be made perfectly clear. * * * French and allied intellectuals cannot clear Germany of this great crime toward humanity. Those German intellectuals who took part in it or who did not raise their voices loudly against its perpetration will always be unworthy of any personal relations with us. Doubtless art and knowledge have superior and irrefragable rights. A beautiful German work of art preserves its aesthetic value; a German discovery cannot be ignored. It is ridiculous to wage war against philosophers or against musicians who departed this planet thirty to one hundred years before the mobilization and who were being extolled to the skies five years ago. But it is one thing to bow before what is beautiful and true, whatever their provenance; it is quite another to hold out the hand to contemporaries disquailed both morally and humanly.

Anatole France on the Teacher's Task

Banishing Hatred and War Ideas

ANATOLE FRANCE, the famous French novelist, delivered the opening address before the Congress of the Trade Unions of French Elementary School Teachers, held at Tours in the second week of August, and the keynote of his speech was sounded in this sentence: "The war has sufficiently demonstrated that the popular education of tomorrow must be altogether different from that of former days." It was, M. France said, with mingled feelings of anxiety and hope that he addressed the teachers, for the future was in their hands, and in great measure it would be made by their intelligences and their pains.

What a task was theirs at this moment, when the old social systems were crumbling under the weight of errors, and victors and vanquished, exchanging looks of hatred, were falling into a common abyss of misery. In the social and moral disorder produced by the war and perpetuated by the peace which had followed it, they had everything to make and to remake. They must create a new humanity, awaken new intelligence, if they did not wish Europe to fall into imbecility and barbarism.

In the first place, they must banish from the school everything that could make children like war and its crimes, and that alone would demand long and constant effort, unless indeed all the panoplies were, in the near future, swept away by the blast of universal revolution.

In the French bourgeoisie great and small, and even in the proletariat, the destructive instincts with which the Germans had been justly reproached were sedulously cultivated. Only a few days before M. de la Fouchardiere had asked at a bookseller's for books suitable for a little girl, and had been offered nothing but accounts and pictures of slaughter, massacres, and exterminations. Next mid-Lent they would see in Paris, in the Champs Elysées and on the boulevards, thousands and thousands of little boys dressed by their inept mothers as Generals and Field Marshals. Motion pictures would show children the beauties of war and thus prepare them for the military career, and so long as there were soldiers there would be wars. The diplomats of the Allies had allowed Germany still to have soldiers in order to be able to keep them themselves. Children were going to be brought up to be soldiers from the cradle.

It was for the teachers to break with these dangerous practices. They must make the children love peace and the works of peace. They must teach them to hate war. They must banish from their teaching everything that excited hatred of the foreigner, even of our enemies of yesterday. Not that one ought to be indulgent to crime and absolve all the guilty, but because every people, no matter what, at any time whatever, included more victims than criminals, because innocent generations must not be punished for the guilty, and, above all, because all the peoples had much to forgive one another.

M. France went on to recommend his hearers to read a recent book by Michel Corday, "Les Mains Propres," ("Clean Hands,") and quoted from it the sentence, "I hate him who debases man to the level of the beast by inciting him to attack anybody that does not resemble him." "From the bottom of my heart," said M. France, "I invoke the disappearance of that kind of person from the face of the earth. I hate nothing except hatred."

The most necessary and most simple task of the teacher, he continued, was to make hatred hated. The state to which a devastating war had reduced France and the world imposed upon the teachers duties of exceptional complexity and difficulty. Without hope of obtaining help or support, or even consent, they had to change elementary education from top to bottom in order to train workers.

There was no room in the society of today for any but workers; the others would be swept away by the hurricane. And they must train intelligent workers instructed in the crafts that they practiced, knowing what were their duties to the national community and to the human community.

"Burn," said M. France, "burn all the books that teach hatred! Extol labor and love. Train for us men capable of trampling under foot the vain splendors of barbaric glory and of resisting the sanguinary ambitions of the nationalisms and imperialisms that have annihilated their fathers. No more industrial rivalries! No more wars! Only labor and peace! Whether we like it or not, the time has come when we must either become citizens of the world or see the whole of civilization perish."

M. France suggested that there should be attached to the International of the workers a delegation of the teachers of all nations to formulate in common a universal system of instruction and consider the means to be taken to implant in young minds the ideas from which would spring the peace of the world and the union of the peoples.

He concluded as follows: "Reason, wisdom, intelligence, forces of the mind and heart, you that have always piously invoked, come to me, aid me, strengthen my feeble voice, carry it, if that be possible, to all the peoples of the world, and diffuse it everywhere where men of good-will are found, to listen to the beneficent truth! A new order of things is born! The powers of evil are dying, poisoned by their crime. The covetous and the cruel, the devourers of the peoples, are perishing of a surfeit of blood. Sorely smitten by the fault of their blind or villainous masters, mutilated, decimated, the proletariats yet stand erect. They are going to unite in order to form but a single universal proletariat, and we shall see the fulfillment of the great Socialist prophecy—'the union of the workers will bring peace to the world.'"

Aristocracy's Downfall in Europe

Triumph of the Small Landowner

By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS *

THE three great military monarchies which have lately fallen to pieces—Russian, Austro-Hungarian, and German—were all based upon an aristocracy of large landed properties, whereas the other European countries had become parliamentary and democratic States. Europe was thus divided between two political orders, founded on two social orders—in fact, into two different worlds between which the Elbe was approximately the boundary.

Western Europe, with its ancient civilization, its great cities, its big industries, its intensive agriculture and dense population, where the land is divided up into small or medium-sized properties, and where private fortunes made in industry, in commerce, and in banking form a large proportion of the total wealth of the country, has evolved a type of democratic society consisting mainly of bourgeois, of artisans, workmen, and peasant proprietors. There remain certainly some fragments of the old manorial system—in Spain, the great landed nobles of Andalusia; in England and Ireland, the properties of the landlords; in Italy, the latifundia of the southern provinces and of Lombardy—but these survivals, if they confer upon certain privileged families pre-eminence in the world of society, no longer carry with them political power. The direction of public affairs rests with the middle classes and with the elected representatives of the peasants and working classes, and it is from among the bourgeoisie, above all, that Ministers and party leaders are drawn.

Eastern Europe, with a scattered population, a recent civilization, a backward agriculture, very little industry and a quiet rudimentary economic life, where the soil constitutes almost the only wealth of the country, has remained under the mediaeval manorial system; the land is divided up into large properties belonging to the noble families, on which the great majority of the peasants are either tenants or laborers. The castle dominates the village; the feudal lord, surrounded from childhood by swarms of servants and accustomed to being respected and obeyed, keeps the peasant in a state of fear and dependence. This social power, not being kept in check by the wealth or intellectual competition of a large bourgeoisie, renders the nobles supreme in the political sphere also; it is they who form the Court, the general staff, the Government, who hold the high command in the army, and fill the chief administrative posts. Raised by the favor of the ruling Prince above the masses of his subjects, they have upheld the monarchy by force of arms; the middle classes, few in number and kept in subjection, have had to rest content with junior posts and some measure of material profit. Such has been, with some variations, due mainly to the larger or smaller proportion of Jews, the agrarian and social order in Europe east of the Elbe.

EIGHT LANDED ARISTOCRACIES

In this immense tract of country, where the manorial system held sway, one can count eight landed aristocracies: (1) in Russia, in the districts inhabited by Great Russians and in the Ukraine east of the Dnieper, the pomieschchiks, big landed proprietors whom the Czars, in superficial imitation of Germany, dignified with the title of noble; (2) in the Baltic provinces the "Baltic Barons," a stock of nobles of German origin superimposed upon the agrarian population of Esthonians and Letts; (3) in Rumania, the indigenous stock of Boyars, who remained in possession of their estates during the Turkish domination and intermarried with the Phanariot nobles sent into the country to exploit it in the name of the Sultan; (4) in Hungary, the Magyar magnates and "gentry," who have overflowed from the Magyar districts into those inhabited by Slovak and Rumanian peasants; (5) in Austria, the aristocrats of the Court of Vienna, who possess large domains in the German Alpine provinces and in the Czech lands of the Bohemian Crown; (6) in Prussia, the aristocracy of the eastern provinces, (Brandenburg, Pomerania, Prussia,) the Junkers, the "Rittergut" proprietors, who form the entourage of the King and the officers' corps; (7) in Poland, the szlachta, the old fighting stock, which has become an aristocracy to which the greater part of the land still belongs, although the Russian Government, to weaken the national resistance of which the nobility was the soul, forcibly transferred part of the land to the peasants; (8) in the countries bordering on Poland, the former dependencies of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (Lithuania, White Russia, Western Ukraine) and Galicia, the noble families descended from Polish immigrants or from the indigenous but Polonized big landowners, who today form an aristocracy of Polish language and manners, superimposed upon the indigenous agrarian population, (Lithuanians, White Russians, Little Russians, Ruthenes,) which has remained faithful to its own language, and—where it is of Russian origin—to the Orthodox Church (in Ukraina) or the Catholic-Uniate Church, (in White Russia and in Ruthenia.) Of these eight aristocracies the Russian, the Rumanian, the Magyar, the Polish, and the Prussian, being of the same race as their peasantry, played the part of national leaders; the others, Baltic Barons, Austrian aristocrats, and Polonized nobles of Lithuania, White Russia, and Ukraina, are foreign aristocracies in national opposition to their peasantry.

The war proved a decisive test of the stability of the two social orders; the democratic States went through it without flinching, the monarchies which had engendered the war in the hope of strengthening their position have gone under; from their defeat has sprung the revolution, which is overthrowing all aristocracies. One after the other is threatened or abolished by its subjects in revolt; and the political revolution is being completed by an agrarian revolution.

BEGINNING OF THE REVOLT

This revolt began at the least civilized extremity of Europe—in the Russian Empire; the Bolsheviki, who attained to power by promising peace and the land, disorganized the armed force which alone, in that country of agrarian communism, maintained the class of large proprietors; the peasants, accustomed to feel themselves the legitimate possessors of their village lands, seized them by force from the nobles and proprietors. The new order is not yet stabilized; the land of which the large landowners have been robbed has not yet been divided among the peasants. But the counter-revolutionaries have been forced to relinquish all idea of re-establishing the old order, and to limit their hopes to an indemnity; the allied Governments themselves demand that the Generals should pledge themselves not to question the agrarian revolution.

In the Baltic countries, the Baltic Barons, supported by a German army of occupation, struggled for a long time to keep their political domination and their large estates; when driven out by the national revolt of the Estonians and Letts, first from Esthonia and then from Livonia, they clung to Courland, where the ignorance and vacillation of the Allies had left a German army corps, which, on the pretext of policing the country against the Bolsheviki, in reality aimed at terrorizing the inhabitants to the advantage of the Baltic Germans. But now the order has at last come to evacuate Courland, and the Revue Baltique, the organ of the oppressed nationalities, writes as follows: "We had dreamed of peace between the Baltic peoples and the Baltic Barons. There is an end of that dream. Let the race of 'Balts' quit our soil, or we shall know how to tear it out ourselves." The end of the large domains is therefore near; the agrarian revolution is going to take place in the Baltic countries also. The peasant "have-nots" are going to receive their share of the native soil.

IN AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY

The crisis is more complicated in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, where the two aristocracies which have hitherto held the political power, together with large tracts of land—the German nobility in Austria and the Magyar nobility in Hungary—are national in those parts of their domains where the peasants are German or Magyar and foreign in those inhabited by Czechs, Jugoslavs, Slovaks, and Rumanians. The Austrian aristocracy, whose title does not yet appear to have been disputed in German Austria, has already been virtually abolished in the new Czech republic of Bohemia and Moravia, where a law has been passed fixing the maximum amount of land which may be held by one proprietor at 190 hectares. The large properties, which have been estimated at about a quarter of the total acreage of the country, are to be divided up among the peasants. Here the agrarian revolution is being carried out in a legal and peaceful manner, by gradual steps, and with an indemnity for expropriation. The same thing will be done with regard to the large domains of the Magyar nobles in Slovakia, where expropriation and the distribution of the meadows to the peasants has begun in an amicable manner.

The Magyar aristocracy is threatened with a more violent overthrow in its own country, for the communists of Budapest—with whom it at first allied itself in an excess of nationalist fury against the Allies, and in the hope of retaining its domination over the Slovak and Rumanian peasantry—seem now disposed to bring about a social revolution of the Bolshevik order in Hungary, with a dictatorship of the proletariat.* This doctrine, preached in the country districts where the peasants are already excited by the promise of the land, would very rapidly lead to forcible expropriation of the big landowners and the dividing up of their estates among the rural working classes—in short, to agrarian revolution on the Russian model.

RUMANIA AND POLAND

A similar campaign against the Magyar nobility has been entered upon by the Rumanian peasants in Transylvania and in the neighboring countries where the Rumanian population forms the majority, and which have lately broken away from Hungary in order to unite with the Kingdom of Rumania. It is proceeding at the same time in the old Rumanian principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia, on the initiative of the Government under pressure of public opinion. It began on the entry of Rumania into the war, when, in order to arouse the peasantry in the national cause, it was necessary to promise them ownership of the land. This promise, which was held up by the Rumanian defeat and the coming into power of a Germanophil Government, has at last been redeemed by a law which, on similar lines to that passed by the Czech Republic, fixes a maximum of land to be held by any one proprietor and institutes a system of expropriation and indemnification; the land thus rendered available is to be distributed among the peasants whose property is insufficient for their needs.

In Poland, where the landlords in alliance with the clergy led the opposition against all foreign government, the landed aristocracy, by their championship of nationality, acquired an influence over the people which they are using today in order to defend their social pre-eminence and their large estates against all revolutionary tendencies. The necessity for provisionally maintaining national unity against enemies from outside conceals the latent conflict in the Diet between the peasant parties, who demand the partition of the big estates, and the conservative parties, who wish to save the large landowners. In no country except Prussia does the agrarian revolution meet with such determined opposition. Galicia and Posen, where the big Polish landowners, spared or even favored by the Austrian or German courts and imperial administrations, had become political leaders, remain the two great strongholds of landed aristocracy in Eastern Europe.

STRUGGLE ON RUSSIAN BORDERS

In order to divert the cupidity of the Polish peasants from their own large estates the Polish landlords are trying to extend their political domination over neighboring countries, where they hope to find land for colonization. This is the personal, economic motive which underlies the patriotic agitation for the annexation of all the provinces which were formerly dependencies of the grand duchy of Lithuania, and where the nobility have remained Polonized—Lithuania, White Russia, Western Ukraina, (Podolia, Volhynia,) to which one must add the Ruthene districts of Galicia. Even in Paris a campaign of nationalist propaganda is being conducted to justify this policy of invasion in the name of peace and civilization. We are told that France, in order to keep Germany in check, requires a strong Poland, and that Poland, in order to be strong, requires a vast extent of territory into which she can pour the surplus of her rural population, and which must be rich in proportion to her size and economic needs; therefore "Poland's capital" must be preserved, (it is thus that these gentlemen have christened the landed property of the Polish nobility in districts whose peasantry are of non-Polish race;) these territories, sparsely populated by half-savage races, would be colonized by the rural proletariat of Poland, which, under the direction of the Polish aristocracy, would introduce a higher civilization, and at the same time avert the crisis of overpopulation which at present prevails in Poland and the agrarian revolution with which the big landlords are threatened. This policy involves military operations on all the eastern frontiers in order to subdue the recalcitrant natives, and these wars cannot be waged by the new State, save with the aid of the connivance of Western Europe. Will the Allies lend themselves to this game? Will their diplomats and soldiers continue to allow their policy to be dictated by the Polish aristocrats and émigrés? The peoples of Lithuania, White Russia, and the Ukraine, which have already formed national governments, represented by delegations, threaten to meet this Polish "colonization" by armed force. The Ukrainians have already begun war. The news which reaches us from these countries where social upheaval is at its height must be received with caution, and we do not know exactly what is happening. But we know enough to be afraid lest the war may be accompanied by a general extermination of the Polish nobility. It appears that the peasants of the Orthodox Ukraine have in many places liquidated the big Polish estates by the same methods as in Russia. The Catholic peasants of Lithuania, the Uniate peasants of White Russia, employ milder methods, more in keeping with their more peaceful or civilized character. But in all these frontier districts the agrarian revolution would seem to be henceforth inevitable.

THE PRUSSIAN ARISTOCRACY

There remains the most powerful of these aristocracies, the most redoubtable for the peace of the world, but also the most modern—the Prussian aristocracy. This has succeeded in making itself, if not loved, at least respected, by the workers whom it employs, because it does not limit itself, like almost all the others, to consuming its revenues in castle life or to trusting to land agents the management of its estates. The Prussian Junker is not an idler; he directs in person the management of his land, and very often conducts an industrial enterprise as well, such as a distillery or brewery. The peasants on his domain are not tenants; they are agricultural laborers, working under the proprietor's direction. The revolution which has overthrown the Hohenzollern has not yet touched the Prussian nobility. It seems difficult to understand that this nobility should be able to survive alone in Europe amid the universal collapse of landed aristocracies. And yet is it not strange that the "Socialist" Government of the new "Reich-Republik," which has announced its intention of socializing coal and potash, should not yet have proposed any measure for the expropriation of the Junkers or the assignment of their vast lands to the laboring class? There is, as yet, no sign whatever of an agrarian revolution in Prussia; and we may suppose that the region lying between Elbe and Oder will be the last battlefield of aristocracy in Europe.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CHANGE

This general movement of agrarian revolution will have the effect of establishing throughout the vast territories of Eastern Europe a new democratic world of peasant proprietors. Can the peoples of Western Europe look on with indifference, as at some movement of internal politics which does not concern them? It is more or less the tendency of the Governments to look with disdain on the affairs of the peasantry, especially of foreign peasantries. But whoever takes the trouble to inquire into real and fundamental forces, will see that this social transformation of whole countryside involves, in the foreign policy of the East European States, a radical revolution which is of direct interest to the world's peace and which guarantees it in three directions:

1. We seek a barrier to protect the west against the barbaric communism of the Bolsheviki; and there is no barrier more solid than a democracy of peasant proprietors.

2. We seek guarantees against a return of the war spirit; and there is no régime more pacific than a democracy of peasant proprietors. Since the world began, no such community has ever desired or prepared or commenced a war.

3. We seek insurance against imperialist intrigue and designs of annexation; and nothing is less imperialistic, less desirous of foreign aggrandizement, than Federal republics resting on peasant proprietorship.

The agrarian revolution which is in process or in preparation throughout Eastern Europe, for the partition of large estates among the peasantry, will be the most solid guarantee of peace.

Prussian Protestantism

Separation of Church and State—The Huguenot Community of Berlin

BY A CORRESPONDENT OF THE PARIS TEMPS

THE French Revolution recognized for its god the god of the philosophers, and celebrated with great pomp at Notre Dame the cult of the Goddess Reason. The German revolutionists, in contrast, enthusiastic for everything that concerns the amelioration of their material existence, have shown themselves absolutely indifferent regarding the quest of any new spiritual principle. The important question of the separation of Church and State brought up by the Independent Socialists aroused in the Weimar theatre none of those spontaneous and vibrant speeches which such themes evoked in other revolutionary periods. Although a large majority pronounced against separation, this measure will prevail in principle, in the sense that there will no longer be a Church of official character; that is to say, a Church of State such as was the Protestant Church of Prussia. On the other hand, the old financial subsidies made by the State will be continued; it will, for instance, go on paying the salaries of the ministers and the expenses of the Faculties of Theology, both Protestant and Catholic. The new régime thus created by this compromise implies that the State will henceforth be completely dissociated from the destinies of the Church and will show itself neutral from the religious point of view. It must be emphasized that this modification of the old relations between the civil and religious authorities entails the most momentous consequences. For until the revolution the Church has been, beyond the Rhine, a precious means of support for the State and the monarchy.

For instance, the high and exalted

Bishop, the summus episcopus of the Prussian Protestant Church, was no other than the Emperor, William II., who (oh, irony!) bore likewise the title of "oberster Kriegsherr," supreme War Lord. Thus one justified and blessed the other. Moreover, like all the intellectuals, the pastors acted like royal functionaries, and thronged into the ranks of the champions of official truth. This situation of the Church in the State explains why, until the revolution, the national sentiment fused with religious and moral faith, and also explains how that amazing doctrine of a chosen people fighting for their King and for their God could so easily arise. Hence came those patriotic sermons pronounced at the order of lay authority and which eulogized violence according to the Prussian method. Hence, also, that almost pathological cult destined to exalt the warlike spirit of the German people; hence that warlike psychosis, that perversion of religious sentiments, which led some pastors so far as to excuse the violation of Belgian territory, and to exult in the very pulpit over the effects of the heavy cannon bombarding Paris.

SEPARATING CHURCH AND STATE

By breaking this traditional bond between the throne and the altar, in Germany, the revolution has taken the first step of the new republic toward the modern solution of the separation of the temporal and the spiritual. The compromise voted by the National Assembly follows the same path. Already its first consequences have been shown: formerly each functionary had to belong to a recognized denomination and fulfill his religious duties; atheists or free-thinkers could not aspire to serve the State. The ironical nomination of such an impenitent rationalist as Herr Ad. Hoffman to the position of Minister of Religion in Prussia broke abruptly, immediately following the revolution, with that secular custom.

The Catholic Church, by reason of the conservative or democratic, aristocratic or popular character which it has the faculty of assuming in turn, has been in no wise weakened by the revolution and will be in no way affected by the new order of things. It will be different with the Protestant Church, which, as a consequence of the overthrow of the empire, has lost its summus episcopus, now replaced by a triumvirate of pastors, as well as its privileged position as a State institution. Every Sunday from their pulpits the German pastors speak with sobs in their voices of the "poor exile" of Amerongen, and they become his ardent advocates in the numerous religious sheets which they edit and inspire. And, naturally, in these times of troubles and riots which in no way recall the security of the imperial régime, the great mass of the faithful listen with favorable ears to their spiritual guides. Hence the inspiration of that appeal recently addressed to M. Poincaré by the descendants of those Huguenots who emigrated to Germany after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and who ask, in the name of the hospitality offered them in former days by the Hohenzollerns, the pardon of William II. The French public must have felt a certain amazement on reading it. What will it say when confronted with the following facts?

PROTESTANTS IN BERLIN

The Protestant Community of the Refuge of Berlin counts at present nearly 10,000 Huguenots who possess their own church, presided over, according to tradition, by a French-Swiss pastor. Now during the war there were no more bitter adversaries of the Allies, animated with such a violent hatred of France, than the parishioners of this church. Thus in 1914, immediately after the violation of Belgian neutrality, the synod of the church asked Pastor Nicole to replace his religious sermons by "patriotic sermons." Courageously the pastor refused, objecting to his excited flock on the ground of his Swiss nationality and hence enforced neutrality. Accused thereupon of high treason by the community he was brought before the royal consistory of the Prussian Church who, less excitable than the descendants of our far-off compatriots, acquitted him on the ground of his nationality. This result seems to have redoubled the fanatic ardor of the community, which immediately returned to the attack and demanded the suppression of the cults carried on in French which a pious tradition had maintained until that time, despite the Napoleonic period, despite 1870 itself. Pastor Nicole preached nevertheless the following Sunday in French. His parishioners threatened to break the windows of the temple if this was repeated. The ecclesiastical authorities, on being consulted, in view of the uncompromising attitude of the members, were obliged to order the suspension of all sermons in French during the war. Their complete suppression was decided shortly afterward by the Community of Refuge.

It is curious to note that those descendants of Huguenots who made a name for themselves during the war were all grouped on the side of the Pan-Germans and the Military Party. Admiral Capelle, Minister of the Navy, was the alter ego of von Tirpitz, whom he supported actively in the submarine war. Souchon Pasha, chief instructor of the Ottoman fleet, directed the defense of the Dardanelles against which the efforts of the Allies came to nought. The submarine commander, Arnaud de la Perrière, for many long months held the record for the number of allied vessels sunk. General de la Chevallerie commanded a battalion on the French front. The fierce hatred and spirit of vengeance which animated against us in 1870 the Prussian General Verdy de Vernois were inherited in toto. Such are the sentiments which have remained as a tradition in the Community of Refuge of Berlin.

REPLY TO GERMAN HUGUENOTS

The letter of the German Protestants to M. Poincaré referred to above was analyzed and commented upon toward the end of July by John Viénot, Professor of History in the Theological Faculty of Paris, in Le Temps at the date mentioned. The text of this reply is in part as follows:

The President of the Federation of Protestant Churches of France has made to the letter which the Community of Refuge of Berlin addressed to M. Poincaré a suitable reply.

But in addressing itself to the President of the French Republic with the object of obtaining favorable treatment for the man who was responsible for the war, the Community of Refuge of Berlin, organ of service for German propaganda, went far beyond the French Protestant minority. It thought of the millions of Protestants of America, of England, of Holland, and Switzerland, and sought to arouse in them some sympathy for William II., wretched and proscribed descendant of those Hohenzollerns who long before had so generously received the French Huguenots. It knows that the name of Huguenot always awakens an echo of sympathy in those circles, and it was with this beloved and respected name that it covered itself to increase the influence of its intercession. It is therefore a matter of general interest to know more exactly who it is that speaks to us from Berlin, what they wish to tell us, and the object that they pursue.

The senders of the letter are descendants of the Huguenots expelled by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Yes, but in fact, these descendants of our fathers are today Prussians. Some years ago I was in Berlin, at an international historical congress. After a colossal dinner offered us at the City Hall, I found myself face to face with a keeper of archives, a sturdily built man with black moustachios, who, filling his glass, raised it in my direction, saying: "I drink to you. My name is Granier, I am proud of having Huguenot blood in my veins, but I am a Prussian." I bowed, without replying. I remembered that Ch. Weiss, the historian of the Refuge, wrote as early as 1853: "The new generation is German in heart, as it is in language, and it may be affirmed that no tie binds them now to the motherland of their ancestors."

Our interlocutors are Prussians; nothing more. What do they say to us? "Pity for William II., in memory of that Grand Elector who, thanks to his tolerance, offered us in this land a second home."

When everybody at the Court of Berlin spoke French, the Protestant refugees were able to live in a Protestant country and to speak the language which the Prince and his Court used exclusively. Was there anything surprising in that? Can they do so now? How many French cults are there now in Berlin and Brandenburg? All the churches issued from the Refuge were long ago Germanized.

The truth of the matter is that the Great Elector understood the mistake committed by Louis XIV. when he heedlessly expelled 600,000 Huguenots from their country. He understood the advantage he could draw from this, and he adopted a broad and intelligent policy. He needed men to populate his deserts, needed officers and soldiers, needed manufacturers, agriculturists, and artists. The Huguenots provided him with all this, and with a French Academy in the bargain. It is not without a pang that one reads this phrase of Ancillon expelled from Metz: "There have come into this State (Prussia) workmen of all trades, so that all kinds of labor are now being carried on here. None are pursued in France that are not pursued in this country. * * *

It was French officers who organized the Prussian Army, through the fault of Louis XIV.; it was French engineers who initiated Prussia in the art of engineering and modern fortification * * * "France," asks the Berlin document, "has she repaired the wrongs which she committed toward us Huguenots?" Yes, gentlemen.

France, democratic as well as imperial France, has done all she could to make good the injustices which she herself did not commit. The law of Dec. 15, 1790, restored their French nationality to all the descendants of the refugees, and Article XII. of that law ordered restitution to these families of all property confiscated, and still in the hands of the State. Napoleon I., subsequently, ceded to the Protestants several conventual churches as a partial reparation for the unjust destruction of our churches. We hope that your Government will find itself enabled to manifest in the future that same solicitude for necessary reparations with which you seem so animated.

Belgium's African Campaign

The Part Played by Belgian Troops in Protecting Frontiers Threatened by Germans

THE part played by the military forces of Belgium in Africa in holding back the Germans has been officially described in a narrative issued by the Belgian Press Bureau. The essential facts are as follows:

At the period when it was essential that in Africa, as in Europe, there should be unity in the efforts of the Allies to repulse German aggression, Belgium did not hesitate to send her soldiers to the threatened frontiers.

In the Kameruns, in September, 1914, the Congolese troops stabilized a situation recognized as precarious at a certain moment. They then took part in the struggle which ended in the conquest of this colony. Soon after they were to act efficaciously in preventing German access to Uganda and Rhodesia, British colonies.

From the beginning of 1915 to April, 1916, the Belgians defended 200 kilometers of the Uganda frontiers which were being continuously attacked by the Germans and the native populations of Ruanda. Finally, in 1916, after having created an army in toto in Central Africa, the Belgians were able to assume the offensive and capture in German East Africa, by force of arms, the Provinces of Ruanda with Kigali and Nyansa; of Urundi with Kitega; the larger part of the Province of Bukoba with Biaramulo and the southwestern coasts of Lake Victoria; the district of Ujiji with the port of Kigoma on Lake Tanganyika.

The Karema territories, with the ancient post of that name established on the eastern shore of the lake by the Belgian, Captain Cambier, in 1879, saw the Belgian flag hoisted soon after, while the Congo regiments, concentrating their efforts, carried Tabora, the war capital of the German colony, after costly efforts. The roads which lead to Tabora witnessed the sacrifice of many Belgian soldiers' lives.

At the beginning of 1917 Belgium acceded to a disinterested act in favor of Great Britain, an act which tried the pride of the victorious Belgian regiments: Tabora was handed over to Belgium's great British ally.

The Germans thrown back into the valley of the Rufigi River had been able to reorganize themselves during the rainy season. In April, 1917, by a sudden reaction, they managed to break the encircling cordon of British forces and throw detachments to the north and the southeast.

The Belgians were then called upon to collaborate in continuing the struggle and in completing the conquest of the last enemy colony.

At the end of May Belgian battalions were able to cover Tabora, which was threatened by a German column. The enemy was pursued relentlessly to the north and many detached units were captured without having been able to achieve anything.

In August the great mass of the Belgian forces was concentrated at Dodoma and Kilosa, south of the railway line from Tabora to Dar-es-Salaam.

After having cleared the country of German detachments which were raiding it, after having crossed rivers several hundred yards wide under enemy fire, after having given battle for ten days in the mountains, after having fought ceaselessly for two months, on Oct. 9 the troops under Colonel Huyghe, who had become Commander in Chief of the Belgian forces in 1917, captured Mahenge, the last district headquarters still in the hands of the Germans. The pursuit then began immediately. A detachment disembarked at Kilwa and marched toward Liwale to cut the enemy's retreat. The German columns, beating a hasty retreat from Mahenge, were pursued by the Belgians, and at the end of November were forced to surrender to the British troops which intercepted them at Nevala. Almost at the same moment the last troops of General von Lettow abandoned German East African territory and passed into Mozambique, Portuguese colony. The task of finally dealing with these scattered sharpshooters fell to the British and Portuguese forces; the Belgian troops' task was ended. General van de Venter, after General Smuts, has officially declared on several occasions that Belgian aid during this campaign had been "loyal, unrestricted, and of the highest value."

Belgium then applied herself to practical organization of the administration of those territories of German East Africa submitted to her jurisdiction, and to stanching the wounds which the war had inflicted on the country.

First, in 1917, the Belgian administration had to face the danger of famine which was threatening the inhabitants of Ruanda and Urundi. Thanks to the wise measures taken, the catastrophe was prevented and Belgium earned the gratitude of the natives. Soon life became normal once more, as much in the commercial and industrial region of Kigoma-Ujiji as in the pastoral and agricultural countries of Ruanda and Urundi.

Schools have been founded in Ruanda. The King of the province, Musinga, consented, under the influence of the Belgian administrators, to renounce the supreme right over the lives of his people. Internal strife ceased in Ruanda and an indigent fund was established by Musinga, who invariably carried on his Government in perfect accord with the Belgian Resident. It was a rule in this country that a white man should never behold the Queen Mother, who shares the royal authority with her son, and is perhaps even more powerful than the King himself. The Watuzi used to say in support of a declaration: "It is as true as that a white man will never see Musinga's mother." Yet in June, 1917, the Belgian Resident at Ruanda was presented to the Queen Mother by Musinga himself. The Belgians thus obtained a testimony of confidence and of attachment which the Germans were not able to call forth during the seventeen years of their occupation of the territory.

In Urundi, in 1916, the natives still fled at the approach of Europeans. It is enough to read the account of the fêtes given at the close of 1918, on the occasion of the visit to Kitega of General Malfeyt, the Belgian Royal Commissary, in order to realize the progress effected under the present direction. In 1916 the port of Kigoma had just come into existence. Thanks to the activity of Belgian engineers, officers, and administrators, Kigoma, which is in reality the point of juncture of the communications which connect the Atlantic with the Indian Ocean, is today perfectly organized.

Neither the difficulties nor the unavoidable expenses have prevented the accomplishment of the task which meant to this country intrusted to Belgium's care the establishment of better conditions of life based on progress and freedom.

Nearly all the Ruanda and Urundi chiefs have solemnly declared—and their testimony has either been written by themselves or registered by witnesses worthy of confidence—that they desired to continue to work in the future under the protection of Belgium.

When the Royal Commissioner Malfeyt visited Urundi and Ruanda at the close of 1918, thousands of natives covered distances often necessitating several days' journey in order to express to the representative of Belgium their gratitude, their attachment, their devotion, and their sincere desire to become Belgians.

It is, besides, a fact that the populations of Ruanda and Urundi are of the same race as those which inhabit the Belgian shore of Lake Kivu, and it is of material importance that they should no longer be separated. Belgium, by right of conquest, possesses Ruanda and Urundi. She desires to preserve these provinces which have witnessed the sacrifice of so many of her sons.

British Airships

The Progress Made During the War—Evolution From Tiny Beta to R-34

BY A WRITER IN THE LONDON TIMES

ON Aug. 4, 1914, the British Navy nominally possessed several airships, most of which were, however, of an obsolete or semi-obsolete type. Pride of place should perhaps be given to the old Beta, which, with Gamma, Delta, and Eta, had been handed over from the army on Jan. 1, 1914. This little airship had been in existence in one form or another since early in 1910, and was in reality even older than that, as her original envelope had formed part of the Baby, the second British Army airship, built in 1909. Beta had, of course, undergone many changes since those days, although she still clung to the old tradition of an envelope made of gold-beater's skin, which was at the outbreak of war in process of being rigged to a brand-new car with a 50 horse power engine. Gamma was also an old ship, being built late in 1910, but had never quite taken the same place in the affections of the Airship Service as Beta, in whom most of them had cut their aerial wisdom teeth. Gamma was by this date practically worn out, and was only used for experimental work of a varied nature. It was from her envelope that the first known experiments in firing a gun from the top surface of a non-rigid airship were carried out. Delta was not used during the war, while Eta was wrecked near Redhill in November, 1914, after making a forced landing on her way to a temporary base established at Firminy, near Dunkirk.

The remaining airships in the possession of the Admiralty were No. 2, a small training airship; No. 3, a French-built Astra-Torrés, and No. 4, a Parseval bought from Germany. In addition to these, a contract had been signed with Messrs. Vickers (Limited) in March for the building of a rigid airship (No. 9) of about twenty-seven tons gross lift, while the same firm had orders for three Parsevals, which were subsequently delivered and used for training work. A Forlanini type semi-rigid was also on order from Italy, but this was taken over by the Italian Government when completed.

The airship personnel totaled 198 of all ranks, of whom a certain number, both officers and men, were military. These, under the leadership of Lieut. Col. (now Brig. Gen., R. A. F.) E. M. Maitland, elected to be seconded to the navy rather than give up their connection with airships when a transfer took place. There was only one airship station, comprising two sheds in close juxtaposition to the Royal Aircraft factory at Farnborough, actually completed.

EARLY DAYS

It appears that the airship branch of what was later to be known as the Royal Naval Air Service was the first portion of the air forces of the country to carry out any war operation, although no active results were achieved. At 7 o'clock in the evening of Aug. 5, exactly nineteen hours after the declaration of war, Parseval No. 4 set out from Kingsnorth on a night reconnaissance of the Thames estuary on the lookout for any hostile destroyers or submarines which might be attempting a raid. The airship returned safely to her base at 5:30 the following morning, after a flight of ten and a half hours, without sighting anything other than our own patrol craft.

After this inaugural war flight, the same airship, with the assistance of Astra-Torrés No. 3, maintained a regular patrol of the Channel, from the mouth of the Thames down to the Isle of Wight. Included in their work was the duty of conveying the first units of the British Expeditionary Force to France on Aug. 14.

There were few events of outstanding importance during 1914, though an interesting incident was No. 3's visit to Ostend in September, when she was moored out in the open for three days ready to assist in the hasty preparations, which were subsequently abandoned, made to defend that town by Sir George Aston, in command of a mixed force of marines and troops. After the evacuation a somewhat daring reconnaissance of Ostend was made by the same airship in broad daylight to ascertain whether the Germans had yet occupied the place.

Two months later a party under Colonel Maitland established an airship base in a disused factory at Firminy. Eta was destined for this work, but was wrecked on the way over, her place being taken by Beta, which did a certain amount of reconnaissance work and artillery control for the Belgian heavy guns in the neighborhood. This party saw a Belgian kite balloon in operation and were so impressed with its value that a strong recommendation was forwarded to the Admiralty recommending the adoption of similar measures—with results which are now history. This force was recalled toward the end of the year.

The year 1915 opened inauspiciously for airships by the issue early in February of instructions to Messrs. Vickers to cease all work on the construction of the rigid airship No. 9. This resulted immediately in the dispersal of a large number of skilled workmen and caused the loss of much valuable time before experience could be gained in the management and uses of large airships. Fortunately, the policy was reversed and recommencement of work ordered in the following August, but, largely owing to this delay, this first rigid airship did not take the air until late in the following year.

The same month, however, saw a development which was destined to sow the seeds of all the future successes of British airships. On the last day of February Lord Fisher, who had lately become First Sea Lord, in view of the threatening submarine menace, gave instructions for the production of a small airship to act as a submarine scout. Then followed a fortnight of feverish activity on the part of the Airship Service, which at last saw signs of interest in high quarters. The following day the envelope of the little Willows training airship was dispatched from Farnborough to Kingsnorth and preparations were made to sling below it the fuselage of a war-scarred BE-2-C airplane. Precisely fifteen days later SS-1 took the air and successfully passed her trials, with the result that a further twelve submarine scouts were ordered the same evening. To accommodate these, work was commenced immediately on a number of stations around the coast, and during the ensuing Summer patrols were started from Folkestone, Polegate near Eastbourne, Marquise on the French coast near Boulogne, Luce Bay near Stranraer, and Anglesey; Folkestone being the first of these stations to "commission," on May 8. The earlier SS airships were constructed at Kingsnorth, while Barrow and Wormwood Scrubs were both subsequently employed on this work.

CREATING A NEW INDUSTRY

It was necessary to build up what was practically a new industry to prepare fabric with rubber proofing to render it gas-tight for airship envelopes. The various water-proofing companies were called upon for this work, and responded with such enthusiasm that by the end of the war there were about half a dozen firms which had specialized in the making of airship envelopes with extremely good results. The SS airships proved so satisfactory that it was decided in July to recommence work on rigid No. 9, and also to start on the production of a larger type of non-rigid which subsequently became known as the "coastal" class, they being intended for anti-submarine patrols up to a distance of 150 miles from shore. To house these airships the building of new stations was commenced in the Autumn at Longside near Aberdeen, East Fortune on the Firth of Forth, Howden on the Humber, Pulham in Norfolk, Mullion in South Cornwall, and Pembroke in South Wales. These, with the SS airship stations already commissioned, provided a chain of bases all around the coast, distant in the majority of cases only some 100 miles apart. The greatest possible credit is due to Brig. Gen. Masterman, who was personally responsible for the location of these stations, which, although at that time the methods of employing airships in anti-submarine operations were all a matter of pure conjecture, proved later on to be without exception admirably placed for dealing with the very extended activities of German submarines as these were developed in 1917 and 1918.

Before passing to the year 1916 it may be mentioned that toward the end of the Summer an airship expeditionary force was sent to the Dardanelles, a base being established on the Island of Imbros to co-operate with the surface craft in attempting to locate enemy submarines in those waters. Owing to its exposed nature, this camp, for it was little more, was subsequently removed to Mudros. Only one SS airship could be kept inflated at a time, as only a single shed was sent out, which probably accounts for the comparatively poor results obtained.

It is interesting to note that the suggestion with regard to kite balloons bore fruit to the extent that by the end of 1915 there were on active service five sea and five land kite balloon sections, of which the latter were working with the army in France, all manned by R. N. A. S. personnel, besides others in process of formation at Upper Grove House, Roehampton, which had been established as a training station and depot.

Although the practical results of airship work during this year may have been to some extent negative, nevertheless the groundwork had been done from which an important service was destined to develop. The number of airship stations had risen from two to eight, in addition to six more under construction, while there were now twenty-two airships in active operation, besides a considerable number (including four more of the rigid type) on order. The number of personnel had risen from 198 to the respectable total of 1,732. On the last day of the year the station at Marquise was handed over to the French Government.

The next year was mainly one of co-ordination and general settlement of ideas. The full program of SS airships, to the number of fifty, was completed during the year, as was that of the thirty-two "coastal" type ordered during 1915. Sheds capable of housing rigid airships were commenced at Longside, East Fortune, Howden, Cranwell, (the R. N. A. S. training station,) and Pulham, the coastal airship sheds at all these stations, as well as at Mullion and Pembroke, being completed. The year saw the completion of the first of the "North Sea" type of non-rigid airships which proved capable of carrying a crew of ten for a period of twenty hours at full speed. Another innovation fraught with great promise for the future was the production by the station personnel at Folkestone of a new form of submarine scout airship known as the SS-Zero. This ship had a specially designed car capable of floating on the water and built to withstand the strain of towing from a ship. It had begun to be realized that an airship which could be towed by a surface vessel would have many very valuable uses, and experiments were commenced with this object in view.

The outstanding feature of the year was, perhaps, the long-delayed completion of the first rigid airship, No. 9—three years and eight months after the original date of ordering. Owing to the time which had elapsed since her design was prepared, she was naturally out of date, but none the less her successful trial flight in November, 1916, marked an epoch in airship circles, as it was the first step toward the proper recognition of this type of aircraft in Great Britain. During 1916 an interesting experiment was also tried in sending out an SS airship for work of a secret nature with the British Expeditionary Force in France. This ship proved that it was possible to render an airship so inconspicuous and silent that on four occasions she was able to cross the lines and return, without being detected, at a height of about 4,000 feet. In the light of later developments, it is interesting to note that the longest flight to that date, of eighteen hours thirty-five minutes, was made by a coastal airship. In this year a number of non-rigid airships of the coastal and SS types were sold to France, Italy, and Russia—a recognition of the results of their labors of which the Airship Service were not unnaturally proud. A staff was collected together to experiment in the design and fitting of parachutes for airships, and a large amount of valuable pioneer work was done in this direction. During this year airships flew for a total of 8,296 hours, the number in commission having risen to fifty-eight, while the personnel had by the end of the year reached a total of 4,462 officers and men.

An occurrence destined to have far-reaching results was the forced landing of the German Zeppelin L-33 in a comparatively undamaged condition near Colchester in September.

The following year will always be looked upon by the Airship Service as the one in which they thoroughly made good their oft-reiterated claim to be considered a valuable part of the naval forces of the country. The year was essentially a vindication of the small non-rigid airship of the SS type, which bore the brunt of the work. It also saw the recognition of airships by naval officers, who had previously eyed them somewhat askance. It was the first year during which all the stations became fully equipped with airships, thus affording an opportunity for the organization of systematic schemes for patrols and proper co-operation between neighboring stations. In consequence of the large amount of flying carried out, to a large extent owing to the success of the new SS-Z type of airships, the personnel generally became more experienced and gained in all-round efficiency, while no small factor in the improved situation was the entire reorganization of and increase in the headquarters staff during this period.

For the first time comparatively frequent reports of submarine sightings and attacks began to come in, and there was an all-round increase in activity which was most noticeable. The number of hours flying during the year rose to 22,389, although the actual number of airships in commission had only increased by five, to a total of sixty-three requiring a total of 5,818 officers and men.

Three more rigid airships were completed, in addition to No. 9, all of which were allocated to training work pending the completion of later types which were considered likely to prove really useful for war purposes. It was deemed wiser not to risk losing prestige by allowing these ships to be used for operational work for which they were not fully suited. It must be remembered that up to this time our rigid airships were scarcely more than equal to the German ships in use at the beginning of the war—so far behind were we in this branch of airship design.

During the year 1917 an improved type of coastal airship was produced, giving greater all-round efficiency, while six of the new North Sea type were completed, one of them carrying out a flight lasting slightly more than two days.

At the end of 1917 an experiment was tried which was destined to have a great effect on the policy of the following year. It had been found that the convoy system necessitated airships being out regularly for fourteen or fifteen hours at a time, and the distance apart of the main stations rendered it difficult to carry out such long flights with the small SS-Z airships which had proved so valuable and economical in use. The bold policy was therefore adopted of, to a considerable extent, dispensing with sheds. A number of small spinneys, or in some cases merely belts of trees, were found all round the coasts, and small airships were moored out in the open in clearings with no shelter other than that afforded by the trees. This policy, though to some extent open to criticism on the score of the expense resulting from the shortened life of airship envelopes, was amply justified.

A convoy of merchant ships approaching this country from, for example, the Atlantic would, if the weather were anything approaching reasonable, be met some 150 miles out at sea by an airship, and from that time forward would never be left unattended by an airship escort until it reached port—whether it were Bristol, Liverpool, or some town on the east coast. In this way it has been estimated that some 2,000 escorts were carried out during the ten months from January, 1918, to the signing of the armistice. During the same period over 56,000 hours were spent on patrol and 1,000,000 miles covered.

On Nov. 11, 1918, there were 103 airships in commission, (of which five were rigid and fifty-three the ubiquitous SS-Zero,) necessitating the employment of 7,114 officers and men.

SUMMARY

Altogether airships have a record of 88,717 hours flying during the whole period of the war, which is equivalent to a period of ten years; during which 2,245,000 miles were covered, equaling ninety complete circuits of the earth. Including all training and experimental flying, in addition to all deaths resulting from enemy action, only 48 lives were lost, which gives an average of 46,787 miles per fatality, or, to put the same fact in another way, 0.54 deaths for every 1,000 hours flown. Now that all our thoughts are turning to the peaceful development of aircraft, the following records may be not uninteresting: Coastal Airship No. 2 was in commission during 1916, 1917, and 1918 for 2 years 75 days, during which she covered 66,201 miles, or an average of 3 hours 6 minutes flying on each day of her whole life. Coastal No. 2 covered 38,303 miles in one year, 1918, in 1,414 hours 14 minutes—an average of 104.9 miles per day, while SS-Z-51 during a period of five months did even better than this by averaging 113.3 miles per day.

The work of airships during the war was not spectacular, and little was divulged concerning it, but there is ample evidence that it was useful, and that they fully justified their existence, particularly after the development which commenced in the early Summer of 1917. As soon as it was realized that, for convoy duties especially, high speed is not essential, but that the mere ability to stay out for long periods at a time is a valuable feature in aircraft, airships began to come into their own. Their salient characteristics are the capacity for cruising at any desired speed from zero up to the maximum of the type, and, compared with airplanes, an enormous endurance. Flights of fourteen and fifteen hours were an everyday occurrence even with the little SS-Z type of no more than two tons gross lift, while it is common knowledge that since the armistice NS-11—with a gross lift of about 10 tons—carried out a flight lasting 101 hours, or slightly more than four days. R-34, which successfully crossed the Atlantic twice, with the extra petrol tanks, specially fitted for the Atlantic flight, although her full speed is in the neighborhood of 60 miles per hour, could at a reduced speed—resulting in saving of petrol consumption—stay in the air for nearly ten days, during which she would cover slightly over 7,700 miles.

The Scuttling at Scapa Flow

Vivid Story of an Artist Who Witnessed the Whole Scene From a British Patrol Boat

By B. F. GRIBBLE

Mr. Gribble, a marine artist, was with the British Fleet, engaged in making drawings of the interned German vessels at Scapa Flow on June 21, 1919, at the historic moment when almost the whole High Seas Fleet was scuttled and sunk by order of the German Admiral, von Reuter. He gave the following personal narrative, the most vivid and picturesque thus far obtained from any source:

I HAD accepted an invitation from Vice Admiral Sir Sidney Fremantle to proceed to sea with the British Fleet on Saturday morning, [June 21,] but at the last moment resolved to remain at Scapa and carry on with my task of making drawings of the interned vessels. The original intention had been that the fleet should go out on Friday morning for torpedo practice, but the weather prevented this. On Saturday morning the British Fleet proceeded to sea, and I decided to go on a cruise around the German vessels on board the trawler Sochosin, a captured German vessel, in order to complete my work. I thus had the good fortune to witness a most wonderful sight, one which I would not have missed for worlds.

The Sochosin was doing patrol work under the command of Sub-Lieutenant Leeth, and we were simply cruising round, and as it happened I was only just in time to get the drawings I wanted. About 11:45 I noticed German sailors on board the Friedrich der Grosse throwing baggage into boats which were already alongside the vessel. I remarked to the Lieutenant, "Do you allow them to go for joy rows?" He replied, "No, but, by Jove, it looks as if they were." Then, after a moment's hesitation, the Lieutenant exclaimed, "My word, I have got it. I believe they are scuttling their ships and are abandoning them." By this time the Germans were throwing their baggage into the boats at great speed and simultaneously we observed that the same thing was happening on board the Frankfurt, which was on our right at that moment.

We made straight for the nearest vessel, which happened to be the Frankfurt, and the Lieutenant ordered his men to get their cutlasses and rifles ready. He then shouted an order to the Germans, who were now in their boats, to return to the ships at once. The German sailors apparently had thrown their oars away and they shouted back, "We have no oars." A British sailor then shouted to them, "Here you are, you swine; here you are," and he threw a number of oars into the water. There were two boats approaching us and the German officers were extremely impudent. Standing on the bows of their boats, they shouted, "Can't you take us on board into safety?" Lieutenant Leeth replied, "No, return to your ships at once; if you do not I will fire on you."

It then became necessary to open fire, and the Germans were seen to wave white flags. One German officer shouted, "You have killed four of my men, and we have no arms. I want to look after the men." Our officer shouted to them, "You look after them by getting them back to the ships." The officer said, "We can't go back, they are sinking." Lieutenant Leeth: "You must go back and prevent them from sinking." The Germans replied, "It is not our fault; we are carrying out our orders."

By this time the Friedrich der Grosse had listed right over to port, and in a few minutes went down. Her crew had succeeded in getting round into the open, and we managed to get three boats into tow. Meanwhile signals were being sent up to our battleships to return, and messages were signaled to the coast guards, requesting them to marconi to the fleet. It took about two hours, however, before the first of the destroyers arrived. The Germans in their boats were very daring, and endeavored to come alongside our vessel. One of the crew, however, kept them off by threatening them with a revolver.

CHEERS FROM THE GERMANS

By this time the Brummer, a cruiser of the Emden class, had begun to turn over and sink, and the first destroyer of the British Fleet arrived just in time to see her go down. The German crews, who were out in the open sea, cheered as they saw their ships go down. One of the German battle cruisers, I think it was the Hindenburg, hoisted the German ensign, and I noticed that all the German vessels had been flying two code flags at the peak. The upper flag was a white ball on a blue pennant, and the lower was a yellow and blue pennant. I had noticed on the previous day that the same signals were flying. They were flown by the Emden, and apparently answered by all the German vessels.

As we turned toward the Seydlitz, we saw her turn right over, but she did not sink altogether, and she was still visible above the surface. We kept on signaling and using the hooters in order to get other guard ships to come round, and we had to keep passing over the surface where vessels had gone down. We passed several abandoned German steam pinnaces from the different battleships, but there was no one on board, and we concluded that several of the Germans had been drowned, as there were a number of lifebelts floating about.

We then observed that the Emden was in trouble, and H. M. S. Shakespeare, one of our destroyers, ran alongside her to endeavor to take her in tow. We returned to the Ramillies and transferred to her a number of the wounded Germans whom we had removed from the German boats. Returning to the scene, we picked up a few more, including their baggage, and put them on board our flagship. We next proceeded to the Emden, and at this time there was a great deal of confusion. Our vessel ran into the Emden, smashing her gangways, but we ultimately managed to beach her. I noticed that Admiral von Reuter's flagship was flying his flag, which is a black cross resembling a Maltese cross on a white ground, with two black balls. When we got alongside the Emden I peeped into her forecabin, and I noticed it was gayly decorated with flags and bunting, and there was a distinct odor of tobacco and spirits. Evidently the Germans had indulged in an orgy the night before. It appears that the whole thing was carefully arranged and timed to a minute.

One thing I noticed was that, notwithstanding the thrilling and dangerous character of the proceedings, the German officers were wearing yellow kid gloves and smoking cigars. Although the Germans declared they had no arms, I have good reason to believe that automatic pistols were found in the possession of some of the officers.^o While our rifle fire was proceeding there was a good deal of cross fire, which lasted for, I should think, three-quarters of an hour, and it is impossible to say whether the Germans actually did use firearms, but probably some shots came from the Germans. Their intention evidently was to keep out to sea as long as they could in order to give their vessels time to sink.

On Saturday evening I had a long chat with the different officers, and they all expressed great regret at not being present from the beginning of the incident. Admiral von Reuter and his staff and the whole of the crews, numbering altogether about 400, were placed on board the Revenge for the night, and arrangements were made to take them to Invergordon on the following day.

GERMAN OFFICERS PARADED

I think the most interesting and impressive part of the whole proceedings took place on Sunday afternoon on board the Revenge, when Admiral Fremantle had the whole of the German officers and men paraded on the quarterdeck and addressed Admiral von Reuter and his staff. This ceremony took place at 2:30. The Germans were lined up under a military escort of marines with fixed bayonets, and Admiral von Reuter was ordered to stand in front of his staff.

Admiral Fremantle then delivered a short address, which was translated by a Captain of the Marines. Admiral Fremantle, addressing the German Admiral, said:

"Before I send you ashore as a prisoner of war, I would like to express to you my indignation at the deed which you have perpetrated and which was that of a traitor violating the action of the arrangements entered into by the Allies. The German Fleet was, in a sense, more interned than actually imprisoned. The vessels were resting here as a sort of good-will from the German Government until peace had been signed. It is not the first occasion on which the Germans have violated all the decent laws and rules of the seas. We have had on many occasions to regret the fact of having to fight a nation which takes no notice of civilized laws on the high seas."

VON REUTER'S REPLY

After this address Admiral von Reuter made a short speech, in which he said:

"I take entire responsibility for what has been done. It was done at my instigation, and I feel that I was perfectly justified in doing it, and I feel sure that in similar circumstances every English sailor would have done the same."

The ceremony was very impressive, and appeared to touch all our sailors who witnessed it. The German officers were then ordered to get their baggage, and they were transferred to a boat. Admiral Fremantle ordered Admiral von Reuter and his staff to be taken on a launch to a place near Invergordon. The other officers and men were landed at Invergordon. One thing that struck me about the German sailors was that they appeared to be very poor specimens of the German type, and they seemed to be devoid of discipline. During the ceremony of the quarterdeck they did not salute nor stand at attention until ordered to do so. The German officers, however, were a more healthy-looking type of men. Everything possible was done for the wounded men. I think one man died on the Ramillies.

It was most surprising to observe how swiftly the vessels sank. Most of them turned over to starboard and then disappeared. I do not think the dramatic spectacle could have been witnessed very clearly from the shore. There has been mention of the hoisting of the red flag, but I do not think that is correct. I saw no red flag. There were only the German Admiral's flag and the signal pennants. It seems clear that the whole incident was carefully prearranged, and that the Germans had known exactly when our fleet would be at sea. It is also rather suggestive that quite recently Admiral von Reuter removed 2,000 of his men from the ships and sent them home. I can quite understand that the Germans may have been feeling the monotony of their existence at Scapa Flow. There is very little comfort on board a German warship. The German Navy was apparently built solely from the fighting point of view, and there does not appear to have been much consideration given to the comfort of the crews. All available space on board is taken up with working plant and guns, and the feature of the vessels is the manner in which they are heavily armor plated.

I think the whole incident created a curious feeling of surprise among our sailors, who appeared to be unable to realize that a fleet of magnificently constructed vessels could be got rid of so simply without even showing fight. I noticed that Admiral von Reuter and his staff wore Iron Crosses. I think Admiral von Reuter's decoration was an Iron Cross of the first degree. The scene was certainly an extraordinary one, and I shall never forget it.

EDITORIAL NOTE.—Admiral Fremantle reported on June 24 that the Baden was afloat, the Emden beached and little damaged, the Frankfurt beached, with upper deck awash at high water; the Nürnberg beached broadside on, with little damage. Two destroyers were afloat and eighteen beached. He said there was no prospect of salvaging any of the other ships without elaborate operations. A month later, on July 30, Walter Hume Long, First Lord of the Admiralty, announced in the House of Commons that one German battleship, three light cruisers, and fifteen destroyers had been salvaged and that work was proceeding on three other destroyers. He added that there was no intention of holding a court of inquiry in regard to the sinking.

The World's Ship Tonnage

Balancing Accounts With the U-Boats—America's Increased Share in the World's New Merchant Marine

[PERIOD ENDED SEPT. 10, 1919]

THE losses of the allied and neutral nations caused by Germany's submarine war, though undeniably great, were counterbalanced in part by an increase of shipbuilding activity in Great Britain, Japan, and the United States. A report issued by Edward N. Hurley, Chairman of the United States Shipping Board, showed that the allied and neutral nations suffered a total loss by enemy action, marine risk, and capture of over 15,000,000 gross tons. Great Britain lost 18 per cent. of her entire tonnage. The Cunard Company alone lost forty-five ships. Norway lost considerably more than 1,000,000 tons, France about 1,000,000, Italy about 850,000, Greece about 337,000, Denmark 239,000, and Sweden 201,000. Danish claims against the belligerent powers amounting to more than 100,000,000 kroner (approximately $25,000,000) were lodged with the Danish Minister of Commerce.

A number of Dutch ships requisitioned by the United States were subsequently returned to Holland with compensation. Compensation to Norway for twenty-seven ships contracted for with American shipyards and requisitioned was fixed early in June after eighteen months' negotiations.

The disposition of the interned German ships was one of the difficult problems with which the Peace Conference had to deal. Before the question was settled, the Germans in command of the surrendered German warships at Scapa Flow scuttled almost the whole fleet. The British at once began salvage operations, and it was stated on July 30 that a considerable number of vessels would be raised and salvaged. A method of raising merchant vessels sunk by German U-boats was also devised by the British Admiralty by the creation of a type of so-called "mystery" ships, built with a series of towers made of hollow blocks of concrete inclosed by watertight doors by which the blocks could be filled with water. After sinking two of these salvage ships, one on each side, and attaching them to the ship to be salvaged, the water could be pumped out and replaced by air, causing the three vessels to rise together to the surface.

DISTRIBUTING GERMAN SHIPS

It was stated in official circles in Washington on June 16 that an international agreement had been reached regarding German merchant ships, and that Great Britain would get most of the tonnage in German ports when the armistice was signed. France was to take over from 300,000 to 400,000 tons. On June 22 France sent crews to Spain to take over three German vessels interned in Spanish ports during the war. By this agreement, also, Italy was to get surrendered Austrian tonnage. The United States was to retain possession of the 700,000 tons of German shipping interned in the United States and at certain South American ports when America entered the war.

An official of the British Ministry of Shipping stated on Sept. 10 that Great Britain intended to insist on having 2,250,000 tons of the 3,000,000 tons of German shipping to be divided among the Allies by the Reparations Commission after the ratification of peace. He added that the situation was delicate and complicated, and that intricate international negotiations were yet to be completed. Nevertheless, he was confident that Great Britain ultimately would obtain approximately what she demanded. Even then her loss in shipping during the war would exceed 5,000,000 tons.

A part of the total allied loss in shipping was further compensated for by the acquisition of new ships and by the salvage of vessels sunk or scuttled. A larger compensation lay in the greatly increased activity in shipbuilding by the allied nations. Among these Japan and the United States were in the fore, Japan showing a net gain of 25 per cent., while the United States came far in the lead with a net gain of 125 per cent. In August, 1914, the United States possessed 1,494 seagoing merchant ships of almost 3,000,000 gross tons; in November, 1918, we had over 2,000 seagoing merchant vessels of about 5,500,000 tons. A total of 875 vessels had been added and thirty-one other vessels had been acquired by diversion of Great Lakes steamers and from other sources. The Allies and neutrals gained by new construction and seizure of enemy ships over 14,000,000 gross tons, leaving a net loss of about 970,000 gross tons.

After the signing of the armistice contracts for the construction of 550 vessels of an estimated cost of $400,000,000 were canceled by the United States Shipping Board. Sale of the war-built merchant fleet was begun on April 17, and ninety-five wooden ships and barge hulls were listed for sale soon thereafter. Many of the ships so canceled, both steel and wood, were not deliverable until 1920, and were not of a size or type commercially or economically advantageous in time of peace. On July 31 the sale of 100 steel ships of a total value of $80,000,000 was announced by the Shipping Board.

AMERICA'S SHIPPING FUTURE

In Chairman Hurley's report, already cited, the future possibilities of America's mercantile marine were strongly emphasized. He intimated that American ships had come back upon the ocean to stay. The war, he said, had brought America into a high place as a maritime power. In an address delivered at Hog Island on May 30, on the occasion of the launching of five 7,800-ton ships, Secretary Daniels spoke even more strongly; never again, he said, would the United States be guilty of the folly of trusting its foreign commerce to foreign bottoms. America would not quit the shipbuilding industry, but would put it on a solid basis. One of the chief compensations of the burden of the great struggle, he declared, was the restoration, or, rather, the rebirth of the American merchant marine; America had been building on a scale that was undreamed of even in the early days when the American flag and American commerce were seen in all parts of the world. In spite of all mistakes due to haste and the high cost under war conditions a great and lasting good had come from the revival of shipbuilding in the war.

The great increase in ship construction was evidenced by various reports of ships delivered and launched through the Summer. The delivery of thirty vessels to the Shipping Board during the week ended Aug. 9 brought the total since the beginning of the war to 1,227, of 4,542,278 gross tons. Of these vessels 870 were steel and 357 were wood and composite.

On June 12 the United States Shipping Board sent to both branches of Congress its recommendations for the development of the merchant marine, advocating private ownership and operation under Federal charter. The report proposed the establishment of a development fund from which the President of the United States would be authorized to assist interests engaged in building up new trade routes. The sale of steel ships on a basis of 25 per cent. payment and ten years' time was also advocated for legislation. An investigation along the lines of the report was ordered by the House Committee on Merchant Marine.

Figures made public by the United States Shipping Board showed that the American merchant marine comprised 46 per cent. of all ships plying between America and foreign shores. On Jan. 31 there were 752 vessels employed in overseas service under the American flag. The Shipping Board had opened a new route from New York to China; various steamers plied between the United States and Australia, New Zealand, India, Greece, and the West Coast of Africa; weekly departures were made for Danzig, Saloniki, and Turkey, with relief supplies; other ships served the Dutch East Indies, England, Belgium, and other ports. Trade with Turkey, Bulgaria, Rumania, and the Black Sea ports was resumed by the action of the Supreme Economic Council on Feb. 15 in opening the Dardanelles.

SOUTH AMERICAN TRADE

Through our acquisition of the German interned ships, eighty-nine in number, and the increase in ship construction, the extension of United States trade with South America was stimulated to an unprecedented degree. South American trade had been fostered by the construction of twenty-two ships, combined cargo and passenger carriers, of 12,000 tons each, to be used in the establishment of a regular schedule between United States and South American ports, one result of which would be to interest American investors in South American fields not previously developed.

On the occasion of the visit to the United States of Señor Epitacio Pessoa, President of Brazil, toward the end of June, William G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the United States Treasury, spoke of the great opportunities for trade extension with South America, and advocated an adequate transport service. Shortly before, Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board aroused enthusiasm at the Second Pan-American Commercial Conference held in Washington by asserting that it was the intention of the United States Government to furnish shipping for travel and trade with Latin-American countries on a scale that would bring about the closest and most favorable trade relations. Mr. Hurley went at length into the plans of the Shipping Board, which covered service to the West Indies, Valparaiso, Rio de Janeiro, and other ports. Included in the fleet which would ply between North and South America, he said, would be three of the large German ships retained in the possession of the United States. The importance of the fast passenger and mail service planned, he pointed out, was made evident by the enormous growth of trade values between the two continents of nearly $1,000,000,000, which made our Latin-American trade greater than that of all the rest of the world combined.

The resignation of Chairman Hurley as head of the Shipping Board to take effect on Aug. 1 was accepted by President Wilson on July 10, when all control over ocean freight rates was relinquished by the Shipping Board. In his letter of acceptance the President praised Mr. Hurley highly for his vigorous and patriotic activities during the war.

The first ship to sail under the German flag after the war left Hamburg for America on Sept. 9. The ship had on her lading bill 2,000 tons of ballast, but was to return to Hamburg with machinery and oil.

The King of Hedjaz and the Revolt of the Wahabites

THE Lebanon Syrian Committee in the second week of August addressed to the Central Syrian Committee located in Paris the following telegram:

The Arabian military authorities at Damascus are continuing their arbitrary recruiting. They have just decided to send an army of Syrians to the Hedjaz, on a payment of three Egyptian pounds per man, probably to fight against the Wahabites. They are thus treating Syria as a country conquered by the Hedjaz, and are misapplying the subsidies furnished by the Allies.

The Mussulman sect of the Wahabites is at war with Hussein, King of Arabia. The causes that led to these hostilities were briefly as follows: When the Ottoman Empire joined the European war the Hedjaz and the other Emirates of Arabia joined the Allies, who created Hussein King of Arabia. Hussein played a prominent part from this time on. He only was represented at the Peace Conference. His son, Faïçal, became a candidate for the throne of Hedjaz under the aegis of England. Hussein's proclamation of himself as khalif, or great religious leader of Islam, gave offense to the Wahabites among other sects. His subsequent proposal to unite Hedjaz with Nedj, where the Wahabites are mainly centred, brought on a crisis, and the conflict was declared by the Wahabite leader.

THE INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE

How Representatives of Capital, Labor, and the Public Sought a Solution of Wage Problems

THE Industrial Conference called by President Wilson to find a solution of the nation's increasing labor troubles held its first session in the Pan-American Building at Washington on Oct. 6, 1919. President Wilson, on account of illness, was unable to be present, but was represented by Cabinet members. The body of delegates which he had called together in this unique convention was notable for the absence of extremists on both sides of the labor issue. Three main groups were represented—the employers, the employees, and the public.

The program, so far as it had been arranged, was intended to consider "fundamental means of bettering the whole relationship of labor and capital," including the discussion of the public's interests in strikes and lockouts, the question of the closed or open shop, and labor's right of collective bargaining. The last two subjects touched directly upon the great steel strike then in progress, and they soon forced themselves into the foreground to the exclusion of all others, becoming at length the rock upon which the conference itself went to pieces. In the interim, however, an important chapter in industrial history had been written.

Men and women whose names loom large in their special fields gathered in the Hall of the Americans of the Pan-American Building. There was an atmosphere of tension from the beginning. The representatives of labor sat to the right of the temporary Chairman, Secretary Wilson. On the left of the Secretary were the representatives of the employers. Between these groups sat the men and women representing the public.

LIST OF DELEGATES

The official list of delegates, as finally arranged, was as follows:

For the public: Bernard M. Baruch, New York; Robert S. Brookings, St. Louis; John D. Rockefeller, Jr., New York; Judge Elbert H. Gary, New York; Dr. Charles W. Eliot, Cambridge, Mass.; John Spargo, New York; O. E. Bradfute, Xenia, Ohio; Ward M. Burgess, Omaha, Neb.; Fuller R. Galloway, La Grange, Ga.; Thomas L. Chadbourne, New York; H. B. Endicott, Dedham, Mass.; Paul L. Feiss, Cleveland, Ohio; Henry S. Dennison, Framingham, Mass.; George R. James, Memphis, Tenn.; Thomas D. Jones, Chicago; A. A. Landon, Buffalo; E. T. Meredith, Des Moines; Gavin McNab, San Francisco; L. D. Swett, Carbondale, Col.; Louis Titus, San Francisco; Charles Edward Russell, New York; Bert M. Jewell, Washington, D. C.; Lillian Wald, New York; Gertrude Barnum, Berkeley, Cal., and Ida M. Tarbell, New York.

Chamber of Commerce of the United States: Henry A. Wheeler, Chicago; Ernest T. Trigg, Philadelphia; Herbert F. Perkins, Chicago; John J. Raskob, Wilmington, Del., and Homer L. Ferguson, Newport News, Va.

Farmers' organizations: J. N. Tittlemore, Omro, Wis.; T. C. Atketson, Washington, D. C., and C. S. Barrett, Union City, Ga.

Investment Bankers' Association of America: Edgar L. Marston, New York, and Howard W. Fenton, Chicago.

Organized labor: For the American Federation of Labor—Samuel Gompers and Frank Morrison, Washington, D. C.; Daniel J. Tobin, Indianapolis; Joseph F. Valentine, Cincinnati; W. D. Mahon, Detroit; T. A. Rickert, Chicago; Jacob Fischer, Indianapolis; Matthew Woll, Washington, D. C.; Mrs. Sara Conboy, New York City; William H. Johnston, Washington, D. C.; Paul Scharrenberg, San Francisco; John H. Donlin, Washington, D. C., and M. F. Tighe, Pittsburgh. For the railroad brotherhoods—W. E. Sheppard, conductors; W. G. Lee, trainmen; Timothy Shea, firemen, and H. E. Wills, engineers.

National Industrial Conference: Frederick P. Fish, Boston; J. W. O'Leary, Chicago; S. Pemberton Hutchinson, Philadelphia; Edwin Farnham Green, Boston, and L. F. Loree, New York.

Besides the official delegates from the three groups, many spectators and perhaps 100 newspaper men were present, as well as Secretaries Daniels, Houston, Baker, and Burleson. Others were Ray Baker, Director of the Mint; Grosvenor Clarkson, Secretary of the Council of National Defense; Joseph P. Tumulty, the President's Secretary; John C. Koons, First Assistant Postmaster General, and William Z. Foster, Secretary-Treasurer of the organization committee of the steel workers.

OPENING THE CONFERENCE

In opening the conference Secretary Wilson introduced John Barrett, Director General of the Pan-American Union, who made a short speech of welcome. Rowland B. Mahany, former Minister to Ecuador, acted as temporary Secretary. The Secretary of Labor made a prepared address in which, after dwelling upon the problems facing the world as the result of the wastage of war and upon the financial inflation in all commercial countries which had played havoc with the relative values of money, wages, and commodities, he continued:

The effect of these things has been reflected in the high cost of living, and the consequent demand for higher wage rates to meet the increasing burden of the family budget. Yet increases in the wage rate do not always give relief. The more productive we are the sooner we will replace the wastage of war, return to normal price levels, and abolish the opportunity for profiteering.

For that reason we are all interested in the maintenance of industrial peace, but there can be no permanent industrial peace that is not based upon industrial justice. Surely human intelligence can devise some acceptable method of adjusting the relationship between employer and employee.

Upon your shoulders rests a splendid responsibility. Before you the doors of opportunity are open. If you, in the abundance of your combined wisdom and experience, can produce an acceptable document of this character, the results of your work will find a place in the hearts of men like the Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Emancipation Proclamation.

Arrangements were then made for the appointment of committees. The groups returned during a recess, and then announced the memberships of these committees.

SECOND DAY'S SESSION

At the session of Oct. 7 little was accomplished beyond the determination of rules to govern the discussion. It was decided that no member of any one of the three groups might present a subject to the conference without the consent of his group. Voting was determined by groups, the effect of which would be unanimous, or a two-to-one result. If the three groups could reach no agreement, the result would be nullified. One-third of any group might make a minority report. A general Committee of Fifteen was further selected to pass upon all suggestions before they were submitted to the floor. Various attempts to amend the rules thus constituted were voted down. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, finally was chosen as permanent Chairman of the conference.

By unanimous vote the conference passed a resolution of regret that the President was not present, and expressed the hope for his speedy recovery. Samuel Gompers spoke, lauding Mr. Lane, who then made a stirring address, sounding the note that "ignorance and arrogance," which constituted the "force of destruction" during the war, should have no place in this country "in any matter political, industrial, or social." The address of Secretary Lane was in part as follows:

I look upon this conference as the greatest and most important extra-legal body that has been called in this country, certainly in our time. There are some here who have doubted its success. Why, gentlemen, this conference is bound to be a success. Its extent is not to be measured by resolutions that come from it, by platforms or by programs or by bits of machinery that it may invent or reveal. The spirit of this conference is its justification.

We will draft here a declaration of dependence not of independence, a declaration that we are united one with another that we live in one another's breath, and that we cannot live in isolation; that we must join hands together, not for our own sake alone, but for the greater sake of our country and of the world.

The Committee of Fifteen named to recommend for or against all resolutions introduced was made up as follows:

Representing the public: Thomas L. Chadbourne, A. A. Landon, H. B. Endicott, Charles Edward Russell, and Miss Lillian Wald.

Representing capital: S. Pemberton Hutchinson, John W. O'Leary, John J. Raskob, Herbert F. Perkins, and J. N. Tittmore.

Representing organized labor: Samuel Gompers, Frank M. Morrison, Matthew Woll, W. D. Mahon, and L. L. Sheppard.

The three groups on Oct. 8 occupied themselves with framing suggestions to be presented the following day to the Committee of Fifteen.

MANY PROPOSALS MADE

The session of Oct. 9 was marked by proposals made by A. A. Landon of Buffalo, a delegate for the public, to declare an industrial truce for three months; by Samuel Gompers to suspend the steel strike pending arbitration; by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., allowing each plant or corporation to determine with its employes the method of improving conditions, and by Gavin McNab of San Francisco for a national board of conciliation and arbitration. These, with many other suggestions, were automatically referred to the Committee of Fifteen.

An outline of a plan for adjustment of labor disputes was also suggested by Secretary Wilson. This plan provided for joint boards of employers and employes in each industry to act in case of imminent strikes and lockouts, a general board appointed by the President to pass upon appeals, and an umpire to be drawn by lot if the general board failed to agree.

In addition to the resolution asking a suspension of the steel strike pending an investigation, the labor bloc put in another resolution embodying eleven proposals, including the right of workers to organize in trade unions; the right of collective bargaining; of wage earners to be represented by representatives of their own choosing; of freedom of speech press and assemblage; of the eight-hour day; of the "living wage as that is understood in this time and country"; that women should receive the same pay as men for equal work; that the service of any child under 16 years of age for "private gain" should be prohibited; that a national conference board for the settlement of industrial disputes be created; and that all immigration for a period of two years after the ratification of the Peace Treaty be prohibited, and thereafter regulated with due regard to the employment situation.

DR. ELIOT'S WARNING

Already at this session the indications of a coming conflict were pointed out by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, former President of Harvard University, who said:

I think we already see that this conference can be brought to no successful issue if its business is to be conducted by groups and its opinions are to be recorded by groups. The speech just made by Mr. Gompers shows that labor is here to contend for what are called its rights. There have occurred many indications already, not in public but in private meetings, that a large group of employers here are prepared to resist the methods of approach to the business which we heard proposed this morning by the labor group.

There is a conflict on already: and among all the propositions that have been submitted to this conference this morning there are several which relate, not to new relations between capital and labor, but to the old, to the former conditions of things in this country, in regard to industrial strikes, to the strengthening of the modes of combat with which our whole community has now become familiar. We should make a new start if it is to bring to pass any substantial results in creating new relations between capital and labor.

I distrust the group method because it obviously promotes, at any rate, combat over old conditions and over the present conditions. For example, one of the propositions just submitted in the name of the labor group here relates to an industrial controversy now going on. Can we hope fully to go into such a question as that in this conference? We are all, we must assume, clearly desirous of finding new and better relations between capital and labor. Should we trainmen; Timothy Shea, firemen, and H. E. Wills, engineers.

National Industrial Conference: Frederick P. Fish, Boston; J. W. O'Leary, Chicago; S. Pemberton Hutchinson, Philadelphia; Edwin Farnham Green, Boston, and L. F. Loree, New York.

Besides the official delegates from the three groups, many spectators and perhaps 100 newspaper men were present, as well as Secretaries Daniels, Houston, Baker, and Burleson. Others were Ray Baker, Director of the Mint; Grosvenor Clarkson, Secretary of the Council of National Defense; Joseph P. Tumulty, the President's Secretary; John C. Koons, First Assistant Postmaster General, and William Z. Foster, Secretary-Treasurer of the organization committee of the steel workers.

OPENING THE CONFERENCE

In opening the conference Secretary Wilson introduced John Barrett, Director General of the Pan-American Union, who made a short speech of welcome. Rowland B. Mahany, former Minister to Ecuador, acted as temporary Secretary. The Secretary of Labor made a prepared address in which, after dwelling upon the problems facing the world as the result of the wastage of war and upon the financial inflation in all commercial countries which had played havoc with the relative values of money, wages, and commodities, he continued:

The effect of these things has been reflected in the high cost of living, and the consequent demand for higher wage rates to meet the increasing burden of the family budget. Yet increases in the wage rate do not always give relief. The more productive we are the sooner we will replace the wastage of war, return to normal price levels, and abolish the opportunity for profiteering.

For that reason we are all interested in the maintenance of industrial peace, but there can be no permanent industrial peace that is not based upon industrial justice. Surely human intelligence can devise some acceptable method of adjusting the relationship between employer and employee.

Upon your shoulders rests a splendid responsibility. Before you the doors of opportunity are open. If you, in the abundance of your combined wisdom and experience, can produce an acceptable document of this character, the results of your work will find a place in the hearts of men like the Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Emancipation Proclamation.

Arrangements were then made for the appointment of committees. The groups returned during a recess, and then announced the memberships of these committees.

SECOND DAY'S SESSION

At the session of Oct. 7 little was accomplished beyond the determination of rules to govern the discussion. It was decided that no member of any one of the three groups might present a subject to the conference without the consent of his group. Voting was determined by groups, the effect of which would be unanimous, or a two-to-one result. If the three groups could reach no agreement, the result would be nullified. One-third of any group might make a minority report. A general Committee of Fifteen was further selected to pass upon all suggestions before they were submitted to the floor. Various attempts to amend the rules thus constituted were voted down. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, finally was chosen as permanent Chairman of the conference.

By unanimous vote the conference passed a resolution of regret that the President was not present, and expressed the hope for his speedy recovery. Samuel Gompers spoke, lauding Mr. Lane, who then made a stirring address, sounding the note that "ignorance and arrogance," which constituted the "force of destruction" during the war, should have no place in this country "in any matter political, industrial, or social." The address of Secretary Lane was in part as follows:

I look upon this conference as the greatest and most important extra-legal body that has been called in this country, certainly in our time. There are some here who have doubted its success. Why, gentlemen, this conference is bound to be a success. Its extent is not to be measured by resolutions that come from it, by platforms or by programs or by bits of machinery that it may invent or reveal. The spirit of this conference is its justification.

We will draft here a declaration of dependence not of independence; a declaration that we are united one with another, that we live in one another's breath, and that we cannot live in isolation; that we must join hands together, not for our own sake alone, but for the greater sake of our country and of the world.

The Committee of Fifteen named to recommend for or against all resolutions introduced was made up as follows:

discuss here either the old or the present strikes?

Both Mr. Wheeler of the employers' group and Mr. Sheppard of the labor group objected to Dr. Eliot's statements.

THE OPEN-SHOP ISSUE

The rift of dissension between the employer and labor groups was widened on Oct. 10, when the employers, insisting on the open shop and the right of the employer to deal only with his employees without reference to outsiders, presented their recommendations. The statement of the employers on the open shop was as follows:

There should be no denial of the right of an employer and his workers voluntarily to agree that their relation shall be that of the "closed union shop" or of the "closed nonunion shop." But the right of the employer and his men to continue their relations on the principle of the "open shop" should not be denied or questioned. No employer should be required to deal with men or groups of men who are not his employees or chosen by and from among them.

These propositions were submitted by the employers' delegates and were part of a statement of twelve principles which were briefly as follows:

1. The joint obligation of capital and labor to increase and improve production.
2. The "establishment" as a productive unit, rather than the industry as a whole.
3. Safety and stability of labor conditions.
4. The adjustment of wages according to demand and supply, the efficiency of the workers, the wage standard obtaining in the establishment's locality, the maximum incentive compatible with health and well-being, the high cost of living, and the value and length of service. Bonus payments, profit sharing, and stock ownership to be studied and worked out if possible. No difference in wages to be made between women and men working under the same conditions and of equal quality.
5. The fixing of hours of labor according to necessities of health and leisure, the week to be the standard of labor. Overtime work to be avoided wherever possible. One day of rest to be provided out of seven.
6. The settlement of disputes in each establishment by discussion without limitation of management's function of judgment and direction.
7. Right of free association for collective action, but with no compulsion over those who remain outside such association.

8. The responsibility of all such associations, whether of employers or employees, to public and legal authority.

9. The right of all individuals to enter into lawful contract, as employers or employees.

10. Noninterference with the open shop. Coercion in this respect not to be tolerated. No employer to be required to deal with men or groups of men who are not his employees or chosen by and from among them.

11. Regarding the right to strike or lockout, a sharp distinction to be drawn between the employment relations in the field (a) of the private industry, (b) of the public utility service, (c) of Government employment, Federal, State, or municipal, the two latter entailing special rights and obligations. In private industry, the right of strike or lockout, though deplored, must not be denied, as an ultimate recourse after all possible means of adjustment are exhausted. Sympathetic strikes and lockouts, blacklists, and boycotts all to be condemned. Public utility and Government service must be made continuous, independent of any private associations, subject to State or Government means for redress of grievances.

12. Practical plans to be inaugurated in industry and outside of it for the training and upgrading of industrial workers, vocational education, and apprenticeship.

THE GOMPERS RESOLUTION

The session of Oct. 14 was a strenuous one, in the course of which a conflict developed over the resolution previously offered by Samuel Gompers to suspend the steel strike while arbitration by the conference proceeded. One faction, headed by Gavin McNab, favored deferring consideration of the measure for several days, but W. E. Sheppard insisted that the solution offered by the labor group should not be shelved unless an alternative was offered. Speeches were made by Mr. Gompers and William H. Johnson of the A. F. of L. in favor of the resolution. The employer group voted solidly against it.

Dr. Charles W. Eliot of the public group renewed his fight against allowing the conference to take up the strike question. He insisted that the subject was not germane, as the conference had been asked by the President to consider "new" and not existing relations between capital and labor. The public group presented the Gompers resolution without recommendation, owing to the certainty of its defeat. A substitute was offered by Mr. Chadbourne, providing a return to work on the basis of election of employees' committees in each plant to deal with employers, unadjusted differences to be left to a special committee from the conference. This amendment would have covered not only the steel strike, but the walkout of the longshoremen, of the pressmen, and other strikes then in existence. When it came to the vote, the amendment was rejected by all three groups.

SPEECH BY MR. GOMPERS

In his speech before the conference, Mr. Gompers warned the delegates of the gravity of the steel strike, and pleaded to have the struggle arbitrated. He said in part:

You may vote, and no doubt will vote, as you please, but I think that you should hesitate to negative the resolution proposed by this labor group. You may not know the character of our work and responsibilities and the effort we try to make to maintain the best possible relations between employers and employees. But let me impress upon you that this whole world of ours is in a state of unrest, and out of this war from which we have so triumphantly emerged the men and women of America are determined that we shall never again go back to pre-war conditions and concepts; that there must be established a new understanding of the relations of man to man in the life of our nation and in industry.

We demand a voice in the determination of the conditions under which we will give service; we demand a voice in determining those things which make life either fair and worth living or not; we demand that the workers shall not only have that voice as supplicants, but by right. * * *

We have never made an assault—and it is furthest from our thoughts—upon the rights of property or the rights of management. You may win this steel strike if you consent that it shall be adjusted after the fashion that we have so liberally proposed. But if you reject that method, and the steel strike goes on and lasts a month or two or three months and drags out and you have won, and these men are going about the country and preaching the doctrine of their unbearable conditions and the tyranny which they experience and the injustices which have been meted out to them, then, whatever betide, you have sown the seed and will bear the consequence.

Just as a vote on the Gompers resolution was to be taken, it was found that the conference had been in session twenty minutes over the allotted time, and the meeting was adjourned. On the following day the resolution met a similar fate, one factor in the new delay being the illness of Mr. Gompers himself. Another consideration was the hope that some substitute resolution might be devised to satisfy all three groups participating in the conference.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

At the session of Oct. 17 a resolution was presented by the Committee of Fifteen declaring the right of wage earners to collective bargaining, and to be represented in their dealings with their employers by representatives of their own choosing. As the result of this, the conference faced a crisis, the employers' group, despite earnest pleas from the other groups, remaining firm in its opposition, and the labor group declaring that if the resolution should be recommitted the labor representatives would withdraw from the conference. Adjournment came after three hours' debate on the resolution without a vote.

At the session of Oct. 18, however, the employers' group made a movement toward compromise by offering a substitute resolution for the one offered at the preceding session. Both resolutions were then recommitted to the Committee of Fifteen, and the conference was adjourned until Monday, Oct. 20. The resolution offered by the employers' group was as follows:

Resolved, That, without in any way limiting the right of a wage earner to refrain from joining any association or to deal directly with his employer, as he chooses, the right of wage earners in private as distinguished from Government employment to organize in trade and labor unions, in shop industrial councils, or other lawful form of association, to bargain collectively, to be represented by representatives of their own choosing in negotiations and adjustments with employers in respect to wages, hours of labor, and other conditions of employment, is recognized, and the right of the employer to deal or not to deal with men or groups of men who are not his employees and chosen by and from among them is recognized, and no denial is intended of the right of an employer and his workers voluntarily to agree upon the form of their representative relations.

The Committee of Fifteen on Oct. 18 announced, after working all day, that it believed it had solved the problem that had divided the labor and employer groups in the conference.

At the session of Oct. 20 Judge Gary urged upon the conference to take no action on the resolution offered by Mr. Gompers. In a brief but categorical statement, he laid down the principles which he accepted for the maintenance of the open shop and the protection of unorganized labor. He was answered by Mr. Gompers, who expressed "keen disappointment" over the character of Mr. Gary's statement, and attacked the ultra-conservative and unbending attitude of the representatives of the Steel Corporation.

DEADLOCK REACHED

All proposals for recognition of the right of collective bargaining and the Gompers plan for arbitration of the steel strike were defeated by decisive votes on Oct. 21. Five votes were taken, four on the issue of collective bargaining, and in each instance the record stood 2 to 1 against adoption of any of the plans advanced. Normally, this result would have produced a deadlock in the conference, but President Wilson had been advised of the crisis, and exerted his influence from his bed of illness by writing to Secretary Lane, Chairman of the conference, a 600-word letter, which was to be read to the conference in case any of the members or groups threatened to withdraw. News of the President's letter spread, and vigorous efforts were made by the different groups at an agreement, but none was reached.

President Wilson's letter urging the conference not to dissolve without the formation of a constructive program was read at the session of Oct. 22. After the delegates had given the President a rising vote of thanks, a resolution was offered by John Spargo pledging the conference to leave no stone unturned to agree on a program before adjourning. Samuel Gompers then rose, and after expressing his and his associates' concurrence in those parts of the Spargo motion which "expressed deep sympathy for the President, as well as the hopes for his recovery," stated that he could not, without consulting his colleagues, undertake to vote for the assurance and pledge which the motion contained. At the suggestion of Chairman Lane, the labor group then withdrew for consultation.

LABOR GROUP'S RESOLUTION

When the afternoon session opened, Mr. Gompers stated that his group had discussed the situation in almost every particular. He then read a resolution approved by the entire labor group, the text of which was as follows:

The right of wage earners to organize without discrimination, to bargain collectively, to be represented by representatives of their own choosing in negotiations and adjustments with employers in respect to wages, hours of labor, and relations and conditions of employment is recognized.

On his motion this resolution was taken up for immediate decision without reference to the Committee of Fifteen.

Frederick P. Fish of Boston, a member of the employers' group, then advanced views which forecast the adverse action later taken by that group, attacking the resolution on the ground that as it was interpreted by the labor group it meant collective bargaining only through men not employees of a given establishment, a principle which the employers had already repudiated, and on which they would not yield. A heated debate arose over this issue, in which A. A. Landon of Buffalo, Louis Titus of San Francisco, Charles Edward Russell, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, and H. B. Endicott, all of the public group, argued for the resolution, and Herbert F. Perkins of the International Harvester Company, L. F. Loree, President of the Delaware & Hudson Railroad, and J. W. O'Leary, all of the employers group, argued against it. John Spargo asked Mr. Gompers whether, if the resolution was adopted, the labor group would understand it to mean that the principle of collective bargaining would then be rationally and carefully worked out by the conference. Mr. Gompers replied that this was his understanding.

The public group, after deliberation, indorsed the resolution, and Bernard M. Baruch cast its vote. The labor group voted aye. The employer group voted no, by a small majority.

WITHDRAWAL OF LABOR

Mr. Gompers immediately rose and said:

Gentlemen, I have sung my swan song in this conference. You have, by your action, the action of the employers' group, legislated us out of this conference. We have nothing further to submit and we feel great regret that we are not enabled with a clear conscience to remain here longer. We have responsibilities to the millions of workers and those dependent upon them. We must fulfill these obligations. Our regret is that the rejection of anything like a fair proposition on our part has occurred. It has been done and the die is cast; and we were endeavoring by all means within our power to comply with the request made by that great man, now stricken on a bed of illness, the President of the United States, for whom we have an admiration and a love inexpressible.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, for the courtesy which you have extended to us we are profoundly grateful, but we cannot longer remain with you.

As he ended Mr. Gompers walked from the room, followed by Frank Morrison, Michael F. Tighe, and the other representatives of the American Federation of Labor. The representatives of the railway brotherhoods left the hall a little later, after L. E. Sheppard of the conductors and W. G. Lee of the railway trainmen had expressed their sympathy with the stand taken by Mr. Gompers and his federation colleagues.

Members of the employers' group disclaimed responsibility for the withdrawal of the labor group. John Spargo then offered a resolution for the continuance of the conference, advocating an attempt to persuade the labor group to return. On the following day, Oct. 23, both the public group and the employers' group were in their seats when the conference was reopened. Secretary Lane, voicing President Wilson's desire, at once announced that the presence of the employers in future conferences would be unnecessary, and that with the labor group they ceased to be members. The public group then went into executive session. An attempt to continue the work was made the next day by the public group, but it soon desisted and adjourned sine die, after sending a letter to President Wilson recommending the calling of a new conference.

SOME NET RESULTS

A statement issued by all the members of the employers' group pointed out three definite advantages which, in its opinion, the industrial conference had gained: (1) Realization that failure was inevitable without preliminary organization and an orderly and comprehensive program. (2) Certainty that the question of collective bargaining had been brought before the country more prominently, and would stimulate innumerable manufacturers to find an acceptable solution. (3) Conviction that collective bargaining must be defined, and could not be accepted in an indiscriminate and unrelated sense. The statement then asserted that the labor group, which formulated the Gompers resolution, gave to this policy a special interpretation, (opposition to the open shop and bargaining through outside representatives) which the employers were bound to resist to the end. The statement insisted that the employers, by their rejection of the Gompers resolution, did not deny the right of organization and collective bargaining, and asserted that this group was leaving upon the record a declaration of "true American principles."

A statement by Mr. Gompers was in part as follows:

The representatives of the public group, made up largely of employers and people who have been antagonistic to the labor cause, voted in favor of our declaration.

Information has come to me that the employers group in their conference voted against the declaration by a majority of one. I am quite convinced that those employers in that group who voted against the declaration are unrepresentative of the intelligent, fair-minded employers of the country.

Bernard M. Baruch gave out a statement in which he thus summed up the results attained:

The Industrial Conference, as originally constituted, accomplished far more than appears on the surface before it finally was dissolved.

First—It brought the issues involved home to the entire nation.

Second—It demonstrated the great difficulties of a solution.

Third—Its discussions have had the effect of setting the entire people thinking, and from this thought will come the solution.

Fourth—There was brought home to all participants the intimate relations that exist between the farming interests and all industrial questions.

Fifth—What was not brought out clearly was that both capital and labor owe to society—which is inclusive of capital and labor—a duty to produce in quantity at the lowest possible cost commensurate with the protection of both capital and labor, all of the "things" that are necessary to keep up the proper, just, and humane standards of modern life.

Nation-Wide Steel Strike

Contest of Endurance Between Manufacturers and Workers— Armed Conflicts and Martial Law

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 24, 1919]

SINCE the close of the war the number and frequency of strikes in the United States have been constantly on the increase. Discontentment of the workers with the insufficiency of their wage to cover the advanced cost of living underlay most of these demonstrations, but in some cases, as in the steel strike, the principles of collective bargaining and the open shop were involved.

The strike of the steel workers, which soon resolved itself into an uncompromising contest of endurance, began in Pittsburgh on Sept. 21 with clashes between troops and strikers, in which nineteen of the latter, including two labor union organizers, were arrested. Elbert H. Gary, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the United States Steel Corporation, and James A. Farrell, President of the corporation, refused to make any statement, and it was said that the only general order issued was to the heads of the various subsidiary companies directing them not to yield on the principle of the "open shop." The strike affected 268,710 steel employes scattered through various States where plants were located, but the percentage of these that would quit work was still uncertain.

The strike did not begin officially until Sept. 22 at midnight. Soon afterward it was reported that hundreds had failed to report for work in the Chicago district, following large mass meetings of strikers. Three mills shut down in Youngstown and sixteen in Cleveland, and others were badly crippled. In the Chicago district, on Sept. 23, 80,000 quit work, and the steel mills in Gary, Ind.; in Joliet, Ill., and Indian Harbor were closed down. In Gary the strikers damaged the blast furnaces to such an extent that the company estimated a necessitated repair expense of $1,000,000 or more.

At this time the Steel Corporation announced that it was holding its working forces almost intact against the strike in its four great Pennsylvania plants at Homestead, McKeesport, Duquesne, and Braddock.

The strikers showed increasing strength in the Pittsburgh section by closing down a number of large independent steel mills there, as well as in Buffalo and Cleveland.

One radical leader was arrested in Chicago and held in $10,000 bail on a charge of urging a revolution through which the workers would win control of the mills and of the Government. All Chicago plants were practically at a standstill, but the corporation asserted that the strikers were intimidated. At Farrell, Penn., serious rioting resulted in the killing of one man and the injuring of six men and one woman.

GOVERNOR SPROUL'S WARNING

William Z. Foster, leader of the steel strike in the Pittsburgh district, on Sept. 24 received and made public a letter from Governor Sproul, which declared that Pennsylvania would keep order, and gave warning to all propagandists and preachers of riot to cease their activities. This letter was sent in answer to a letter from Mr. Foster, complaining of the action of the State in dispersing a crowd at North Clairton. The Governor stated that he expected the co-operation of Foster and his organization in maintaining public order.

ARBITRATION PROPOSED

Sept. 25 was marked by the reiterated refusal of the Steel Corporation to treat with the strikers and by the first session of the Steel Strike Investigation Committee of the Senate. John Fitzpatrick, Chairman of the National Committee of organized steel workers, after accusing the Steel Corporation of brutality and unfairness—charges supported by Samuel Gompers before the committee on Sept. 26—in answer to a question by Chairman Kenyon of Iowa announced that the strikers would be willing to leave the settlement of their controversy to any arbitration board that might be selected by President Wilson. He further stated that if the Steel Corporation would agree to such arbitration, the strikers would return to work and would abide by the decision reached by the President and his arbitrators.

Informed in New York the same evening of Mr. Fitzpatrick's proposal, Mr. Gary declared that the Board of Directors was bound to preserve the interests of its stockholders and also of its employes, the majority of whom, he said, were not union members; he also said that "questions of moral principle cannot be arbitrated or compromised."

Meanwhile some of the mills in the Chicago section were again becoming active, while a break in the strikers' ranks became perceptible; non-union members were becoming restless and beginning to return to work. This weakening on the part of the strikers became more and more visible in the succeeding days, especially in Pittsburgh and Chicago. The union men still denied losses, but Mr. Foster expressed disappointment because organized labor refrained from declaring a sympathetic strike.

The end of the first week of the strike saw the development of an obvious trend in favor of the employers. Mayor Hodges of Gary issued a proclamation advising workers that they might return to their jobs at the steel mills under full police protection. The employers at this time expected 30,000 men to return to work.

A new strike began at the Bethlehem steel plant on Sept. 28, and at Lebanon, Reading, Steelton, Penn., and Sparrows Point, Md. After eighteen hours, however, the employers said that barely 15 per cent. of the workers had walked out. The attitude of the Bethlehem workers was apathetic to the strike order, and the mills were operating at nearly normal. This strike was practically over on Oct. 1, though some 800 men were still absent. On Sept. 30 the Pittsburgh mills claimed more gains, while the unions contended that 375,000 men were out.

On Oct. 3 the Pittsburgh plants declared that operation was almost normal, and that the steady return of the strikers had restored the output to nearly full capacity. The police meanwhile held alien agitators, arrested for the Federal authorities, and a plan of deportation was under discussion.

GENERAL WOOD IN CHARGE.

In Gary on Oct. 4 a serious conflict developed which filled the steel town's hospitals with wounded and the city jail with strikers and strike sympathizers. This was the first grave disorder in the district. Incomplete reports stated that forty or fifty had been injured, but none fatally. In this clash more than 5,000 strikers charged the police, Deputy Sheriffs, and firemen with stones, bricks, and clubs when the guards attempted to frustrate an attack upon forty strikebreakers, many of them negroes, who were riding in a street car.

On Oct. 5 attacks were made on the mill gates, and one plant "boss" was shot at his own door. Militia were rushed to the scene and on Oct. 6 had full control of the situation. General Leonard Wood, commander of the Central Department of the United States Army, on this date took charge of the Indiana steel cities of Gary, Indiana Harbor, and East Chicago, with 1,000 overseas veterans of the 4th Division, armed with cannon, machine guns, and rifles. He declared martial law in Gary, while Adjutant Smith, with 1,000 State troops, declared martial law in the other two steel centres.

The taking of these measures followed the holding of a mass meeting by 2,000 strikers of Gary and a parade without permit, led by a large number of former soldiers in uniform. At the mass meeting the release of arrested strikers and the withdrawal of troops sent by the Governor of Indiana at the request of the city authorities were demanded. Troops paraded in steel hats, armed with rifle and bayonet, machine guns, and hand grenades, and cannon were mounted in the streets and parks and pointing down the principal thoroughfares. The mills were opened and thousands of workers entered and left the gates without fear. Crowds were kept moving, but picketing was not prevented. General Wood declared that the worst influence among the strikers came from certain "Red" agitators, whose only desire was to foment trouble, and that the best labor element stood for law and order. Five hundred strikers in Indiana Harbor took advantage of the presence of the troops to go back to work.

A new riot occurred at Donora on Oct. 9, when negroes returning to work were attacked by strikers and opened fire in self-defense. Two men were killed and several wounded. Neither of the two could speak English. On this date 5,000 men returned to work at Warren, near Youngstown.

RESUMING OPERATIONS

The strike entered its fourth week with the mills making big gains; two districts had resumed operations and others had increased their output within the preceding week. On Oct. 14 more plants in the Pittsburgh section were opened, and the companies reported that the movement back to work was continuing. It was charged by the Strikers' Organizing Committee that the mills were being aided by the State, the ground for this charge being that a permit to hold a meeting at Coraopolis had been revoked by request of the State authorities at Harrisburg. On the same day a pitched battle occurred at Youngstown, Ohio, between Carnegie steel strikers and the local police, in which one striker was killed and several others badly wounded, after the city had taken steps to put a stop to the stoning of men working at the mills.

On Oct. 24 at practically the end of the fifth week, the strike appeared to be over in the Gary mills. There were still several thousand men out, but, with the exception of a few unskilled laborers, the mills were said to have all the men they would need in the next six months. The commercial mills were producing 1,800 tons of steel bars daily, and twenty-seven of the forty-two open hearth furnaces were in operation, while eight blast furnaces were about to be started and the rest were to be running within a few days. At that time the total pay roll of the United States Steel Corporation in Gary was above the 7,000 mark, or about 75 per cent. of the maximum force, and the mills were producing 50 per cent. of their capacity. The Indiana Steel Company reported a similar degree of progress. In the Pittsburgh district the production was beginning to approach normal figures. In general the strike was regarded as having been lost by the unions, though this was not conceded by their leaders.

It was estimated that the steel output had been reduced 40 per cent. during the weeks of conflict, and that the strike had deprived the country of 2,000,000 tons of necessary steel products.

SENATE INVESTIGATION

The sessions of the Senate Committee appointed to investigate the causes of the steel strike began on Sept. 25, when an offer to arbitrate through the medium of President Wilson was made by John Fitzpatrick, who drew before the committee a picture of the despotism and unfairness of the steel employers which was subsequently confirmed by Samuel Gompers before the same committee. Another witness was William Z. Foster, who was questioned at considerable length regarding his previous experiences as a professional agitator. The extreme radical nature of some of his past utterances was explained away by Foster with the intimation that he had undergone a change of mind.

Elbert H. Gary, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Steel Corporation, was heard on Oct. 1. Mr. Gary told of mill conditions and called the principle of the open shop the crux of the whole issue. He asserted that he would deal with the workers, but never with union leaders. Charges made by Gompers and Fitzpatrick of murder and brutality he said were based on false premises.

The Senate also heard twenty workmen from the mills, whose testimony in favor of mill conditions was as positive as that of Mr. Gary himself. One of these witnesses told the committee on Oct. 4 of the Soviet agitation going on at the mills, largely conducted by foreigners. The whole strike, he declared, was practically the work of aliens. Of 1,000 who struck at New Castle, he said, 60 per cent. were not Americans. The American-born workmen were given no opportunity to vote on the declaring of the strike.

With the discovery in Gary on Oct. 14 of a plot to destroy Government property and to inaugurate a general uprising of "Reds" from West Virginia to Colorado, a drive on radicals in the United States was started by agents of the Department of Justice and by the military under General Wood. Connections between the Gary Reds and the attempts on the lives of Attorney General Palmer and Judge Charles C. Knott in May and June, 1919, had already been traced. One of those implicated in a similar attempt had been arrested; two others were sought. It was stated from Washington that the Federal authorities were in possession of evidence showing that the I. W. W. and other Bolshevik organizations in the United States were openly agitating for the overthrow of the Government of the United States and the substitution of a Soviet form of government. The gist of this evidence was embodied in a resolution offered by Senator Poindexter in the Senate at the date mentioned, which read as follows:

The Attorney General of the United States is requested to advise and inform the Senate of the reason for the failure of the Department of Justice to take legal proceedings for the arrest, punishment, and deportation of the various persons within the United States who, during recent days and weeks, and for a considerable time continuously previous thereto, have attempted to bring about the forcible overthrow of the Government of the United States, who have preached anarchy and sedition, who have advised the defiance of law and authority, both by the printing and circulation of printed newspapers, books, pamphlets, circulars, stickers, and dodgers, and also by spoken word; and who in like manner have advised and openly advocated the unlawful destruction of industry and the unlawful and violent destruction of property, in pursuance of a deliberate plan and purpose to destroy existing property rights and to impede and obstruct the conduct of business essential to the prosperity and life of the community.

Also the Attorney General is requested to advise and inform the Senate why the Department of Justice has failed to take legal proceedings for the arrest and deportation of aliens who have, within the United States, committed the acts aforesaid.

Other Serious Labor Troubles

The Longshoremen's Strike

BETWEEN 4,000 and 5,000 longshoremen employed on North River piers in New York City went out on strike at the dinner hour Oct. 7 without warning and against the orders of their leaders. They demanded $1 an hour and $2 for overtime, as against the existing rates of 65 cents and $1. They also asked a brief halt between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon for tea. By the declaring of this strike, the sailing of the Carmania, with 1,200 passengers, was held up for twenty-four hours. By Oct. 9 some 25,000 men were out, and the disaffection was spreading to all parts of the port. Shipping was badly tied up. Some 800 checkers had also struck. Police protection was asked for those who remained at work. One union agent was badly beaten for urging the men to keep their agreement.

Subsequently the number of those on strike increased to 70,000, and their idleness was keeping 30,000 other men from working. Tons of food were spoiling on the piers. On Oct. 11 the strike was spreading all along the coast; Baltimore, Boston and Norfolk were threatened. The Port of New York was completely paralyzed.

At this time Secretary of Labor Wilson issued an official statement from Washington charging the strikers with bad faith, as the previous rates had been determined on by a special Federal award and the strikers had promised to abide by it. On Oct. 10 the crews of nearly all the railroad ferry boats on the North River walked out, on the ground that a demand for a 25 per cent. increase and a six-day week had met with long delay in action. The suspension of the ferryboat service caused great public inconvenience and crippled the delivery of the milk supply. Mayor Hylan intervened ineffectively to bring about a conciliation.

On Oct. 15 the longshoremen accepted an offer of a 9 per cent. increase, and voted to return to work. Only 5,000 actually went back, however, and the trouble continued. At this date the ferry service was resumed.

Oct. 17 was marked by violence. Radical longshoremen shot and stabbed piermen who had returned to work. Six foreigners were arrested, one of whom had an I. W. W. card. The steamship employers asked the Mayor for police protection. The great mass of piermen, meantime, continued the strike, and tightened their grip on shipping. Manhattan piers were practically inactive. On Oct. 18 a conciliation commission of three was named, consisting of Mayor Hylan, F. Paul Vaccarrelli of New York, and James L. Hughes, Immigration Commissioner, of Philadelphia. T. V. O'Connor, President of the International Longshoremen's Association, however, declared there was nothing to mediate. On Oct. 20 this commission met and heard the strikers' side of the controversy.

Mr. Vaccarrelli, a former member of the Longshoremen's Association, whose appointment had been protested by the strikers, was absent from the meeting. At this hearing the strikers attacked the Federal wage award. On the following day the strike Chairman and half of the strikers withdrew from another hearing because of the presence of Vaccarrelli. At this date 500 regular troops were landed to do guard duty and unload the ships tied up in the port. The shipowners announced that they would try to move the vessels at once, and matters came to a crisis.

With a coal shortage already serious, 495 vessels tied up, $1,000,000 worth of fruit and other food rotting in steamship holds or on the piers, active steps were taken by the Federal Shipping Board on Oct. 21 to break the strike so far as its vessels were concerned. Preparations were made to house several thousand longshoremen, loyal to their international officers, who were to begin work at once on the piers. The strikers meantime were given until 5 o'clock of the same day to return to work. Federal troops were held in reserve to deal with all eventualities.

On Oct. 22 the strikers held two meetings. Some 1,000 men voted to return to work at the request of their President and Vice President. At the second meeting 3,000 voted their determination to stay out. A meeting the same night in Hoboken led to violence; revolvers flashed when Mr. O'Connor tried to speak, two shots were fired, and a general fight followed. Arrests were made, including that of the Vice President, for felonious assault. Mr. O'Connor was rescued from the mob and detained at Police Headquarters. The strike was still at its height when this article was written, (Oct. 25.)

firms in New York City, after the local unions to which they belonged had been outlawed by their international unions for refusal to abide by their contracts. The local unions demanded a forty-four-hour week and a wage increase of $14 a week. All the printing plants mentioned closed at this date indefinitely. Many New York publications, including prominent magazines, were affected. The book publishers joined the lockout. On Oct. 4 nearly 1,000 members of the "Big Six" Typographical Union joined in the strike. More than 150 magazines and 300 trade papers were tied up.

On Oct. 13 the pressmen still held out for a forty-four-hour week; they announced that they were willing to arbitrate all other demands but this. The following day the international officers of the pressmen's, typographers' and stereotypers and electrotypers' unions sent an appeal to President Gompers of the American Federation of Labor, asking that the Central Federated Union of New York be compelled to rescind its resolution of sympathy with the seceding unions of New York, on penalty of the revocation of its charter. The employers, meantime, announced that they were ready to meet the compositors in an effort to settle the controversy, in some respects one of the most remarkable in the strike history of the United States. Despite the tie-up, many magazines appeared; some were printed in New England, some in New York State, while others went as far as Maryland to find available presses. THE CURRENT HISTORY MAGAZINE succeeded in making its appearance by being printed on the rotogravure presses of The New York Times.

THE COAL STRIKE

A clash between the anthracite mine workers and operators was averted by a decision made at a conference in Philadelphia between the Presidents of the three anthracite districts of the United Mine Workers of America and the Committee of Anthracite Operators on Sept. 29. By this decision the existing contract, including a supplemental agreement for the payment of bonuses, was to continue in force until March 31, 1920.

The soft coal operators, however, during the preceding week had formulated demands for a 60 per cent. increase in all mine wages, a limit of six hours a day for labor underground, a five-day week, with time-and-a-half for overtime and double time for work on Sunday, as well as improvements in conditions of labor. On Sept. 27 the operators assailed these demands publicly, asserting that the $1,000,000,000 increase in wages demanded would have to be borne by the public and expressing fear of a shortage of coal from the contemplated attempt to cut down the hours of production.

The soft coal operators and miners clashed over the issue at the wage conference held at Buffalo on Sept. 29, when the owners characterized the demands of the miners as "extravagant and impossible of acceptance" and questioned the authority of the miners' delegates to enter into any agreement for them. Further negotiation failed to break the deadlock of the contesting parties. A joint committee was named. John L. Lewis, Acting President of the United Mine Workers, urged speed, as the time limit set for the declaring of the strike approached.

Secretary of Labor Wilson sent invitations to Mr. Lewis and Thomas F. Brewster, President of the National Coal Operators' Association, to meet him in Washington on Oct. 17. In his communication to Mr. Lewis, Secretary Wilson urged him to issue no call for a strike until the proposed conference had taken place. Reports reached Washington soon thereafter that the strike call had already been sent out for nationwide action on Nov. 1. Only agreement between the miners and operators before that date, said Mr. Lewis, could avert the strike, which the strike order characterized as "the greatest enterprise ever undertaken in the history of the trade union movement."

President Wilson from his sickbed issued a strong letter of protest to the miners on Oct. 25, but the catastrophe was still impending when these pages went to press.

CURRENT HISTORY IN BRIEF

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 25, 1919]

ARRIVAL OF LORD GREY

SIR EDWARD GREY, as the world called him in the fateful first days of the war, now Viscount Grey, K. G., of Fallodon, Northumberlandshire, Great Britain's special Ambassador to the United States pending the appointment of a permanent diplomatic representative, arrived in New York on Sept. 25, together with his staff. On landing he gave out a statement in which he emphasized the necessity for rebuilding the Old World, and declared that without good understanding and friendship with America international progress was impossible, and even international security doubtful. He had come, he intimated, only to foster such good understanding and cordial feelings, and was charged with no duty of making treaties of any kind. Great Britain and the United States, he said, spoke the same language and had many ties in common; real misunderstandings, due to old historical memories and present-day British political problems, must not be denied, but eliminated. Viscount Grey expressed high admiration of the part America had played in the war, and declared that he intended, to do all in his power to promote good-will between Great Britain and the United States, believing that this would bring the strongest element of security for the future and would be a step toward doing away with war forever. The Ambassador left for Washington the same night.

NEW JAPANESE AMBASSADOR

MIJURO SHIDEHARA, formerly Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Japanese Cabinet, succeeding Viscount Ishii as Ambassador to the United States, is 47 years old. He entered the Government service on his graduation from the law college of the Tokio Imperial University in 1895, and has been in offices of various kinds ever since. He served first with the Department of Agriculture, but entered the Foreign Office a few months later. In 1899 he was named Consul Elève at Chemulpo, in the same year being transferred to London with the same rank. In the capacity of full Consul he served at Antwerp and Fusan, whence he was recalled to the home office and made its Secretary in 1905.

In 1911 the post of Director of Legal Affairs of the Foreign Office was given him, and after he had served in this capacity for a year he was sent to the Japanese Embassy in Washington as Councilor to the Embassy, being two years later transferred in the same capacity to the Embassy in London. In July, 1914, he became Minister to the Netherlands, being recalled shortly after the outbreak of the war.

NEW ITALIAN AMBASSADOR

BARON ROMANO AVEZZANO was selected as Italian Ambassador to the United States to relieve Count Macchi di Cellere in October. A few days after the announcement Count di Cellere died suddenly at Washington, (Oct. 20,) after an operation, due to a blood clot of the mesenteric passages. He was ill but three days.

HONORING CARDINAL MERCIER

CARDINAL MERCIER received extraordinary honors from the people of the United States during his stay. Harvard University, Columbia University, New York University, and other American colleges conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. At New York, Boston, Baltimore, Washington, and other cities he was entertained at formal receptions and greeted with the warmest popular demonstrations of respect. On Oct. 8 he was the guest of the Merchants' Association of New York, and 2,500 members united in paying tribute to him. The visit of the Cardinal resulted in a definite movement to raise a fund of $500,000 for the restoration of the University of Louvain. In his address before the Merchants' Association he told how his famous pastoral letter urging patriotism and endurance, in defiance of the German invaders, was issued on Christmas, 1914. He stated that, notwithstanding threats, every priest who received it read it in the parish church, and that many of them were imprisoned and fined in consequence. The letter was sent to France and England by being placed among soiled papers in empty cheese boxes which were being returned to Holland, and thus it reached the outside world.

RACE RIOT IN OMAHA

SERIOUS race riots between whites and blacks occurred at Omaha, Neb., Sept. 19, and at Elaine, Ark., Oct. 1. At Omaha the riot was caused by the efforts of a mob to lynch Well Brown, a negro, who was confined in the Douglas County Court House charged with criminal assault on a white girl named Lobeck. The mob stormed the Court House and was resisted by the police. Mayor E. P. Smith of Omaha attempted to quell the disturbance by appealing to the rioters; in the midst of his address he was seized, a rope was placed around his neck, and he was strung up twice and so seriously injured that he long lay at the point of death; after two weeks in the hospital, however, he recovered. After the assault on the Mayor, the rioters set fire to the $1,000,000 Court House; the flames spread rapidly, and when the inmates of the prison on the top floor, as well as the officers guarding them, were in danger of being burned alive, the negro was surrendered to the mob. He was immediately hanged, and his body burned to a crisp. The Court House was practically destroyed.

Fifteen hundred Federal troops were called for and sent from Fort Crook and Fort Omaha. On Sept. 30, General Wood, Commander of the Central Department, arrived at Omaha and took charge of the situation. The presence of the troops restored order; within a few days 150 of the rioters, who were identified from photographs taken during the disturbance, were in jail charged with murder; among them was Leonard Webster, an advertising designer, who was identified as having struck the Mayor and having assisted in lynching the negro. It was stated that the murder cases would be vigorously prosecuted.

The trouble at Elaine resulted in sixteen deaths. Evidence was obtained that a propaganda had been organized by a white lawyer from Little Rock inciting the colored population to demand social equality by force of arms. For several days there was serious fighting between the races throughout Phillips County, in which Elaine is situated. The trouble was finally subdued by Regular Army troops, 500 of whom were sent from Camp Pike, Ark. A number of the ring-leaders were arrested.

FRENCH TRAITORS EXECUTED

THE execution of Pierre Lenoir, who was tried with Senator Humbert and others on a charge of communicating French military intelligence to the enemy, and sentenced to death on May 8, 1919, was set for Sept. 19. The neighborhood of Vincennes woods, where the execution was to occur, was put under a strong guard of soldiers at half-past 5 in the morning; the Commander of Fort Vincennes and the Prefect of Police arrived, and a firing squad of chasseurs took up their positions. At 6:45 A. M., however, news came that Lenoir's execution had been delayed.

On Oct. 20 the Commission of Revision, to which was referred the appeal for a new trial of Lenoir, reported that it found no ground for a rehearing of the case, and on Oct. 24 Lenoir was executed at La Santé Prison at 7 A. M. He had for some time been suffering from paralysis of both legs, and had to be carried to the place of execution. Lenoir was the third person to be executed on charges arising out of attempts made by German agents to conduct a "defeatist" campaign in France in 1915 and 1916. The others who met death on this charge were Bolo Pacha, executed on April 17, 1918, and M. Duval on July 17, 1918.

On Oct. 19 the trial of various persons who contributed to the Gazette des Ardennes, published during the war by the German Staff in the French language, came to a conclusion. Second Lieutenant Roger Hervé, Louis Laverne, and Henri Crookel were sentenced to death. Seven other defendants received sentences ranging from 5 to 17 years.

AIR RACE ACROSS CONTINENT

THE greatest endurance tests ever attempted by military airplanes began Oct. 8, 1919, when transcontinental flights by United States Army aviators were started simultaneously from New York and San Francisco by sixty-three planes. The rules of the race laid down three objectives: 1. The shortest air-line time across the country. 2. Actual flying time. 3. Fastest flying time. Control stations were established in cities forming a chain across the country. The distance to be covered was 5,400 miles. Each machine, by actual test, was capable of attaining a minimum speed of 100 miles an hour.

The start occurred on schedule time, forty-eight contestants taking the air at Mineola, L. I., and fifteen from the West. The start was marred by three accidents, in which three of the aviators were killed and one injured. At sundown of the first day Lieutenant B. W. Maynard, a former Baptist minister, was in the lead. Various mishaps occurred to the two groups of planes flying respectively west and east, and other deaths occurred. After twenty-five hours' flying at an average of 107 miles an hour Lieutenant Maynard maintained his early lead and landed on the Pacific Coast on Oct. 11 at 1:12 o'clock. Two easterly flying aviators, Major Carl Spatz and Lieutenant C. E. Kiel, landed at Mineola on the same day at 6 P. M., within thirty-one seconds of each other. In this first half of the race Lieutenant Maynard won first place, and Major Spatz the second.

Maynard started his return race on Oct. 14, and other aviators followed. New deaths occurred, bringing the death list to nine. Maynard was brought down by a broken crankshaft on Oct. 16, but by completing repairs in eighteen hours he was able to resume his flight, and eventually landed again at Mineola on Oct. 19, to the cheers of enthusiastic crowds.

The actual result of the transcontinental flight was still in doubt when these pages went to press. The four closest contestants were Lieutenant Maynard, Lieutenant Alexander Pearson, Jr., Captain J. O. Donaldson, and Captain L. H. Smith. The time record for these aviators as given out by the War Department on Oct. 23, and from which, in actual flying time, Lieutenant Pearson appears to be the winner of the transcontinental air race, was as follows:

LIEUTENANT PEARSON—New York to San Francisco, 26 hours 45 minutes 52 seconds; San Francisco to New York, 21 hours 51 minutes 24 seconds. Total time, 48 hours 37 minutes 16 seconds.

LIEUTENANT DONALDSON—New York to San Francisco, 31 hours 37 minutes 19 seconds; San Francisco to New York, 25 hours 56 minutes 38 seconds. Total time, 57 hours 33 minutes 57 seconds.

CAPTAIN SMITH—New York to San Francisco, 26 hours 13 minutes 28 seconds; San Francisco to New York, 31 hours 37 minutes 19 seconds. Total time, 57 hours 50 minutes 47 seconds.

LIEUTENANT MAYNARD—New York to San Francisco, 25 hours 11 minutes 8½ seconds; San Francisco to New York, 41 hours 2 minutes 32 seconds. Total time, revised, 66 hours 13 minutes 48½ seconds.

These figures were taken from telegrams received by the Air Service, and it was explained that they would have to be revised on figures of the control stop commanders before the final award was definitely announced.

AMERICAN DEAD IN FRANCE

ALTHOUGH the french Chamber, basing its action on sanitary and economic grounds, had voted against the removal of the American dead from France until some later period, the United States War Department announced on Sept. 22 that diplomatic efforts were being made to obtain some modification of this decision. The War Department statement was in part as follows:

The number of American cemeteries in Europe has recently been reduced from nearly 2,400 to about 700. A large reduction in this number will probably be made during the process of concentration in which the military forces of England, France, and the United States are necessarily engaged.

The Graves Registration Service has placed most of these cemeteries in excellent condition and is now actively engaged in an effort to perfect the appearance of every one.

The matter of placing stone markers on the graves of our dead in Europe is engaging the attention of the Quartermaster General, and the advice of the National Fine Arts Commission is being sought with reference to fitting designs and materials.

Further progress in the matter was announced on Oct. 3 by Secretary Baker when he stated that the bodies of all American soldiers interred in Germany, Belgium, Italy, Great Britain, Luxembourg, and Northern Russia would be returned to the United States as soon as the necessary transportation could be arranged. The task had been intrusted to the traffic division of the General Staff, which had been instructed to hasten the work as much as possible. This action, Mr. Baker said, did not indicate any change in the department's attitude toward the return of the soldier dead in France. It was hoped that the great majority of American parents would decide to let them remain there, but the wishes of relatives desiring bodies returned would be carried out.

"THE TRENCH OF THE RIFLES"

AT Douaumont, France, Cardinal Dubois, Archbishop of Rouen and former Bishop of Verdun, blessed the historic Tranchée des Fusils, the "Trench of the Rifles," on Sept. 14. The ceremony occurred in the presence of General Valentin, commander of the forts and heights of the Meuse; of M. Robin, Mayor of Verdun, and a delegation of the 137th Regiment. The Trench of the Rifles lies behind a humble wooden cross erected on a small placard near Douaumont, from which the spectator, looking down upon the village, sees only a shapeless mass of splintered rock, of barbed wire writhing as if in torment, of nameless litter, through which poppy and bramble tried to thrust upward during the Summer. This cross overlooks the bloodiest battlefield of the war. It was erected by men of the 137th Regiment, because close by their dead comrades are still mounting guard—there in the Tranchée des Fusils. It was a small episode amid a cataclysm, and soon over. In Indian file the men of the 137th had crept forth to mount guard, rifle on shoulder, bayonets fixed; there came a sudden, thunderous boom; the earth shuddered and cracked open, closed again, and swallowed up all. Thrusting above the ground, aligned as on that last march down the narrow trench that led to death, the bayonets of the section rise a bare six inches. It was this Trench of the Rifles, and the dead heroes, still mounting guard below, that the Cardinal blessed.

DUKES AS STRIKEBREAKERS

THE railroad strike demolished all social lines in London. On its fifth day, Oct. 2, a Duke drove a motor lorry and an Earl was in the chauffeur's seat in the motor heading a convoy of fish from Billingsgate. The sixth Earl of Portarlington was among those who were unloading perishable goods and milk and churns from a train, while at the Paddington Station Earl and Lady Drogheda were workers. Frederick Henry Smith, son and heir of the first Baron of Colwyn, was fireman on the Liverpool-London express when it rolled into London that day. A call for volunteers brought out members of the cavalry, the guards, and the Air Force Clubs and Colonels, Majors, barristers, and civil engineers. Men from these walks of life stood at the fire doors in big electrical power houses. Horse racing was suspended, food rationing voluntarily accepted, the driving of automobiles for pleasure was discontinued and the owners by thousands offered them for transportation purposes.

DEPORTING RADICAL AGITATORS

THE Canadian Immigration Board, sitting at Vancouver, ordered the deportation of a number of Russians who were proved to have attempted to arouse revolutionary sentiments among workingmen. Seven radicals were arrested by the United States authorities at Gary, Ind., Oct. 19, charged with "participating in a movement to overthrow the Government of the United States," and were ordered deported. Their activities were directed among union and non-union steel workers. Early in October it was announced that 1,745 aliens, who had withdrawn their declarations of intent to become citizens in order to avoid military service during the war, would be deported. Of this number 736 were Swedes and 444 Norwegians. On Oct. 17 it was announced that the State Department had decided not to deport these aliens, because of treaty obligations that exempt foreigners from compulsory service. The deportation of alien seditionists, however, was upheld. Congress on Oct. 15 passed a bill extending the wartime control of passports for one year after the proclamation of peace, its object being to keep out agitators and dangerous aliens.

SUMMARY OF RED CROSS WORK

THE Red Cross War Council submitted a report on Oct. 18 accounting for the moneys handled from May 10, 1917, to Feb. 28, 1919. During those twenty months the Red Cross received in round figures $400,000,000. In that period the number of chapters increased from 562 to 3,724 and the membership from 486,194 adults to 20,000,000 adults and 11,000,000 juniors.

Here are a few round figures that indicate the size of the undertaking directed by the War Council:

Red Cross workers.....	8,100,000
Articles produced by volunteer workers	371,577,000
Families of soldiers aided.....	500,000
Knitted articles given to soldiers and sailors in United States.....	10,900,000
Tons of supplies shipped overseas.....	101,000
Foreign countries in which Red Cross operated	25
Patient days in Red Cross hospitals in France.....	1,155,000
French hospitals given material aid	3,780
Splints supplied American soldiers.....	204,000
Men served by Red Cross canteens in France.....	15,376,000
Refugees aided in France.....	1,726,000

PROHIBITION REDUCES CRIME IN PORTO RICO

PORTO RICO established prohibition four months before it became effective in the United States, the law having gone into effect there March 2, 1918. Special reports by District Attorneys showed large decrease in crime throughout the island. The Attorney General's report says:

From a careful study of the criminal statistics of Porto Rico for the year ended June 30, 1919, comparing them with previous years, it is found that there has been a considerable decrease in crime from the day on which prohibition went into force in Porto Rico. The number of trials for homicide has decreased from 66 in 1917 to 46 in 1918 and 41 in 1919. The total number of trials by jury has decreased from 154 in 1917 and 143 in 1918 to 81 in the year 1919. The total number of cases of felonies brought to the district courts of the island has decreased from 329 in 1917 and 299 in 1918 to 254 in 1919.

Misdemeanors show a similar decrease, but the aggregate shows a total of 1,838 criminal cases in 1917, 2,239 in 1918 and 1,831 in 1919, only seven less than in 1917, but 408 less than in 1918. Convictions also decreased in about the same ratio as accusations.

LINCOLN STATUE IN MANCHESTER

THE Barnard statue of Abraham Lincoln, presented to the City of Manchester, England, through the Sulgrove Institution by Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati, "in commemoration of Lancashire's friendship to the cause for which Lincoln lived and died, and of the century of peace among English-speaking peoples," was unveiled on Sept. 15. Ambassador Davis and Judge Alton Parker of New York delivered addresses. The Lord Mayor received the statue on behalf of the city.

A BRITISH SOCIETY'S ANSWER TO AN AUSTRIAN SOCIETY

A LETTER sent by the President of the Vienna Society of Engineers and Architects to the President of the Royal Institute of British Architects on July 15 was accompanied by a resolution appealing for confraternal aid in efforts to secure a "softening" of the terms of peace. On Aug. 8 the British society sent the following reply:

The President of the Society of Engineers and Architects in Vienna:

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated July 15, together with a copy of the resolution passed by the Society of Engineers and Architects in Vienna.

While sensible of the just severity of the conditions in the treaty of peace to which the resolution refers, the Royal Institute of British Architects would attach greater weight to their appeal had your society taken any steps during the war to prevent, or to publicly protest against, the infamous destruction by their country's allies of those works of architecture whose immense value to the world your society was very competent to appreciate.

Nevertheless, the Royal Institute ventures to hope that the terms imposed upon your country may prove less disastrous than the resolution suggests; and that, after the treaty has been signed, they may be able to resume relations with your society in mutual effort to advance the art of architecture. I have the honor to be, Sir, your very obedient servant,

JOHN W. SIMPSON,

President of the Royal Institute of British Architects.

WAR EFFORT OF THE JUGOSLAVS

OFFICIAL figures made available in England show the magnitude of the military effort of the Jugoslavs during the world war. In July, 1914, Serbia mobilized 489,500 men. In September, 1914, she had under her flag 532,710, and in August, 1915, 572,121. She mobilized in all during the war, from July 1 to Oct. 1, 1915, a total of 707,343 men, or 24 per cent. of her whole population and 40 per cent. of her male population. If one adds all the Yugoslav volunteers from Austria-Hungary who formed special units fighting on the Russian, Saloniki, and Rumanian fronts, as well as those who fought in small units or individually in the American, French, and Italian armies, the total is still further increased. A division of 40,000 men was formed of Yugoslav volunteers by Serbia. After the Rumanian disaster 15,000 Jugoslavs were transferred to Saloniki and covered themselves with glory during the offensive of 1918. Some 10,000 others from America, France, Italy, and Russia also fought on this front. In all some 100,000 Yugoslav volunteers fought with the Allies against the common foe. The total Yugoslav loss, according to the official figures, was enormous, amounting to 292,342 dead.

GERMAN NAVAL LOSSES

DIE FLOTTE, the official organ of the German Navy League, on Aug. 18 published the total losses of warships sustained by the German Navy during the war. The figures given were as follows:

Battleship	1
Large cruisers	7
Small cruisers	17
Auxiliary cruisers	9
Destroyers	49
Large torpedo boats.....	21
Small torpedo boats.....	41
Special ship	1
Gunboats	7
Submarines	199
River gunboats or survey boats.....	6
Minesweepers	28
Fishing vessels	100
Other auxiliary vessels.....	22

Of these there were lost in open fight:

One battleship, 7 large cruisers and 17 small cruisers, 1 special ship, 111 torpedo boats, (of which 49 were destroyers, 21 large and 41 small boats,) 178 submarines, namely, 82 in the North Sea and Atlantic, 8 in the Baltic, 72 off the Flanders coast, and 16 in the Mediterranean.

Seven gunboats, 21 submarines (10 in the Mediterranean, 4 off Flanders, and 7 in neutral ports) were blown up or otherwise destroyed by the crews in order to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy. Six river gunboats or survey boats were interned, disarmed, or sunk. The navy lost also 28 minesweepers, 9 auxiliary cruisers, 100 fishing boats and luggers, and 22 other auxiliary vessels.

There were lost with these vessels, Die Flotte states, 946 officers, 5,222 warrant and petty officers, and 12,686 men.

FOCH AND YOUNG FRANCE

TOWARD the beginning of September an interesting statement of his view regarding the defeat of Germany was given by Marshal Foch while sojourning at his home in Brittany. During his stay he visited the holiday school at Kerlouis, and talked with the boys individually, encouraging them to ask him questions. One of them, who was preparing for the Ecole Polytechnique, addressed to him a question in which the whole world was interested. "M. le Maréchal," he said, "will you allow us to ask you whether "Germany is thoroughly crushed; is she "absolutely beaten?" With a striking gesture Marshal Foch pointed to one of the Celtic crucifixes and said: "Suppose some stormy night lightning shattered that crucifix; how would one set about its restoration? Would one begin by sculpturing the fingers and the hair of Christ? On the contrary, it would be necessary first of all to rebuild the pedestal and repair the granite base of the Cross. Well, it is exactly the same with the Germany that has collapsed. A new base and new balance will have to be found for the whole of the country. Yes, Germany is beaten, and it is for you to guard, by your prudence and by your work, the precious victory that your seniors have gained by pain and sacrifice."

Marshal Foch emphasized his remarks by gestures with a stick that he carried. The boys wanted to know about this stick, and their curiosity was rewarded by an item of secret history that had remained unrecorded. "That is my weekday stick," said the Marshal; "the Sunday one is kept in its case at headquarters." The boys laughed, and the Marshal said: "As a matter of fact, it is a trench stick that was given to me by one of my poilus. Look how well it has been carved; look at it closely. It is the stick that drew out in gravel at Doullens the plan of the supreme offensive." This time there was no laughter.

THE FRENCH ARMEN

OFFICIAL statistics of the losses of the French Flying Corps were published for the first time in August. From Aug. 4, 1914, to Nov. 11, 1918, the losses in the army zones were 1,945 pilots and observers killed; 1,461 missing, whose death may be regarded as certain, and 2,922 wounded. Outside the army zones 1,927 pilots and observers were killed, bringing the total losses in killed and wounded up to 7,757, the greatest proportion of losses in any arm of any of the allied armies.

To commemorate these losses a solemn service was celebrated on the morning of Aug. 15 in the Chapel of Nôtre Dame du Platin, the patron saint of French aviators, at Saint Palais-sur-Mer, near Royan. The chapel, which stands overlooking the sea in a clump of pine trees at the foot of the lighthouse, was erected some years ago through the combined efforts of Blériot, the famous airman, the Abbé Chanal, the curé of Saint Palais, who figured brilliantly during the war, and a well-known Paris jeweler. Its principal features are a beautiful statue representing the patron saint of airmen (reproductions of which are in the possession of hundreds of French aviators) and a large number of penciled inscriptions which have been written on its walls by airmen who have visited it.

In an address, delivered after the celebration of mass, the Abbé Chanal, in speaking of the devotion shown by airmen during the war, stated that not less than 70 per cent. of those who had been engaged had lost their lives while on duty. The festival concluded with a procession, at the head of which marched a party of officers carrying a statue of Nôtre Dame du Platin.

REPATRIATING AMERICANS WHO FOUGHT UNDER FOREIGN FLAGS

IT was announced early in July that steps had been taken by the Bureau of Naturalization and the Department of Labor to restore the rights of citizenship to those young Americans whose ardor to get into the European war had led them to enlist under the flag of Canada or of some other allied nation. It was estimated that fully 9,000 such Americans had become, by such enrollment, Canadians. After the armistice many protests and petitions were received for reinstatement, and finally Congress amended the law so that it was made possible for such soldiers enrolled under alien flags to regain their citizenship by taking the oath of allegiance to the United States Government before the proper authorities.

HISTORIC PENS

THE majority of treaties have been signed with goose quills instead of pens. Among the treasures of the late Empress Eugénie was the pen used to draw up the Treaty of Paris in 1856; it was made from a feather pulled from the tail of an eagle in the Jardin des Plantes. As for the Peace Treaty of 1919, a group of young girls offered David Lloyd George a gold pen, which the British Minister promised to use in signing some one of the peace documents; he had previously promised to use another pen to sign the Peace Treaty itself. The pens and penholders sent to President Wilson after the beginning of the labors of the Peace Conference were innumerable. Clemenceau also was the recipient of many similar gifts.

An item of interest in this connection is the fact that at Versailles, the day after the signing of the peace with Germany, all blotters, ashtrays, penholders, and pencils had disappeared at though by magic. If the pens of the Treaty of Amiens were valued in 1825 at 6,250 francs, what value will the historic pens of June, 1919, possess?

LONDON TO PARIS BY AIR

ON Aug. 25 three airplanes starting from Hounslow inaugurated the London-Paris Air Service, which was intended to run daily, barring accidents and prohibitive weather. Of these three planes, one, an Aircro 4, completed the return journey in schedule time; another reached Paris on time; the third, a Handley-Page, speeding seventy miles an hour, reached Paris duly, but deferred its departure to the following day. The fare charged for this trip was £15 15s. The route generally to be followed was Maidstone-Boulogne-Beauvais-Paris. On the inaugural trips as many as eleven passengers and full loads, including many daily newspapers and consignments of leather and other merchandise, were carried. Shortly before this event, a twin-engined Handley-Page machine, piloted by Captain Shakespear, successfully completed a flight to Brussels and back. On his return journey Captain Shakespear breakfasted at Amsterdam, had luncheon at Brussels, and dined in London.

MARSHAL FOCH THANKS LLOYD GEORGE

THE following letter was sent by Marshal Foch to Premier Lloyd George toward the end of August:

The French Ambassador in London has sent me the text of the words which you were kind enough to speak on my account in the House of Commons, as well as the substance of those which Lord Curzon pronounced in the House of Lords; he also informed me of the reception given to these speeches by the two houses.

I do not forget, however, that if I was appointed to be Chief of the allied armies it was of your initiative, and thanks to your confidence. If I was able equally to bring the war to a speedy conclusion, it was thanks to the sustained determination of the British Government to reinforce and to keep up, in 1918, sufficient effectives for its armies in France, and also to give powerful assistance in the transport of American divisions to Europe.

In the face of such confidence and such serious efforts, I employed on my part all the activity I was capable of in order to achieve victory, while making the best use of the means which had been completely assured to me.

Today it is an honor and a highly appreciated recompense to see my services recognized in such flattering terms, under particularly important circumstances, by the Government and Parliament of Great Britain, and I am profoundly grateful to you, the Prime Minister, for having taken the initiative in this token of satisfaction on their part, and I ask you to receive this assurance of my respectful devotion.

BRITISH MUSEUM IN WAR

THE annual report of the British Museum was issued on Aug. 31, 1919. Some of the features of this report dealing with measures necessitated by German aerial bombardments are summarized below:

Warning was received toward the close of 1917 that air raids in greater force, and with much heavier bombs, might be expected in the Spring. It was then decided to remove the most valuable objects in the collections to positions of safety. The portable objects of the Departments of Antiquities, including the Frieze of the Parthenon, the best of the Greek vases and bronzes, the chief Assyrian bas-reliefs, the Rosetta Stone, and the finest examples of mediaeval art, together with practically the whole collection of coins and medals, were transferred to a station on the newly completed Postal Tube Railway, some fifty feet below the surface of Holborn. Special provision was made for protection against damp and for guarding. Some fifteen vanloads of the most precious literary and artistic treasures were transferred to the National Library of Wales. A certain number of exceptionally valuable books were housed near Malvern. Objects next in importance were hidden in the strong rooms of the museum basement. Heavy sculptures and mummies were protected by sandbags. The Assyrian bulls, the larger Egyptian sculptures, and the Parthenon metopes were protected in situ by sandbags.

The restoration of the museum began at once on the signing of the armistice, and the work of bringing back the collections to their old positions continued into the present year.

THE ISLAND OF NAURU

NAURU ISLAND is a tiny speck of land in the Central Pacific Ocean, thirty-three miles south of the equator and about equidistant from Australia, America, and Japan, that is, about 3,000 miles. It has a circumference of twelve miles and an area of 5,000 acres. This small but valuable territory passed some years ago into the possession of Germany, and was attached for administration to the Marshall Islands, which are 300 miles away and are now under the Japanese. The island, with its millions of tons of phosphate of lime, the best soil fertilizer known, was a veritable treasure-trove for the overworked agricultural lands of the German Fatherland, and thousands of tons of the precious product were annually taken to Germany, though the phosphate mines, curiously enough, were worked by British enterprise. The German treatment of the natives is said to have been barbarous. Since the beginning of the war the island has been under a British régime, and the natives have recently petitioned King George, who visited the island as a midshipman, to take them permanently under his protection.

THE ITALIAN CROWN RENOUNCES VAST DOMAINS

IT was announced in Milan at the beginning of September that King Victor Emmanuel, after handing over six of his finest palaces, villas, and parks for the permanent use of disabled soldiers and sailors and orphans of those killed in battle, had formally declared to Prime Minister Nitti his intention of relinquishing all the vast domains of the Crown throughout Italy for the benefit of the peasantry and of combatants for Italian unity. Possession of buildings attached to such lands would also be relinquished in favor of those institutions and charity organizations whose aim it was to mitigate the sufferings of war. The King had also resolved to offer his own patrimony for taxation, an action which would bring about a large reduction in the civil list. The annual sum of $400,000 would be dispensed to poor and needy subjects in the future as in the past.

SALVAGED FROM THE SEA

THE British Admiralty Salvage Department, which came into existence in the Autumn of 1915, and which completed its last contract at the end of August, 1919, salvaged, in all its operations at home and in foreign waters, 440 vessels and recovered property valued at $200,000,000. The brilliant record of its achievements is attributed to Commodore F. W. Young, R. N. R., already famous for his successful efforts to clear the harbors of Ostend and Zeebrugge. Cargo steamers were lifted off rocky ledges and dragged up from the depths of the sea pierced and battered. Whole cargoes of gold have been rescued, as in the case of the Laurentic, from which bullion valued at $4,500,000 was brought up by divers working at a depth of 23 fathoms, after the strong rooms in which the bullion was kept had been blown up by high explosives and the débris removed. A collier weighing 2,700 tons (a weight which, before the creation of the Salvage Department, would have been regarded as prohibitive) was raised and put into commission again within three months. A troop ship in Folkestone which had caught fire and been scuttled was raised by four locomotives straining on the dock. A U-boat of a displacement of 700 tons, which had sunk thirty-five miles off the Tyne, was raised with wires and brought to port. Gathering of intelligence from sunken U-boats was a recognized function of the Salvage Department.

Fulfilling the German Treaty Terms

Progress Toward Reparation

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 15, 1919]

AS early as July 5 Germany indicated her desire to begin immediately her compliance with the terms of the Peace Treaty regarding reparations. Her request for oral conferences of economic experts was granted. Pending the appointment of a permanent Reparations Commission, the provisional commission created to name various conference commissions was authorized to act in the German negotiations. As to the amount of reparations due, an official report made to the Parliamentary Committee of Peace in Paris estimated the material damage done in the invaded provinces of France at $40,000,000,000. This amount had been verified by a committee of technical experts. The damage done to agriculture alone was computed at $7,400,000,000.

Belgium showed dissatisfaction toward the middle of July over the slowness of reparation payments. She had received no money from Germany, and little of her stolen machinery had been returned. Her ruined towns were being rebuilt; Ypres and Nieuport were stated to be beyond hope, but Louvain and Liège were being largely restored.

With regard to money reparations, Mathias Erzberger, German Minister of Finance, had completed a detailed program for raising nearly $6,000,000,000, of which $5,000,000,000 was to be handed to the allied Governments before May, 1920. Imperial income taxes and the searching out of hidden gold stores, it was stated, would help to raise the sum required, some of which was already credited to Germany on various accounts.

The first full meeting of the Reparations Commission provided for by the Peace Treaty was held on Aug. 1 at the Trianon Palace Hotel in Versailles. The German commissions charged with details of the delivery to France and Belgium of the stock called for by the Peace Treaty, and with the transfer of the coal mines of the Sarre Valley, arrived at Versailles on this date. Testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate on Aug. 2, Bernard Baruch, economic adviser of the American peace delegation in Paris, showed how the Reparations Commission, through the plenary powers conferred upon it, would have complete control of Germany's trade and finance. All imports were to be curbed, and even production and foreign sales were to be subject to the commission's scrutiny.

One of the first questions before the commission was the recovery of goods stolen by Germany. Offices set up in Brussels and Wiesbaden had effected the recovery of about a million tons of materials, according to a report presented to the French Chamber on July 24. It was stated, however, that this was only a small portion of the total loss. As an example of this, only 8,000 head of cattle had been restored out of 850,000 head driven away.

COAL REPARATION

As regards coal, M. Loucheur, Minister of Industrial Reconstruction, speaking before the French Chamber on Sept. 12, defined the conditions of reparation to which Germany is held; these conditions were as follows: During the period of reconstruction Germany was to deliver for the coal mines of the north and the Pas de Calais the 20,000,000 tons representing the pre-war product for a five-year period, with a reduction to 8,000,000 tons for the ensuing five years. The surplus of coal production by the Sarre Basin was just equal to the coal deficit in Alsace and Lorraine, but the output of these mines was sure to be increased within a few years. For the transition period measures had been taken to assure rail transportation to the east, centre, and north of over 1,000,000 tons monthly.

In Alsace and Lorraine, it appeared from the report of the special commission, the coal situation was serious. Not only to supply France, but other countries suffering from the dearth of coal, the Economic Council on Aug. 2 was considering means to increase the production of the German mines; in this project Herr Bauer, the German Premier, was co-operating. On Aug. 19 the delivery of coal to France from the Ruhr district had begun. It was expected that about 1,000,000 tons would be shipped the first month. On Sept. 2 it was announced that as the result of negotiations at Versailles Germany should deliver 20,000,000 tons of coal to France within the next six months, as against the 43,000,000 tons provided by the terms of the Peace Treaty. Of the present production of 128,000,000 tons, 60 per cent. of any excess was to be delivered to the Entente up to 128,000,000 tons, and 50 per cent. of any further excess until the terms of the Peace Treaty were satisfied.

RETURNING ART TREASURES

A restitution of a different kind was that of the stolen art treasures of Belgium and Northern France, most of which have already been returned. Since February convoys had been ceaselessly carrying deported works of art back to the museums from which they had been taken.

By the terms of the Peace Treaty a certain number of German vessels were to be delivered to the Allies. On July 18 some 300 German vessels whose home port was Hamburg were turned over. Of these 31 were owned by the Hamburg-American Line. In addition to these, 12 American-owned steamships, valued at more than $10,000,000, the property of a German subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company, were ordered from German ports to the Firth of Forth for allocation among the allied and associated powers. This allocation was made by the Allied Naval Armistice Commission in contravention of the ruling of the Allied Commission at Brussels in March that the ships were American property and could not be seized.

Criticism of the delay in returning German prisoners of war was answered by the German Government on July 21 in a statement throwing the responsibility upon the Allies. Members of the German commission at Versailles, the statement declared, had been waiting vainly for weeks for the Entente to name Commissioners, as the terms of the Peace Treaty, though demanding prompt reparation, made this subject to the control of a joint allied and German commission.

TRIAL FOR ATROCITIES

England, France, and Belgium submitted to the Peace Conference on Oct. 6 their final lists of German military officials to be delivered up by Germany in accordance with the responsibilities clause of the Peace Treaty. No list was submitted by the United States, but it was stated that the latter country would participate in the action taken against officials proved guilty. These lists were then practically completed. The name of the German Kaiser was absent, as he was to be dealt with separately. The court-martial authorities of Lille on Oct. 7 demanded the extradition of Count von Bismarck, grandson of the famous German Chancellor, for having had fourteen inhabitants of the village of Vicoigne shot "as an example" and for burning several houses there. Similar charges were made against eight other officers, whose extradition was also demanded.

On Sept. 5 the allied powers sent an official note to the German Government demanding that Article 61 of the new German Constitution, stipulating for the admission of Austria to the German Reichsrat, be declared null and void as a violation of the Treaty of Versailles. The German Government answered this demand with a note admitting the interpretation of the Entente, but stating that the elimination of the article in question was unnecessary pending the alteration by the council of the League of Nations of the constitutional position of German Austria. This reply was deemed evasive by the Peace Conference, which insisted on a written declaration that the article was not to be considered as transcending the treaty section forbidding German participation in Austrian affairs. On Sept. 21 Baron Kurt von Lersner, President of the German peace delegation, arrived at Versailles to sign the demanded protocol. The signing, which occurred the following day, was private; the only allied representative present was Jules Cambon of the French Peace Mission.

INTERALLIED COMMISSIONS

Fifty-one interallied commissions were created by the Peace Treaty. One of the most important was the Rhineland Commission. By Sept. 5 many of the staffs composing this had arrived at Coblenz. The personnel of the American group numbered 9, the Belgian group 4, the British and French about 140 each. An entire house was taken over for use of the staff of the last-named powers. The German National Commission had also opened offices in Coblenz. Communities and districts were to be heard on all questions affecting them.

On Oct. 18 the Supreme Council passed a resolution declaring that membership on all commissions created by the treaty was a privilege rather than an obligation, and that delegates might sit on the commissions regardless of the question of ratification. By this action the Allies invited the United States to take part in the interallied commissions pending the ratification of the treaty by the Senate. On Oct. 20, however, the State Department at Washington ruled that American diplomatic and military participation in carrying out the provisions of the treaty must wait for the Senate ratification.

The task of dismantling the twelve ancient forts which surrounded Mainz had begun on Oct. 4. According to the terms of the Peace Treaty all German Rhine fortresses must be demolished. Much blasting was required, and it was stated that the process would be long.

Addressing the National Assembly on

Oct. 7 Chancellor Bauer said that two months after ratification of the treaty the German Army would be reduced to 200,000 men. All plans for maintaining a large force under disguise were emphatically repudiated by Herr Bauer.

On Oct. 16 the Germans had begun the evacuation of the first and second zones in Schleswig, in accordance with the conditions laid down by the Peace Treaty. The International Commission was preparing the arrangements for the plebiscite to decide whether the districts involved should remain German or join Denmark, and was making plans for the administration of the region. Warning had been given Germany as early as July 30 against the sale of national properties in Schleswig which were held as possible security for the payment of Germany's indemnity.

Another expected plebiscite was in East Prussia. On Oct. 5 more than 100,000 natives of the eastern province eligible to vote in the coming plebiscite had registered at the Election Bureau in Thorn, West Prussia. Branch offices had been opened in Westphalia and the Rhine provinces, and persons unable to pay their railroad fare to this district were being given free transportation.

On Aug. 27 the Japanese authorities were taking over German and Austrian properties at Tsing-tao as an installment on the German indemnity.

A United States destroyer arrived at New York on Oct. 7 and landed $5,125,000 in German gold. This represented the first shipment of gold from the German Government in part payment of the $158,000,000 of food and other supplies arranged for by Food Administrator Hoover in Berlin.

Ratification by Other Nations

Waiting for the United States

THE Treaty of Versailles cannot become effective until, in addition to Germany, at least three of the principal allied and associated powers have ratified it. Great Britain ratified it on July 31 and Belgium on Aug. 8, but Belgium is not a great power. France completed the formal ratification on Oct. 13. Meanwhile Italy's King had signed a ratification decree on Oct. 7, and the decree was filed in Paris eight days later. Technically this completed the three rati-fications required for putting the Peace Treaty in force and starting the machinery of the various executive commissions for which it provides. As the Italian ratification, however, still required the approval of the Parliament at Rome to become a law of the realm, it could, if the Peace Conference so ruled, be regarded as still incomplete for purposes of putting the treaty into force. England and France had shown a marked desire from the outset that the United States should be one of the three powers to confirm the treaty and take the lead in executing its many provisions. The Supreme Council, therefore, hesitated to name the date for putting the treaty into force, waiting day after day for some change in the Senate situation at Washington.

Marshal Foch also asked for more time, as his military plans had been disorganized by America's refusal to send soldiers for policing the plebiscite districts in Silesia and Schleswig. He had counted on having 5,000 American troops at his disposal, but a message from Secretary Baker had informed him that our men could not be used for that purpose, though the required number of volunteers were already on their way across to Europe. Therefore, Marshal Foch had to change his schedule and call on the English and French staffs for more soldiers.

On Oct. 26 the Supreme Council was still waiting, reluctant to act and intimating that it was willing to postpone the treaty date even to the middle of November if by so doing it could gain the immediate assistance of the United States in enforcing the treaty. Thus the matter stood when these pages went to press.

The French Chamber began its ratification debate on Aug. 26, and continued it through several lively sessions; there was a great deal of hostile comment, through which the Ministers sat in silence. A crisis occurred on the 29th, when, after a stirring speech by Maurice Barrès, who criticised the failure to make a Rhine frontier, and another by Albert Thomas, who advocated the neutralization of the Rhine Valley, more than twenty Deputies announced that they would take no part in the debate. All the Government's supporters rallied to the defense of Premier Clemenceau. On Sept. 3 Franklin Bouillon, the fourteenth speaker, declared that he would vote against ratification, attacked America and the League of Nations, and dwelt on France's enormous war debt. Premier Clemenceau, on Sept. 19, urged immediate ratification, regardless of all other questions. Finally, on Oct. 2, the Chamber voted for ratification, 372 to 53, with 73 members abstaining from voting. At the same time it approved the protective treaties with the United States and Great Britain.

In the French Senate, on Oct. 7, Léon Bourgeois, Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Treaty, delivered his report, which called for immediate ratification. The report urged that the treaty be regarded chiefly from the viewpoint of its safeguards to France. Confidence was expressed that measures limiting armaments, though not embodied in the treaty, would ultimately be incorporated within it in the form of amendments. An argument was further made for the bringing to trial of the German Emperor, as the author of acts contrary to The Hague convention. The report ended with an expression of satisfaction over the restitution of Alsace and Lorraine, and of hope that the solidarity of the Allies would continue during the period of peace. After some debate the Senate, on Oct. 11, ratified the treaty, and also the Franco-American and Franco-British defense treaties. The vote stood 217 for ratification, and none against it. One member abstained from voting. None of the bitterness that marked the debate in the Chamber was visible in the Senate.

With the formal action of the French Executive, on Oct. 11 and Oct. 13, the treaty with Germany passed its third ratification by the principal nations signatory to the pact. In France it went into immediate effect; the state of war was declared at an end in France and Algeria, and the censorship was lifted. All war restrictions were similarly removed.

King Victor Emmanuel, acting for Italy, had issued a royal decree of ratification on Oct. 7; this instrument itself stated, however, that it would become law only on being presented to the Italian Parliament. That body would not re-assemble until December. Both the Italian and the British copies of the treaty were deposited with the Secretariat of the Peace Conference on Oct. 15.

Ratification by Canada, as an autonomous part of the British Empire, was the chief subject of discussion at a special session of the Canadian Parliament, on Sept. 1. The urgency of proceeding immediately to the consideration of the treaty, the Governor General said, compelled him to summon the legislators to renewed labors, which, he hoped, would not be of long duration. He had been advised, he declared, that the document should not be ratified on behalf of Canada without the approval of Parliament. In addition, Parliament would be asked, he explained, to make such financial provision as may be required "in connection with the Peace Treaty and for other purposes."

Both houses at Ottawa ratified the treaty with Germany on Sept. 14 after four days' debate. Only one amendment was offered. It came from W. S. Fielding, formerly Minister of Finance in the Laurier Government, who sought to modify the Government motion by adding that in giving approval the House in no way assented to an impairment of the existing autonomous authority of the Dominion in respect to Canada's potential participation in any future war. The amendment was defeated by 102 votes to 70. One Liberal speaker criticised the Shantung agreement, and spoke in favor of Ireland. One reservation was urged, similar in tenor to the Fielding amendment. None of these motions prevailed, however, and the treaty was ratified.

China, though unable to ratify the treaty, because of her refusal to sign at Versailles, formally declared her adherence, on Sept. 24, to all the provisions of that treaty exclusive of the agreement with Japan concerning Shantung, and declared the state of war with Germany at an end.

Japanese chauvinists, on Aug. 26, made a hostile demonstration against Marquis Saionji and the other peace delegates on their return to Japan, on the ground, as explained later in a manifesto published at Kobe, that the provision of racial equality had not been put through, and that Japan, through the blundering policy of the Japanese peace delegation, had been placed in a position of isolation internationally. According to Peace Conference information, Parliamentary action on ratification was not required by the Constitution of Japan, signature by the Emperor being sufficient. The royal signature, however, had not been affixed when the present pages went to press.

The State Department at Washington was informed that the Legislative Assembly of Guatemala had ratified the treaty with Germany on Oct. 2.

Activities of the Peace Conference

The League of Nations

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 20, 1919]

THE activities of the Peace Conference at Paris continued through September and October. On Oct. 10 the Supreme Council decided to grant to the Bulgarian plenipotentiaries an extension of ten days in which to return their observations on the draft of the treaty submitted to them on Sept. 19, the additional period to expire on Oct. 24. On Oct. 14 a new Cabinet was formed by M. Stambulowsky for the purpose of ratifying the Peace Treaty.

The council further approved the plan proposed by the Reparations Commission, providing for the dispatch to Budapest of an interallied commission, including one Rumanian delegate, to take an inventory of the objects and materials which had been seized by the Rumanian military authorities in Hungary. This approval followed the hearing of the report of Sir George Clerk, who had been sent to Hungary and Rumania to study the situation for the council, and who had returned the previous week from Bucharest.

Another action taken by the Supreme Council was the acceptance on Oct. 11 of the demand presented on behalf of Admiral Kolchak and General Denikin, asking that Russian war material captured by the German Army be turned over to them for the use of their armies. It was decided that the Interallied Commission of Control should supervise the execution of the measure. Other measures approved by the council at this time were: The acceptance of a report regarding the formation of an international commission, sitting at Berlin, which should have charge of the interests of Russian prisoners still in Germany; and the sending to the Drafting Committee of a proposal introduced by the Italian delegation asking that a clause should be written into the treaty with Hungary, stipulating that Hungary should renounce in favor of Italy all right and title to territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy given by the treaty of Saint Germain to Italy.

The main problem still confronting the conference was that of the peace with Turkey. At various times since last December the conference had discussed the question in three phases: The dismemberment of Turkey, the possibility of her return to her pre-war status, and the retaining or dismissal of the Sultan. Incidents like the landing of Greek troops in Smyrna and of Italians at Adalia, the continuance of Armenian massacres by the Young Turk party in Asiatic Turkey, and the setting up of a new Government by Mustapha Pasha in Anatolia, had occupied the conference at various sessions. The vexed question of mandates still remained unsettled. The French delegates favored the retention of the Turkish Empire in Europe as the solution most likely to be satisfactory to all concerned.

As reflecting the attitude of the Supreme Council a speech made by Premier Lloyd George at Sheffield, England, on Oct. 17 had significance. In this speech

Mr. Lloyd George said that it was impossible to settle the destiny of Europe without knowing whether the United States was going to share the burdens of civilization. Speaking to the American Ambassador, Mr. Davis, Mr. Lloyd George emphasized this point, and added:

The people of Turkey have been living in the shadow of a great tyranny for centuries. They are appealing to America for help. I hope that the appeal will not be in vain. Such a remark might sound impertinent from a British Minister, but we are undertaking similar responsibilities ourselves and find that we are coming to the limit of our strength and that it is unwise for us to go further.

A similar appeal from an American source was made by Henry Morgenthau, former Ambassador to Turkey, on his return to the United States from Poland, where, as head of the American Commission to investigate the treatment of Jews in that country, he had passed seven months. He arrived in New York on Oct. 18, where he at once published an appeal for the acceptance by the United States of a mandate for Constantinople, Armenia, and Anatolia. His idea involved the upbuilding of a great American centre in Constantinople as a living example of democracy in the Near East.

Colonel House, the confidential adviser to President Wilson at the Peace Conference, returned to the United States early in October to recuperate after a long illness in Paris and the strain of unremitting labors on the Peace Treaty.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Plans for bringing the League of Nations covenant into force with the simultaneous publication in Paris of the ratification decrees of three of the main allied and associated powers were announced in Washington soon after the ratification by Italy. A nation-wide campaign in favor of the League was opened at the Mansion House in London on Oct. 13 under the Presidency of the Lord Mayor. Messages were read from King George and David Lloyd George, and eloquent addresses were delivered by ex-Premier Asquith, Lord Robert Cecil, Premier Venizelos, Lord Reading, and others. All the foreign Ambassadors and diplomats, and men prominent in various walks of civil life, churchmen, laborites, industrialists, scientists, and lawyers, attended. The message of King George was as follows:

We have won the war. That is a great achievement. But it is not enough. We fought to gain a lasting peace, and it is our supreme duty to take every measure to secure it.

For that nothing is more essential than a strong and enduring League of Nations. Every day makes this clearer. The covenant of Paris is a good foundation. The nature and the strength of the structure we build upon this must depend on the earnestness and sincerity of popular support.

Millions of British men and women, poignantly conscious of the ruin and suffering caused by the brutal havoc of war, stand ready to help if only they are shown the way. In the knowledge of what already has been done, appreciation of the difficulties which lie before us, and a determination to overcome them, we must spare no efforts.

I commend this cause to all citizens of the empire, so that, with the help of all other men of good-will, a buttress and a sure defense of peace, to the glory of God and the lasting fame of our age and our country, may be established.

The message of Lloyd George was as follows:

Civilization cannot longer afford to squander its time and treasure on the destruction of its own handiwork. The allied Governments are pledged to the League's noble ideals. I appeal to my fellow-countrymen to support international order and good-will.

Mr. Asquith declared that the military and naval armaments of nations were being continued out of all proportion to the actual requirements for the preservation of order, and said he hoped the members of the League would fulfill their pledges under the covenant purely as a duty. Mr. Asquith added that with the people alone lay the initiative and ultimate responsibility. The alternatives before them were to relapse into the old insane hostilities or the provision and defense of a way for the free spirit of mankind.

The attitude of the smaller nations, especially Denmark and Norway, was brought out early in October. In an authorized interview the Danish Minister of Defense, Mr. Munch, denied emphatically the charge made several times in the Peace Treaty discussion in America that Denmark was afraid of the League of Nations. The Danish people, he said, had watched President Wilson's efforts to create the League of Nations with the greatest sympathy. In Denmark, he added, all political parties were agreed that the country must join the League of Nations as soon as it was formed, to contribute to this great and daring experiment to abolish international wars. In Norway on the same date the Parliamentary committee appointed to discuss the entrance of Norway into the League reported unanimously in favor of adherence.

Léon Bourgeois, former Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs, and French member of the League of Nations Commission of the Peace Conference, was appointed representative of France on the Council of the League of Nations on Oct. 14. This was the first formal appointment to the League of Nations; France, as the first of the principal allied and associated powers to complete the formal ratification, had won the honor of nominating the first representative.

The original American draft of the League of Nations covenant, as submitted to the Peace Conference, was sent to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate by President Wilson, in response to a request made by the committee on Aug. 11. The American plan covered the provisions now embraced in Article X., and also embodied the clauses relating to the freedom of the seas; but the articles relating to the Monroe Doctrine and the direct reservations on domestic questions were not included.

Senate Debate on the Peace Treaty

Prolonged Contest Over Proposed Amendments to Accompany Ratification—Text of New Reservations

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 23, 1919]

THE United States continued the long debate over ratification of the German Peace Treaty throughout the period under review. At every session there were speeches for or against the amendments and reservations offered by the Foreign Relations Committee in the preceding month. Continuous efforts were made by the Republican leaders to reach a unanimous agreement. The Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator H. C. Lodge of Massachusetts, the Republican leader, strongly supported direct amendment of the treaty, and this position was sustained by thirty-six Republican Senators and two Democratic Senators, the latter being Senator Reed of Missouri and Senator Gore of Oklahoma. Another group, comprising twelve Republicans and three Democrats, opposed direct amendments, but favored specific and effective qualifying reservations. A third group, numbering forty, headed by Senator Hitchcock of Nebraska, the former Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, all known as "Administration Democrats," opposed any amendments to the text of the treaty, and the greater number strongly opposed any qualifying reservations whatsoever. Nearly all the members of the Senate participated in the debate, which at times grew acrimonious.

THE GORE AMENDMENTS

The first specific issue voted on was that of thirty-five textual amendments to the treaty offered by Senator Fall, Republican, of New Mexico, intended to eliminate American participation on the commissions established under the treaty, excepting the Reparations Commission. The vote on these amendments was taken on Oct. 2 and resulted in their defeat by a decisive majority.

On the first test between the opposing sides, which came on the amendment to take the United States out of the Commission to fix the Belgian boundaries, the vote was 30 in favor of to 58 against. All the middle-ground Senators except Mr. McLean of Connecticut voted against the amendment.

MIDDLE-GROUNDERS IN CONTROL

On three other roll calls taken on the amendments there were slight changes in the attitude of the middle-ground Senators influenced by the points involved. On two roll calls, one to eliminate the United States from participation in the Sarre Valley Commission and the other pertaining to the commission to govern Upper Silesia, where a plebescite as to future government is to be held, the opposition mustered 31 votes, that being their maximum strength.

The alignment found Senator Gore of Oklahoma voting with the Republicans on all amendments, while Senator Thomas of Colorado joined them in two roll calls. Senator Jones, Republican, of Washington, voted with the Democrats on two amendments, and later switched to the opposition.

The voting gave evidence that the middle-ground Senators controlled the situation, both as to amendments and reservations. From speeches made by five of this group, Capper, Hale, Cummins, Lenroot, and Smoot, it seemed evident that, although opposed to textual amendments, they would vote against the treaty unless reservations were adopted with its ratification.

The vote on the amendment to eliminate the United States from participation in the Commission to Establish the Boundary Lines of Belgium, the first vote taken, follows:

Senator Reed, Missouri, for, with Senator King, Utah, against.

Senator Sutherland, West Virginia, for, with Senator Smith, South Carolina, against.

Total—8.

Had all of the Senators, paired and unable to vote, been able to cast their votes, the vote on the Belgian amendment would have been: For, 34; against, 60.

The Senate took eight votes on the Fall amendments, four by roll call and the remainder viva voce. Besides that, on the first amendment, relating to the Belgian boundaries, the votes were as follows:

Two amendments relating to commissions to fix boundaries of the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, defeated by viva voce vote.

An amendment on the Sarre Valley Basin, defeated 31 for and 56 against.

Twenty-six amendments, en bloc, on commissions on boundaries relating to Poland, Czechoslovakia, Upper Silesia, the Rhineland, East Prussia, and Danzig, defeated viva voce.

An amendment barring the United States from participation in treaties with Czechoslovakia, by which the latter guarantees religious freedom to its subjects, defeated 28 to 53.

Two amendments pertaining to a plebiscite for Upper Silesia and providing that the United States send soldiers to that territory, defeated 31 to 46.

An amendment relating to the religious freedom of Poland, defeated viva voce.

An amendment touching on a plebiscite for East Prussia, defeated viva voce.

The vote on the amendment against the United States participating in the commission on the plebiscite for Upper Silesia, found Senators Sterling, Kenyon, and Cummins, who had not voted with the Republicans before, aligned with them. The aggregate of thirty-one votes in favor of this amendment would have been swelled to forty had all the Senators who had voted before with the Republicans or were absent answered the roll call.

THE SHANTUNG AMENDMENT

The second test on textually amending the treaty took place on Oct. 16. By a vote of 55 to 35, the six Lodge amendments to the Peace Treaty, providing for restoring the economic privileges on the Shantung Peninsula to China rather than to give them to Japan, as the treaty provides, were defeated. The amendments were voted upon en bloc. Immediately after the vote was announced, Senator Lodge told the Senate that, "at the proper time," he would move to strike the entire Shantung section from the treaty.

The vote on the Shantung amendments was:

Of those not voting, Senators Edge, Republican, of New Jersey; Martin, Democrat, of Virginia; Smith, Democrat, of South Carolina, and Johnson, Democrat, of South Dakota, were paired against the amendments. Senators Elkins, Republican, of West Virginia, and Fernald, Republican, of Maine, were paired for them.

GLIMPSES OF THE DEBATE

The debate on the Lodge amendments ran from 11 o'clock until 5:30, when the vote was taken. The Republican leaders exerted every effort to save the amendments from defeat, although knowing, in advance of the vote, that they were beaten.

Senator Johnson of California denounced the Shantung award as "infamous, detestable, and abominable." He told Republican Senators who, during the debate, had said that they would favor a reservation rather than an amendment, that the way to "cut Shantung out of the treaty is to reject it outright." Although assured by the Republican leaders that the prospects were favorable for the adoption of a reservation on Shantung, Mr. Johnson insisted that the amendment route was the safer one.

In the speeches of nearly all the Republicans who voted against the amendments the preference for a reservation was emphasized. They indicated that they would be willing to support a reservation that would assert the privilege of the United States to refuse to be bound by any action of the League of Nations in any dispute relating to the Shantung Peninsula.

In his speech in advocacy of the Lodge amendments, Senator Johnson said:

All Senators seem to feel a sense of disapproval over the wrong done in the Shantung award under the treaty, but those who would retain it in the treaty argue that it was a decision, by the Peace Conference, that was dictated by expediency and that it is too late to do anything. That is a weak, a timid attitude to take.

If the United States condones this wrong to China, it will be the first time we have ever been a party to the despoiling of that nation. I insist that we ought not be bluffed into failing to do what is our plain duty. The decision of the Senate in this matter ought to be made upon the moral principle involved. If it is, the Senate will vote to cut out this infamy from the treaty.

OPPOSITION TO AMENDMENTS

Before Senator Johnson spoke, Senators Kellogg, Hale, Townsend, Sterling, and Smoot announced in speeches that they would vote for a reservation on the Shantung award, but that, as an amendment would involve sending the treaty back to the principal signatory powers, they could not support it.

Senator Hale, in telling the Senate why he would vote against the amendment, said that while he disapproved the Shantung provisions in the treaty, he felt that the "wisest" policy was to express disapproval through a reservation in which the United States could affirm its refusal to be held to any judgment of the League relating to the Shantung rights. That, he said, would leave the Shantung award in the treaty but relieve the United States from any obligation respecting it in the future. Mr. Hale went on:

Unless reservations are made to this treaty that will make the position of the United States clear, both as to Shantung and the inequality of vote in the League assembly, I shall cast my vote against the treaty.

Senator Sterling said he felt that the Senate would be "wasting time" trying to eliminate the Shantung provision through amendment, since the treaty was practically in force now and to make textual changes would necessitate reconvening the Peace Conference.

"So far as the treaty is concerned, the Shantung provision is in force," said Mr. Sterling. "All the United States can do now is to decline, through a reservation, to become a party to it. With the United States in the League of Nations we can accomplish much to rectify the injustice done to China."

Senator Smith, Democrat, of Georgia, argued that a reservation would better accomplish what the Senate sought to do.

SENATOR PHELAN'S VIEW

Senator Phelan, Democrat, of California, while announcing that he was opposed to any amendments or drastic reservations, indicated that he would vote for an interpretative reservation to assure the United States full determination of her domestic questions, if it was thought necessary. While concerned over what he called Japanese encroachment on the Pacific Coast, he said he was not sure that, under the treaty, Japan would be enabled to extend her influence there.

I do not see how the question of Japanese immigration is involved in this treaty, [said Senator Phelan.] We will never consent to race equality, which involves immigration, naturalization, elective franchise, and ownership and intermarriage. It was rejected at Paris. These are domestic questions in which the League of Nations has no concern.

Lest there be doubt under Article XI, as to the power of the League to have jurisdiction in these matters, I would favor an explicit interpretative reservation on the matter.

Senator La Follette finished the debate on the Shantung amendment, denouncing it as a "burglary," in which, he said, the United States was asked to participate.

This award to Japan rests on force, [said Senator La Follette.] It involves robbery so barefaced that they won't dare go through with it if the United States refuses to become a party to it.

On Oct. 17 the Senate, without a roll call, defeated the two amendments proposed by Senator Fall of New Mexico designed to limit American representation on the Reparations Commission. In the debate preceding this vote there was sharp criticism of the sending of 5,000 American troops on Oct. 16 from New York to Europe, where they were to police Silesia during the plebiscite ordered by the terms of the treaty.

SENDING TROOPS ABROAD

Senator Brandegee of Connecticut stated that he had received many letters asking that something be done to protect the Armenian people from slaughter when British troops are withdrawn. He said:

Of course, we know, or have been informed through the press, that the British are withdrawing rapidly their forces from Armenia and the Caucasus and have requested this country to send from 100,000 to 200,000 men over there to take the place of the withdrawn British troops.

Senator Borah interrupted with the question: "There are not any undeveloped oil fields in Armenia or Turkey, then?" Senator Brandegee replied:

The article states that the President is very anxious that we should accept the mandate for Armenia, and, therefore I assume that there is no oil or anything else of use to this country there. * * *

I hope that somebody will introduce a resolution to find out what the proposition is in Armenia, how far we have been committed, if at all, by the President, who has the authority to initiate agreements, and I hope that some information concerning the dispatch of our army to various parts of the world will be forthcoming.

Senator Wadsworth of New York, Chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, informed the Senate that he had made inquiries about the Silesian plan from Chief of Staff March. He continued:

I learned that the expedition consists in the aggregate of about 5,000 men, the 5th and 15th Regiments of Infantry, and suitable detachments. It is bound in the first instance for Coblenz, to be held there pending the time when directions shall be given it by some higher authority to proceed to Silesia, and there participate in the policing of a plebiscite.

This American force, I was given to understand, was to form part of a force contributed by at least two other nations, the aggregate of the allied force to consist of something like 18,000 men.

I was given to understand that the dispatch of this force was due to some arrangements made by the American Peace Commission in Paris, or some agreement made by them with the representatives of other powers, to the effect that America would join with the other powers in policing this far-away country while a plebiscite is being held. It was intimated also that the power for sending this force springs from the fact that we are still technically at war with Germany.

Complete information as to the contemplated use of American troops abroad should be given to the Congressional committees, Senator Wadsworth said, so that a military policy could be framed in accordance with the plan.

A PASSAGE AT ARMS

Just before the vote was taken Senator Fall made a bitter reply to Senator Hitchcock's warning that if action on the treaty was delayed the President could accomplish his objects by the continued use of war powers. Senator Fall declared:

There is a way reserved in the Declaration of Independence in which war powers can be taken away without the ratification of this treaty. God deliver us from the necessity of appealing to the ultimate powers of the people of the United States to change forcibly their form of government. We have declared ourselves, in violation of the terms of the armistice, justified in occupying portions of Germany which were not provided to be occupied in the armistice.

Senator Hitchcock interrupted to say that the President made the armistice and had the power to change it, the armistice being a purely military proceeding.

Now there is another astounding proposition, [Senator Fall resumed.]

Any Senator who holds such ideas as those just expressed has an absolute contempt for the Constitution of the United States, an absolute contempt for the form of government adopted by our fathers and so far preserved by the sword of our people, or else has no conception whatever of what the form of government is, with its three co-ordinate branches of government. He has no conception, as I understand it, of international law or of the rules among civilized nations.

The Senator does not realize for a moment that the armistice takes the place of the treaty of peace for the time being when it is in effect, and that a violation of it by us would be as much to be condemned as a violation of its terms by Germany.

To Mr. Hitchcock's remark, "The Senator has shown no violation of it," Senator Fall replied:

But the Senator himself is suggesting that the President has the right to violate it. So long as we have not entered into a treaty of peace with the last portion of the former Austrian Empire the dictatorship in this country and throughout the world will continue. That is the only logical deduction which can be made from the war powers of the President as construed by his representatives here.

Therefore, if we can just hold off peace with any other country, the President can continue to exercise his war powers abroad, and under his war powers, being a military dictator, he can use the armed forces of the country anywhere he pleases and not be subject to punishment by impeachment through the Congress. I deny any such construction.

DEMOCRATS CONFER

On Oct. 21 fifteen Democratic Senators conferred as to a policy regarding reservations projected by the Republican majority, but no definite agreement was reached. It developed at this conference that the Democrats were not united in their position respecting reservations. Senator Hitchcock announced that no compromise would be made regarding qualifications of the treaty. The same day Senator McCumber of North Dakota, who was the leader of the Republican group opposing textual amendments, reported seven reservations which were regarded as quite as effective qualifications of the treaty as any that had been agreed upon by Senator Lodge and the group favoring amendments. This action foreshadowed an agreement among the Republicans; it indicated that they would unanimously support the reservation program, which insured its adoption by the Senate.

REVISED RESERVATIONS REPORTED

The Foreign Relations Committee on Oct. 22 decided to report a series of revised reservations as substitutes for those of Sept. 10. The most important addition was a preamble specifying that all the reservations must be accepted by three of the four principal allied powers before they become effective. A significant feature of the meeting was the fact that Senator McCumber, the Republican leader of the group opposing amendments, voted for all the reservations, but cast his vote against the preamble on the ground that it was tantamount to an amendment. Senator Shields, Democrat of Tennessee, voted for all the reservations and the preamble.

In all, the regular Republicans of the Foreign Relations Committee had thirteen reservations to be acted upon as part of the reservation program, but three were passed over until a later time.

Of the ten reservations accepted five touched upon points already covered in the four original reservations adopted by the committee six weeks ago. These pertained to withdrawal; Article X., concerning the guarantee of territorial integrity and political independence of members of the League; the mandate over weak nations, which was formerly part of the reservation on Article X.; the Monroe Doctrine, and domestic questions, such as the tariff and immigration.

The reservation on Article X. was almost identical in phrasing with that which President Wilson denounced in his Salt Lake City speech as being a dagger thrust at the heart of the treaty. This reservation alone, if adopted, Senator Hitchcock said, would be enough to impel the Administration forces to reject the treaty. In effect, he said, it constituted an amendment. Nearly all the other reservations, he also said, fell into the same category.

The Shantung reservation was fought out for a considerable time in the committee. As originally drawn, it provided that the United States should decline to recognize the validity of any titles which Germany assumed to have on the Shantung Peninsula, which, under the treaty, were turned over to Japan. This was struck out when Senator Lodge became convinced that it might not muster the support of the majority of the Senate.

Nine of the ten reservations were adopted by a vote of 11 to 6. On the preamble the vote was 10 to 7, with Senator McCumber switching his vote. The vote on the resolution providing that the United States shall accept no mandate except by consent of Congress was 12 to 2, Senators Shields and Williams voting in favor of it and Senators Smith and Pittman voting against it. Senators Hitchcock and Swanson did not vote.

TEXT OF RESERVATIONS

The preamble and reservations adopted by the committee read:

PREAMBLE.—The committee also reports the following reservations and understandings to be made a part and a condition of the resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said following reservations and understandings have been accepted as a part and a condition of said instrument of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan:

Reservation No. 1.—The United States understands and construes Article I. that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

Reservation No. 2.—The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the League or not—under the provisions of Article X., or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or to authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, by act or joint resolution, so provide.

Reservation No. 3.—No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under Article XXII., Part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

Reservation No. 4.—The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way, either to arbitration or to the consideration of the Council or Assembly of the League of Nations or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

Reservation No. 5.—The United States will not submit to arbitration by the assembly or the council of the League of Nations (provided for in said treaty of peace) any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend on or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe Doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone, and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

Reservation No. 6.—The United States withholds its assent to Articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.

Reservation No. 8.—The United States understands that the Reparations Commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by its Congress approves such regulation or interference.

Reservation No. 9.—The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations or secretariat or any commission, committee, or conference or other agency, organized under the League of Nations, or under the treaty, or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

Reservation No. 10.—If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of Article VIII., it reserves the right to increase such armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Reservation No. 12.—The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in Article XVI. of the covenant of the League of Nations, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

The three reservations passed over by the committee were:

Reservation No. 7.—The Congress of the United States by law will provide for the appointment of the representatives of the United States in the assembly and the council of the League of Nations, and may in its discretion provide for the participation of the United States in any commission, committee, tribunal, court, council, of conference, or in the selection of any members thereof and for the appointment of members of said commission, committee, court, council, or conference, or any other representatives under the treaty of peace, or in carrying out its provisions and until such participation and appointment have been so provided for, and the powers and duties of such representative so defined, no person shall represent the United States under either such said League of Nations or the treaty, or be authorized to perform any act for or on behalf of the United States thereunder, and no citizen of the United States shall be elected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, courts, councils, or conferences except with the approval of the Congress of the United States.

Reservation No. 11.—The United States construes sub-division "C" of Article XXIII. to mean that the League shall refuse to recognize agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children and that the League shall use every means possible to abolish and do away with such practice.

Reservation No. 13.—Nothing in Articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto, or in any other article, provision, section or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

(This pertains to the provisions of the sections dealing with alien property.)

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Oct. 23 adopted four more reservations to the treaty, making fourteen in all. Included in these four was Reservation No. 7, as it is printed herewith, except that commissions, if any, are to be chosen by "The Senate" instead of by "The Congress." No. 12, as it appears above, was also adopted. The following new Reservation No. 13, offered by Senator Shields, Democrat, of Tennessee, was adopted by a vote of 10 to 7, one Republican member, Senator McCumber, voting No:

The United States declines to accept any interest as trustee, or in her own right, or to accept any responsibility, for the government or disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany to which Germany renounces her right and titles to the principal allied and associated powers under Articles 119 to 127, inclusive.

In putting the original Reservation No. 2 into No. 4, which provides that the United States reserves the right to determine what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, the committee voted to add to the latter reservation the phrase: "And the suppression of the traffic in women and children, and in opium and other dangerous drugs."

Senator Shields also moved that the Chairman be instructed to draw a reservation covering the "national honor and vital interests" of the United States. This is the language of the Root treaties of 1908, and was suggested by Senator Reed of Missouri, a Democrat, but not a member of the committee. This motion was passed, 10 to 5, and the wording of the reservation was left to Senator Lodge, who offered the following on Oct. 24 as Reservation No. 14:

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions affect its honor or its vital interests and declares that such questions are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the Council or the Assembly of the League of Nations or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

At the time of going to press the Senate had before it the amendment of Senator Johnson of California to equalize the voting strength of the United States with the six votes of Great Britain and its dominions. It was believed this amendment would be defeated, and, it was agreed that, if so, it would be reported as the fifteenth reservation.

New Zealand's Premier on the Treaty

THE Prime Minister of New Zealand, William F. Massey, who had represented his dominion (with Sir Joseph Ward) at the Peace Conference in Paris, gave an account of his stewardship to a large audience at Wanganui, New Zealand, on Sept. 6, 1919. He said the Paris Conference was the most important the British dominions had ever taken part in, and they had been admitted on terms of equality with the empire and the allied nations.

When war broke out, Germany held two important strategical islands in the Pacific. New Zealand now held one—Samoa—and Australia the other—Rabaul.

Coming to the question of Nauru Island, Mr. Massey explained that it was the most important phosphates bearing island in the Pacific. It was in Germany's hands when war broke out, and a company of Germans and British were working the deposits. New Zealanders had had their eyes on the island for many years, and when it was seen that Germany was going to lose the island, some New Zealanders, of whom Mr. Massey was one, thought New Zealand should get it. Australian and New Zealand delegates did not agree as to who should have the mandate over the island, so it was eventually decided, on Mr. Massey's proposal, that Great Britain should take the mandate.

So far as the New Hebrides was concerned, Mr. Massey hoped the Condominium would be ended as soon as possible.

American Demobilization Completed

Political and Economic Developments in the Transition From War to Peace Activities

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 20, 1919]

THE armed forces raised and equipped so rapidly under the exigencies of war have been to a great extent absorbed in the general life of the nation. By Oct. 14 the American Army had been virtually demobilized. The strength of the army had been reduced to less than 300,000 men, and, so far as wartime prohibition was concerned, the ban could have been lifted at once by the President, provided the Peace Treaty had been ratified and his proclamation of peace were issued.

The estimated strength of the army on Oct. 14 was 290,447. Of this number, 26,753 were in Europe, 5,672 en route from Europe, and 224,498 in the United States. From Nov. 11, 1918, to Oct. 16, 1919, a total of 3,403,796 troops were reported discharged.

The cost of the war to the United States in man power was estimated officially on Sept. 23 as 116,492 dead and 205,590 wounded, a total of 322,182. These figures include losses to army and marine units on all fronts to Sept. 1.

Those killed in action totaled 35,585, or 11 per cent. of the entire list; died of wounds, 14,742; died of disease, 58,073; died of accident and other causes, 8,092. Under the head of "missing," the announcement records a zero, with the notation "all corrected."

The War Department announced on Oct. 6 that 33.8 per cent. of our men wounded in the war were gas casualties. The number wounded in action was 220,403, of which 74,573 represented gas casualties. The number of fatal gas casualties was 1,194, or 1.6 per cent. The number of wounded from other causes who died was 13,519, or 6.7 per cent.

Those gassed and admitted to hospitals, by type of gas, were as follows:

Kind of Gas.	Officers.	Men.	Total.
Not specified.....	1,201	31,812	26,013
Mustard	822	27,046	27,868
Phosgene	415	6,698	7,113
Chlorine	32	1,890	1,922
Yperite	30	901	931
Arsine	30	569	599
Asphyxiating	3	124	127
Total	2,533	72,040	74,573
Deaths in hospitals.	26	1,168	1,194

1,700 OFFICERS QUIT ARMY

It was stated on Oct. 4 that the resignation of more than 300 officers from the regular army had been accepted by the President within the six weeks preceding, and that more were being filed and accepted daily. The last War Department report shows that 1,622 officers have resigned since the armistice, and if resignations accepted since the report was issued are added, the number, it is stated, will exceed 1,700. The high cost of living and the inability of officers, especially the younger officers in the lower grades, to make both ends meet continues to be the principal cause of the resignations. In a few months more officers have resigned than resigned in all the years from the close of the civil war up to the time this country declared war on Germany in April, 1917. Within a few weeks all the officers now holding advanced or emergency ranking in the regular army will have been demoted to their original grades in the service, which means that their pay will revert to the scale of 1908, when the last army pay legislation was enacted. The last War Department report recorded 1,565 such demotions since the armistice, and several hundred have been added since the report was issued.

To meet the emergency thus created the War Department on Oct. 22 asked Congress to increase the pay of army officers 30 per cent. and that of enlisted men 50 per cent., in order to enable them to cope with the increased cost of living.

AIR SERVICE UNITS

Plans of the War Department for the organization and location of air service units on the basis of the temporary allotment of 12,088 officers and men to that branch of the army were announced on Oct. 9. The force to be maintained temporarily at Hazelhurst Field, Long Island, will comprise 39 officers and 284 men. The Hazelhurst Field force will consist of the 5th Observation Squadron of 19 officers and 132 men and the 14th Photographic Section of 1 officer and 20 men, which is to be newly organized.

The force to be maintained in the Philippines will be the 1st Observation Group Headquarters of 8 officers and 50 men, the 2d Observation Squadron of 19 officers and 132 men, the 3d Observation Squadron of 19 officers and 132 men, and the 6th Photographic Section of 1 officer and 20 men.

A force of equal size has been assigned to the Hawaiian Islands, consisting of the 2d Observation Group Headquarters of 8 officers and 50 men, the 4th Observation Squadron of 19 officers and 132 men, the 6th Observation Squadron of 19 officers and 132 men, and the 11th Photographic Section of 1 officer and 20 men.

For the Canal Zone the force is to comprise 28 officers and 202 men, including the 3d Observation Group Headquarters of 8 officers and 50 men, the 7th Observation Squadron of 19 officers and 132 men, and the 12th Photographic Section of 1 officer and 20 men.

PROMOTION OF GENERAL CROWDER

The Senate on Oct. 7, by a vote of 49 to 11, passed the bill which, if concurred in by the lower house, will retire Major Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, as a Lieutenant General of the regular establishment. Senator Chamberlain's amendment to make Major Gens. Hunter Liggett, Robert Lee Bullard, Leonard Wood, Henry P. McCain, Charles P. Summerall, Ernest Hinds, Harry F. Rogers, William C.

Langfitt, George W. Goethals, Surgeon Gen. Merritte W. Ireland, and Colonel William L. Kenley Lieutenant Generals was defeated by a viva voce vote.

Ten Democratic Senators voted against promoting General Crowder: Senators Bankhead of Alabama, Dial of South Carolina, Gay of Louisiana, Gerry of Rhode Island, Harrison of Mississippi, Owen of Oklahoma, Shields of Tennessee, Trammell of Florida, Williams of Mississippi, and Chamberlain of Oregon. The only Republican voting against the promotion was Senator La Follette of Wisconsin.

INCREASED NAVY PAY

Additional increases in navy pay sufficient to make the present rates 80 per cent. greater than the standards of 1914, to conform to the increase in the cost of living, were recommended to the House Naval Committee on Oct. 15 by Rear Admiral Samuel McGowan, Chief of the Navy Bureau of Supplies and Accounts. Adoption of this recommendation, he said, would involve an additional expenditure of $131,000,000 a year.

Thereafter, he told the committee, the pay schedules should be frequently adjusted to meet changes in the cost of living. This could be done, the Admiral said, through a system of index numbers, such as are now in use by the Department of Labor.

Increased allowances for midshipmen at Annapolis also were urged by Admiral McGowan. Concurring in this recommendation, Representative Hicks, Republican of New York, pointed out that officers at sea have bedding, toilet articles, and other equipment furnished them, while the midshipmen must pay for all of this out of their pay.

Secretary Daniels, in conference, Oct. 13, with Chairman Page of the Senate Naval Committee, was said to have acquiesced in the Senate proposal to give the retirement rank of Vice Admiral to Rear Admirals Sims, Benson, and Mayo, instead of the rank of Admiral, which was proposed for the first two by President Wilson. The nomination of Admiral Coontz to be Chief of Naval Operations, also was discussed at the conference. This nomination had not yet been confirmed at that date, owing to some opposition on political grounds.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD REPORT ON HIGH PRICES

The bulletin of the Federal Reserve Board for October pointed out that there was no hope of a real reduction in prices until the purchasing power of the dollar was restored and production increased. Discussing the high cost of living problem, this comment was made:

That the 'high price levels which have been attained in the United States present a grave situation is clear from the attention which current discussion of the causes of industrial unrest is directing to the cost of living problem. It presents the most urgent and immediate phase of the problem of post-war business and industrial readjustment. It promises to remain a persistent phase of post-war conditions unless its nature and cause are understood and a rational economic attitude toward it is developed.

So far as the profiteering practices * * * are responsible for the price aggravations which have been experienced in recent months, some considerable mitigation of the cost of living situation may be expected. * * * The problem of reducing the cost of living is, however, mainly that of restoring the purchasing power of the dollar. The dollar has lost purchasing power because expansion of credit, under the necessities of war financing, proceeded at a rate more rapid than the production and the saving of goods. The return to a sound economic condition and one which will involve as little further disturbance of normal economic relationships as possible will be a reversal of the process which has brought the country to its present pass. In other words, the way in must be the way out. As the way in was expansion of credit at a rate more rapid than expansion of production and saving, so the way out must be an increase in production and in saving. The effect of increased production will be to place a larger volume of goods against the greatly enlarged volume of our purchasing media and thus to reduce prices. The effect of increased saving will be a reduction in the volume of purchasing media in use and, by consequence, a reduction of prices also.

The cost of living problem on its financial side is misconceived unless it is conceived as the problem of restoring the value of the dollar. To accept the depreciation worked in the dollar by war conditions and to standardize the dollar of the future on this basis would be to ratify the inflation wrought by the war and the injustice it produced. No artificial solution for an economic situation of this kind is likely to commend itself to the better judgment and the sense of equity of the country, even could some artificial method of dealing with the question of monetary depreciation be devised which would not bring in its train a crop of new difficulties and problems.

TO CUT LIVING COST

The United States Council of National Defense on Oct. 5 issued the following statement to the public defining the reasons of the high cost of living and the remedies:

The United States Council of National Defense, composed of the Secretaries of War, Navy, Interior, Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor, has made a careful investigation of the high cost of living problem, and finds:

That the nation's productive powers have not been fully utilized since the armistice.

That too few goods, notably the necessities of life, have been produced, and that even some of these goods have been withheld from the market, and therefore from the people.

That the high cost of living is due in part to unavoidable war waste and increase of money and credit.

That there has been and is considerable profiteering, intentional and unintentional.

The council believes that the remedies for the situation are:

To produce more goods, and to produce them in proportion to the needs of the people.

To stamp out profiteering and stop unnecessary hoarding.

To enforce vigorously present laws and promptly to enact such further laws as are necessary to prevent and punish profiteering and needless hoarding.

To bring about better co-operation and method in distributing and marketing goods.

To keep both producer and consumer fully informed as to what goods are needed and as to what supplies are available, so that production may anticipate the country's demands.

Goods and not money are the means of life. Better standards of living are impossible without producing more goods. Man cannot consume what has not been produced.

At the war's end our allies had desperate need of the essentials of life. We have had to share our resources with them, but this drain will gradually lessen. In so far as our shortage of goods is due to this cause, we can well afford to be patient.

It is just as essential that we have patience with the economic situation here at home. The process of production requires time. If production is rapidly increased, vastly improved conditions will prevail in America when the results of present and future labor begin to appear.

Team-work is imperative. It is just as essential between retailer, wholesaler, and producer as it is between employer and employe. One group of producers cannot wait on another group. The manufacturer, the farmer, the distributor must each immediately assume his part of the burden and enter upon his task. The nation cannot afford curtailment of goods vital to the people.

On American business rests a grave responsibility for efficient co-operation in bringing about full and proportionate production. On American labor rests an equally grave responsibility to attain maximum unit production and maintain uninterrupted distribution of goods, if labor itself is not to suffer from further rises in the cost of living.

The entire nation—producer, distributor, and consumer alike—should return to the unity that won the war. Group interest and undue personal gain must give way to the good of the whole nation if the situation is to be squarely met.

Our common duty now, fully as much as in the war, is to work and to save. In the words of the President in his address to the country on Aug. 25, 1919, only "by increasing production, and by rigid economy and saving on the part of the people, can we hope for large decreases in the burdensome cost of living which now weighs us down."

Work, save, co-operate, produce.

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War and Chairman of the Council.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Secretary of the Navy.

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary of the Interior.

DAVID F. HOUSTON, Secretary of Agriculture.

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary of Commerce.

WILLIAM B. WILSON, Secretary of Labor.

GROSVENOR B. CLARKSON, Director of the Council.

Prohibition Enforcement Law

Summary of Its Provisions

ENACTMENT of the Prohibition Enforcement bill was completed Oct. 10, 1919, when the United States House of Representatives adopted the conference report already agreed to by the Senate and sent the measure to the President for approval. Before the approval of the report by a vote of 321 to 70, a vain effort had been made to send it back to conference, with instructions to eliminate a section permitting State authorities to issue search warrants.

Complete Congressional approval of the bill meant that the days of 2.75 per cent. beer were numbered. The bill would become effective automatically by Oct. 29 if the President's illness prevented his signing it. The wartime enforcement section, as well as the constitutional enforcement portion, prohibits manufacture or sale of any liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol.

Anti-prohibition members of the House made their last fight on the motion of Representative Igoe, (Dem., Mo.,) who protested against "State officers enforcing a Federal law through their authority to issue search warrants," and complained that a similar provision had been defeated in the House. Representative Webb of North Carolina said that the House disapproval of the provision was due to the false impression that State officials would have the power of arrest as well as search. The House voted down the Igoe motion, 215 to 83.

The chief contention between the House and the Senate, involving the question whether the burden of proof that liquor held in a dwelling was lawfully acquired should rest upon the possessor or the Government, was settled by leaving the burden of proof upon the possessor. However, the possession of liquor itself in a dwelling is made legal and the owner is allowed to serve it to bona fide guests.

Under the agreement the manufacture of light wines, cider, and fruit juices is allowed in the home, and such cider and fruit juices may be sold to persons having permits to manufacture vinegar. The sale of preserved sweet cider is also allowed.

All liquors containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol are classed as intoxicating. That part of the conference report reads as follows:

The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war prohibition act shall be hereafter construed to mean any such beverage which contains one-half of 1 percentum or more of alcohol by volume, provided that the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter, or wine is produced, if it contains less than one-half of 1 percentum of alcohol by volume and is made as prescribed in this act, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter and is contained and sold in or from such sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may by regulation prescribe.

The section of the report dealing with the use of liquor in one's home reads:

It shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only, and such liquor need not be reported, provided such liquors are for use only for the personal consumption of the owner thereof and his family residing in such dwelling, and of his bona fide guests when entertained by him therein; and the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor in any action concerning the same to prove that such liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed, and used.

The conferees made a change in the section regulating manufacture in the home, the section now reading:

The penalties provided in this act against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person for manufacturing non-intoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home, but such cider and fruit juices may be sold to persons having permits to manufacture vinegar.

The manufacture of near-beer was provided for by making it liable to regulations to be issued by the Internal Revenue Collector and sold in "sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers," which the Collector will prescribe. The House bill placed upon the seller of beverages the burden of proof to show that the beverage was non-intoxicating, but the conferees changed this to rest the burden of proof upon the manufacturer.

While the original bill provided an appropriation of $3,500,000 for the Attorney General and the Collector of Internal Revenue for enforcement purposes, the agreement reduces this to $2,500,000 for the Collector, and gives $100,000 to the Attorney General for organization purposes.

Express authorization is made in the law for the manufacture of non-intoxicating alcoholic wine, and this may be sold in the same way as is near-beer. However, it must be limited to one-half of 1 per cent., unless made in the home. In the home the only limitation is that the beverage must not be intoxicating.

The penalty provision of the act as agreed upon by the conferees reads:

Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this act shall, for a first offense, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

King Albert's Visit to America

Honors for Royal Guests

ALBERT, KING OF THE BELGIANS, accompanied by Queen Elizabeth and Prince Leopold, the heir-apparent to the throne, arrived at New York Oct. 1, 1919, on the transport George Washington. It was the first time that a reigning sovereign had ever visited the United States. The royal party was greeted at the pier by Vice President Marshall. Before his formal welcome had begun the King issued the following message to the American people:

At the moment of setting foot on American soil the King of the Belgians desires to express to the people of the United States the great pleasure with which the Queen and himself are coming to its shores at the invitation of President Wilson. The King brings to this nation of friends the testimony of the profound sentiment and gratitude of his countrymen for the powerful aid, moral and material, which America gave them in the course of the war. The name of the Commission for the Relief of Belgium will live eternally in the memory of the Belgians.

The King rejoices at the prospect of visiting the cities whose hearts fought with the cities of Belgium, and whose continual sacrifices knew no measure. He happily will be able to meet the eminent citizens who, animated by the highest thoughts, placed themselves at the head of organizations for relieving the sufferings of the war. The American people, their splendid army, and their courageous navy powerfully served a great ideal.

The King and Queen were formally greeted at the pier by the following persons: Vice President and Mrs. Marshall, Secretary of War Baker, the Secretary of State and Mrs. Robert Lansing, Brand Whitlock, Ambassador to Belgium, and Mrs. Whitlock; General Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff; Major Gen. David C. Shanks, Brig. Gen. Peter C. Davison, Prince de Croy, Pierre Mali, Belgian Consul General; Breckinridge Long, Third Assistant Secretary of State, in charge of the reception, and G. Cornell Tarler, Secretary of Embassies in the State Department, who directed the tour of the King and Queen.

The welcoming party was arranged in a semicircle at the foot of the gangplank, with Vice President Marshall, designated to represent President Wilson as spokesman for the nation, nearest the ship. Preceding the Queen, who was followed by Prince Leopold, King Albert came down the right-hand gangplank, while the Baron de Cartier de Marchienne, selected to present officially the welcomers to the King and Queen, descended the other one.

As the royal family reached the pier the band of the George Washington began "La Brabançonne," the Belgian national air, the infantrymen brought their bayonet-tipped rifles to port, all civilian heads were uncovered, and the King brought his hand stiffly to the brim of his hat.

King Albert wore the uniform of a Lieutenant General of the Belgian Army, the uniform he wore during four years as Commander in Chief of his army. It is of the shade of the Marine Corps uniform and devoid of colorful touches except for two triangular bits of red velvet on each lapel of the collar, these serving to bring out the gold of two bars, each an inch long. He wore brown kid gloves and carried a stout cane.

Queen Elizabeth, standing beside her tall husband, seemed diminutive—almost a schoolgirl in her severely plain costume of white. She wore a white serge tailored suit, a small, round white turban of white feathers, and a heavy veil, also of white. A small ermine collar was about her neck, contrasting with her black hair and eyes. Slung over her shoulder was her hard-working camera, ready for action.

Prince Leopold, who is 18 years of age, wore his uniform of a private—steel gray, edged with red tape—and his overseas cap was cocked very decidedly. Neither he nor his father wore a decoration of any sort.

When the national anthem was ended King Albert stepped directly up to the Vice President and warmly shook hands with him. Then, keeping to the program, he stepped back a few paces so that the official address of welcome of the Government might be delivered to him.

Vice President Marshall spoke as follows:

Your Majesty: The head of this Government, worn in body, is unable to meet and welcome you on behalf of the American people and himself. He has delegated this pleasing duty to my less competent hands.

This continent, poetically speaking, first welcomed to its shores a great pathfinder in Columbus, who sailed on and over unknown wastes of water and uncharted seas; seeking and finding new worlds for Crown and Church. Since then it has been the goal of many and other pathfinders striving to walk in ways both good and evil. Had we but thought, many would have been unwelcomed. But today there is no man in this broad land who loves liberty, fidelity, justice, and courage who does not gladly meet you, a King without a King's cunning, a man with a man's high sense of honor, who trod the Via Dolorosa and the Via Sacra of triumph, so by the treading of that way the world might find that treaties are not scraps of paper, that above crown and kingdom faith and courage must stand, else the banner of a people becomes the much-be-spattered badge of infamy.

If one who believes in the right and the duty of the people to rule themselves may be bold without offense, I welcome you to the Republic, somewhat as King of the bravest people since time began, but more as a man whose conduct will be a mighty force in steadying the world to law and order, to friendship, faith, and freedom.

Speaking so low that his words almost failed to reach even those within a few feet of him, King Albert told how great was his regret over the unsatisfactory state of President Wilson's health, and said that he sincerely hoped for his speedy recovery, adding that the health of President Wilson was "precious." He said that both he and Queen Elizabeth considered their trip to the United States a distinct epoch in their lives, both being very glad of the opportunity to express their gratitude and the gratitude of their people to the people of America. King Albert said that he hoped to learn many lessons "from your great race."

After the formalities were ended the royal party was escorted to the Waldorf-Astoria, meeting with an enthusiastic demonstration from the people who lined the streets.

On Oct. 3 the royal guests were officially received by the Mayor, who presented the King with the freedom of the city. In the morning the guests took a cruise through New York Harbor and at noon were formally received by the Mayor at the City Hall in the presence of 20,000 citizens. In the afternoon 30,000 school children greeted the visitors at Central Park, where the King planted a tree.

King Albert was escorted over the city on Oct. 5, after having made a flight above it in a naval hydroplane early in the morning. The important historic and commercial centres of New York were visited. Everywhere the party was warmly greeted.

From New York the royal guests proceeded to Boston, where they received another fervent welcome. Cardinal Mercier, who was visiting this country at the same time, met the party at Boston and both Cardinal and King worshipped at Holy Cross Cathedral. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred on King Albert at Harvard University. From Boston the party proceeded to Niagara Falls, and thence westward to the Pacific Coast; at various cities along the route formal receptions were tendered, and everywhere there was warmth and cordiality in the greetings. Several times on this journey the King climbed into the engineer's cab and ran the locomotive for a while. The illness of President Wilson was often referred to by the King in his addresses with deep regret. The royal party expected to reach Washington on Oct. 27, where they had planned to remain until the 30th as guests of Vice President Marshall. The residence of the Third Assistant Secretary of State had been assigned to their use while in Washington.

President Wilson's Illness

Abrupt End of His Tour

THE speech-making tour of President Wilson in advocacy of the League of Nations covenant, which he had begun on Sept. 3, 1919, came to an abrupt end at Wichita, Kan., on Sept. 26, on account of illness. For more than three weeks he had been addressing vast crowds daily in large cities from coast to coast. On his homeward route he had spoken at Sacramento, Reno, Salt Lake City, Cheyenne, Denver, and Pueblo, each time giving evidence that he was still in fighting mood; but when he reached Wichita he was forced to abandon the remaining five engagements that would have completed his original plans. He was completely worn out by the tremendous mental and physical strain to which he had subjected himself, not only on this tour, but in his long labors at Paris, and, indeed, ever since his election in 1912.

Admiral Cary T. Grayson, the President's physician, in a formal statement announced that Mr. Wilson was suffering from "nervous exhaustion," and that while his condition was "not alarming" he would be obliged to rest for "a considerable time." All the President's engagements for the immediate future were canceled by Mr. Tumulty on the advice of Dr. Grayson, who insisted that orders for rest should be carried out to the letter.

President Wilson arrived in Washington at 11 o'clock on the morning of Sept. 28. He walked unsupported through the station to his automobile, and went immediately to the White House, where the doors were closed to all visitors except members of his family. When he had stepped from the train his face was drawn and there were other evidences of his extreme nervous condition. The first to greet the President was his daughter, Miss Margaret Wilson, who came running down the trainshed when the special pulled in. The President passed through the station with Mrs. Wilson, his daughter, Admiral Grayson, and the bodyguard of Secret Service men. A crowd of perhaps 1,000 men and women had collected in the station. Cheering was started when the President appeared, and he raised his hat several times in response. There was a group of wounded soldiers on a bench in the Red Cross canteen, and when they applauded him, the President smiled and nodded.

Word had gone out that no one should attempt to arrange for an engagement with the President or bring to his attention in any manner whatsoever the question of the contest over the Peace Treaty or other problems which were holding the stage. This order, issued by Admiral Grayson, extended even to Senator Hitchcock, leader of the Administration forces in the Senate.

In the weeks that ensued the President was compelled to abandon his public duties absolutely. He was attended by six physicians, most of them specialists. Besides Dr. Grayson, who has charge of the case, Drs. Ruffin and Stitt of Washington were for a time in daily consultation on the case. Dr. de Schweinitz, an eye specialist, was summoned to the White House to make an examination of the President's eyes. Dr. Dercum of Philadelphia, a neurologist with an international reputation, was also summoned, and twice visited the President at the White House. Dr. Stitt, besides being head of the Naval Medical School, is an expert on the blood. The sixth physician was added in the person of Dr. Fowler, who was called in to alleviate a swollen gland.

Dr. Grayson may be considered a specialist on the President's health, having attended him ever since he first came to the White House. He and the other physicians united in declaring that the President should undertake nothing but the most important or pressing work, that he should refrain from any work as long as possible, that he must continue to have absolute rest for an extended period.

In Washington there were pessimistic and persistent rumors as to the seriousness of the President's case. On Oct. 11 these were embodied in a private letter—which became public—by Senator Moses of New Hampshire, who stated that the President had suffered "some kind of a cerebral lesion, either during his speech at Pueblo or immediately thereafter, and one of the readily discernible results is a slight facial paralysis." Dr. Grayson checked the further embellishment of this version on Oct. 13 by declaring that the President's mind was "as clear as a bell," and that if necessary he could sign important measures or do other official acts, though it was best that he should have absolute rest as long as possible. This put an end to the gossip, then current, regarding his "abdication" in favor of the Vice President. The public, however, still received no word directly from the President until his letter to the industrial conference was made public on Oct. 23. Though he remained seriously ill, this clear and characteristic utterance was welcomed by his friends as an assurance of his ultimate recovery.

The illness of the President called forth letters and telegrams of sympathy and concern from statesmen and sovereigns in all parts of the world, both for his own sake and on account of a possible bearing on the fate of the Peace Treaty.

D'Annunzio in Fiume

His Occupation of the Adriatic City in Defiance of the Peace Conference and the Italian Government

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 20, 1919]

GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO, Italy's poet-soldier, after his dramatic entrance into the City of Fiume on Sept. 17 at the head of a considerable number of troops, took up his headquarters in the palace, issued proclamations right and left, distributed his forces to protect all strategic points, and settled down to defy the food and military blockade which his own Government had instituted against him. After two days of demonstrations by the soldiers and populace, the city grew calmer, and d'Annunzio remained in undisputed control. On Sept. 20 a fleet of airplanes flew from one of the Italian aviation camps, landing near Fiume, and placed itself at the disposition of d'Annunzio. A brigade of Lombardy troops, on the other hand, which arrived at Fiume to join the insurgent forces, was sent back to its garrison, mainly because of food difficulties. Another force of 5,000 volunteers which had embarked for Fiume on the steamer Prince Hohenlohe was captured and turned back. D'Annunzio's forces were estimated at 9,000. The blockade by sea and land was stated at this time to be completed, the desire of the Italian Government being to apply economic pressure, and to avoid armed conflict. As a matter of fact, the blockade was lax in the extreme, and food supplies reached d'Annunzio throughout September and October.

In answer to a stern intimation sent him by Colonel Rondaglia, head of the staff in the armistice zone, that all officers who persisted in remaining in Fiume would be considered as having passed over to the enemy, Captain d'Annunzio sent the following reply:

I have received your communication, which says that all officers who remain and defend in Fiume the honor of Italy and the army before the cowardly, vile world will be considered as passed over to the enemy. This infamous word has been uttered by you, Colonel. It is worthy of you to ignore the Government whereof you are a servant and accomplice. It does not touch me nor my companions. We are mostly wounded and mutilated, decorated several times for valor, proud of having dedicated to our country our indefatigable devotion from the first day of the war until this undertaking, which we consider the highest and purest of all. But if you do not withdraw your infamous word I will brand you as you deserve before the nation and before the world. This I promise you. Take your warning. Italy is with me; with us, the true, eternal Italy. The enemy is around Fiume, which I will defend to the last breath with every means. Here is truth, falsehood is around us.

DEFYING THE GOVERNMENT

The Italian Government's second ultimatum ordering d'Annunzio to return to Rome with his troops expired at midnight on Sept. 21. D'Annunzio flatly refused to obey it, and began to expel all foreigners from the city. Some 920 prisoners, mostly Jugoslavs, were imprisoned. Many others left the city. Foodstuffs were commandeered. D'Annunzio spent his leisure hours flying above the Italian fleet and dropping pamphlets across the demarkation line. In all his proclamations he reiterated his intention never to return to Rome until Fiume became "Città Italianissima," (a most Italian city.) In a proclamation issued to the Italian people d'Annunzio said:

The spirit has conquered arrogance, insults, and darkness. The Italians of Garibaldi have hearkened to the despairing cries of Fiume. They are in Fiume and strong in Fiume.

Fiume's people are not sheep for sale nor is the city to be disposed of by auction. Who shall dare to separate brother from brother? The world today has nothing pure except this breath of Italian fervor, this bronze-enduring will of Italy. Italians against all and everything! Remember the pyre is lighted at Fiume and two words only are heard, "Fiume or death." Brothers, from Fiume we stretch out our hands. We bid you spread our fidelity throughout the land. Fiume's defenders have the right to know that Italy of the victory of Veneto Vittorio is with them.

God is with us and so all will turn out as sworn by us. Have faith, pray in your churches, your homes, in public places. Let every place be a temple. Pray for the whole victory on behalf of the dead, for these brethren are now rejoicing that Fiume rules itself. Help us, Italians! One wish among us all unites our minds in one only thought: Fiume today is Italy's.

A TYPICAL ADDRESS

D'Annunzio was very indignant because General Badoglio, whom the Government had transferred to the armistice zone to replace the unpopular Colonel Robilant, sent an airplane over Fiume which dropped leaflets inviting the soldiers to return to duty not later than Sept. 18. Calling his officers and soldiers together, d'Annunzio addressed them as follows:

I will answer for you with my head, my spirit, my whole self. You are accomplishing a work of regeneration. The deserters are those who abandon our Fiume, those who repudiate her, repel her, calumniate her, committing the basest crime against patriotism ever perpetrated on earth. They are no less vile than the fugitives at Caporetto, who today are rewarded by amnesty. I repeat, I take upon myself every accusation, all the blame and the glory therein, and I answer for your immunity.

The true Italian Army is here, formed by you, combatants without fear and without reproach. To have participated in this most audacious enterprise will be the purest title to glory. All your names will be included by history, carved there as in heroic marble, and rewarded by the gratitude of the people. Meanwhile, on Sept. 20, the anniversary of the taking of Rome, I will distribute to you all a commemorative bronze medal.

Be faithful to Fiume, be true to Italy, nobody can move us from here. For myself, I shall not leave here alive, nor shall I leave here when I am dead, as I shall be buried here, to become one with this sacred soil. Every day in all parts of the world the warmest messages rain upon you. Even American citizens ask to come here to perform the humblest service. The beauty of our case touches all hearts. I trust that each one of you, firmly planted on solid feet, will repeat, with head uplifted, the Roman saying, the motto of the Legionaries, "Here I remain Irremovable."

In view of the sentiment of the people, enthusiastic for d'Annunzio's undertaking, the Italian Government on Sept. 22 sent an appeal to the powers to dispatch an allied force, exclusive of Italians, to handle the situation. D'Annunzio, on his part, announced that he was preparing appeals to the President of the United States, the King of England, and the President of France for support. He added:

My men here are ready to die for our cause, while I will not leave Fiume either alive or dead. I have already chosen in a fine cemetery, dark with cypresses, a small hill looking toward the sea, covered with laurel, where I wish to be buried. I do not believe the Allies will do anything against me, as I will do nothing against them. I consider the blockade, however, contrary to the rights of man, no one having the right to attempt to starve the 30,000 inhabitants of Fiume simply because they wish to remain Italians forever. No conflict is possible with the Italian troops, as I do not believe there is a single soldier who would fire against my men.

SENTIMENT IN ROME

The postponement of the reopening of the Italian Parliament from Sept. 24 to Sept. 27 was considered an indication of the gravity of the situation as judged by the Government. The Tribuna on Sept. 23, commenting on the conference of political leaders and statesmen with King Victor Emmanuel called for the following day, said:

We are facing a crisis of a national character involving the highest permanent interests of the entire country, which cannot be solved from a personal point of view, even by one party, but must have behind its solution the whole national opinion. Italy must be united with a firm internal discipline, with a view of obtaining the complete satisfaction of her aspirations.

Leonida Bissolati, leader of the Reform Socialists and former Minister of Military Aid and War Pensions, in an address before the Congress of Italian Socialists, favored d'Annunzio's act in seizing Fiume for Italy, though disapproving his further project of annexing Dalmatia.

Great uneasiness meanwhile was growing in Peace Conference circles in Paris regarding the situation in Fiume. It was feared that the movement started by d'Annunzio might spread to other parts of the Dalmatian Coast and result in the occupation of Zara, Cattaro, and other towns with large Italian populations located in districts where the majority of the inhabitants were Yugoslavs. The Yugoslav delegation in Paris feared an armed conflict. That these fears were not groundless was shown in the incident of Sept. 24 at Trau (Toguire), Dalmatia, about 150 miles southeast of Fiume, when an Italian detachment with several armored motor cars crossed the line of demarkation and penetrated the town after overcoming the resistance of a few Yugoslav soldiers. The raiders, who acted on their own initiative, were fired on by the inhabitants, and left hurriedly after the landing of some 100 American marines, who debarked at the request of the Italian authorities. Official reports sent by Admiral Knapp to Washington subsequently emphasized this request, and declared that the American officers had persuaded the Yugoslav forces about to attack the invaders to forbear on the assurance that the Italians were withdrawing.

At this time there was a rumor that a plan to make Fiume an Italian city with an internationalized port had been rejected by President Wilson. This made the situation in Italy more acute. Elements of revolution appeared, with the Italian Army divided in allegiance, the Socialists hostile to the Government, and the great mass of the people enthusiastically supporting d'Annunzio. The Yugoslavs showed restraint, and their delegates in Paris issued a statement denying that their armies were mobilizing for a march on d'Annunzio's forces at Fiume.

POET'S AMBITIONS GROW

D'Annunzio meanwhile made his position in Fiume strategically stronger by extending his cordon of guards beyond the town to the high land surrounding it, including the Yugoslav settlement of Sussak, the hills of which overlooked Fiume. A significant change of tone was observed in his proclamations, which were addressed not only to the populations of Fiume and Italy, but also to Dalmatia. An extract from a message sent by d'Annunzio to the Dalmatians is given herewith:

A sharp thorn pricks my trusting heart. It was with regret and owing to the fact that I had not sufficient forces that I was unable to spread the sacred fire as far as Spalato on that day of Fiume, and further still. The passion of Dalmatia never tortured me so much as during my march to Fiume. What will Zara say and do when it receives the news of the enterprise? What will Sebenico, Trau, Spalato, and other sister cities say? This anxiety never abandoned me even in the height of action. Mingled with the triumphal cries of Fiume I seemed to distinguish your distant, despairing voice.

Brothers of Dalmatia, we have not forgotten you, we cannot forget you. The victorious army reorganizing itself around heroic Fiume becomes every day more numerous, more powerful, more disciplined. In me you see a servant of your cause, O brothers of Dalmatia! Confide in the fraternal victorious army.

CROWN COUNCIL SESSION

The gravity of the situation as viewed by the Government was indicated by its calling of the Crown Council, a step rarely taken except for discussions of the most momentous consequence. This council, held on Sept. 25, was opened by King Victor Emmanuel, who explained the reasons for the calling of the extraordinary meeting. It was desired, he said, to obtain the views of the most eminent men in Parliament on the grave situation. The discussion would be only of a consultative character, as no decision was to be taken by the council, this being reserved for the Cabinet, which alone was responsible to the Parliament and to the country.

Premier Nitti made a detailed report setting forth the grave consequences which might ensue for Italy, both at home and in her international relations, the latter having not only political but financial and economic bearings. Tommaso Tittoni, Foreign Minister, declared that the Peace Conference would not permit Italy to annex Fiume, because such action would authorize the Czechoslovaks to occupy Teschen; the Yugoslavs to move forces into Klagenfurt; the Greeks to claim Thrace and the Rumanians to annex Banat. Giovanni Giolitti, a former Premier, suggested that the only remedy was to have speedy general elections, so that the country might pronounce on pending questions, and on the attitude of the Government. Antonio Salandra, also a former Premier, opposed this proposal, pointing out the danger connected with an appeal to the country at a time when, he said, the Government was not sure of its control of the army for the maintenance of public order.

The afternoon session, which lasted two hours and a half, was mostly taken up by a speech of Leonida Bissolati, Socialist, who reiterated his program providing that Italy must have Fiume in exchange for Dalmatia. Premier Nitti ended the session. After summing up the discussion, he declared that the Government would take the opinions expressed into consideration when making its decisions.

When the members of the council left the Quirinal the crowds gathered outside shouted "Long live the army!" and "Long live Italian Fiume!"

In a session of the Chamber of Deputies marked by great tumult, and even by personal encounters, the Italian Prime Minister, Signor Nitti, was given a vote of confidence on Sept. 27, the Government receiving 208 votes to 148. Foreign Minister Tittoni spoke on the situation and insisted that Italy must remain in unity with her allies. He threw the responsibility for the disastrous delay in settling the Fiume question on President Wilson, who, he said, had become the dictator of the council by reason of America's part in the ultimate winning of the war and her resources in supplying Europe with food and fuel supplies. President Wilson's uncompromising attitude toward Italy's claims and the support given him by Great Britain and France made compromise on the part of Italy necessary. The Foreign Minister said that he had suffered daily anguish over the delay, and that he had thought the departure of President Wilson would facilitate the task of the Italian delegates. On the contrary, it had been made more complicated, as the American peace delegation had to communicate with the President by cable, which made even greater delays inevitable. Signor Tittoni continued:

I should be a traitor if I did not recommend the avoidance of a course which would put Italy in open opposition to the Peace Conference, which would mean Italy's abandonment of the conference, with the loss of all the advantages coming from the peace treaties, with our complete isolation, with the renunciation of our position as a great power—the committing of a folly of which we would soon repent.

If any one will rise in the Chamber who is confident he could attain better conditions, I am ready to cede my place immediately in the interests of the country, thanking him for the relief from the heavy burden.

It is indispensable that Italy be united in an accord with her allies. The alliance formed for the war must necessarily continue during the peace.

It appeared, however, on Sept. 29 that the Italian Nation would have to decide the Fiume question, when the Italian Parliament was dissolved until Dec. 1; and elections were announced for Nov. 16.

D'Annunzio on Sept. 30 stated that he considered himself in a state of war with Yugoslavia. This announcement was made in answer to a request from the head of the French Mission to restore telegraphic communication with Agram, the Croatian capital, which d'Annunzio had interrupted. The latter also said that measures had been adopted to meet any attack from the enemy. Troops had been sent to the first line of reserves, ready to answer any need. The food blockade had become more severe. Fiume, however, at this time, had enough supplies to feed the population for three months. The French troops had all left the city. Some of d'Annunzio's volunteers were collaborating with the regular Italian troops to hold the armistice line after the closing of the Yugoslav frontier. A further statement attributed to d'Annunzio at this time was to the effect that he expected war within two weeks' time. D'Annunzio's staff was in the palace, where his headquarters were situated, overlooking the bay, engaged in working out a plan of campaign. Rumors of armed conflict with Yugoslavs were rife.

STATEMENT BY DR. VESNITCH

As for the official attitude of the Yugoslavs, Dr. Milenko R. Vesnitch, one of the delegates to the Peace Conference, ridiculed d'Annunzio's announcement that he considered himself in a state of war with Jugoslavia, characterizing it as "only a continuation of his cinematographic procedure." Dr. Vesnitch added:

As far as the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croatsians, and Slovenes is concerned, it does not know Captain d'Annunzio, and consequently has no reason to take notice of his declaration.

The National Council of Fiume on Oct. 3 sent a message to Foreign Minister Tittoni protesting against the blockade of Fiume, declaring that it was bringing about starvation in the city. The following day orders were issued by the Italian Government that the blockade be lifted, and Italian authorities in the vicinity of Fiume received directions to allow mail and foodstuffs to pass into the city. The military blockade, however, continued to be enforced.

News that Premier Nitti had received a vote of confidence aroused hostile demonstrations in Fiume among the populace, who cried: "Down with Nitti! Down with Wilson! Down with Jugoslavia! Down with Serbia!" Gabriele d'Annunzio then appeared and made a speech, in which he said:

Nitti, who, out of fear, is bowing his head to the Allies, has once more proved that he is the avowed enemy of Italy. The same is true of all those who shouted in the Chamber, "We want annexation!" and who have given a vote of confidence in Nitti's Cabinet.

On this and other occasions d'Annunzio presented a haggard and ill appearance; at the end of each day he was completely exhausted. On Oct. 5 he issued a message to the Croats, written in their language and embodying a skillful appeal against allied interference with Adriatic questions; it assured Jugoslavia of free access to the sea under Italian control.

Negotiations meanwhile were proceeding in Paris. Rome was again excited on Oct. 8 by the reported receipt of warnings from Great Britain with regard to the Fiume situation, intimating that if it continued, Italy might be put out of the alliance. This warning was expressed in a note read to the Italian Ambassador to England by Baron Hardinge, Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In a violent article the Tribuna said: "Even calumniated Germany never showed less regard for her enemies than England shows today for her ally, Italy." Later this interpretation of Baron Hardinge's note was officially denied by the British Government.

Washington advices of Oct. 10 indicated that the Italian Government was endeavoring to end the crisis amicably, and that it was willing to effect a settlement, to let Fiume become a buffer State, in connection with the adjacent coastal territory. D'Annunzio's view of this plan had been already given on Sept. 27, when he said that, supported by the whole army, he would oppose such a solution. It was stated in Rome on Oct. 11, however, that the National Council of Fiume had approved the scheme, and, in the event that it went through, would invite Captain d'Annunzio to leave the city. Foreign Minister Tittoni, who left Rome on Oct. 13 for a conference with King Victor Emmanuel at the royal shooting lodge at San Rossore, expressed confidence before his departure that his new proposal for the settlement of the Fiume and Dalmatian problem would be received with favor, because it virtually accepted the proposal of President Wilson in regard to Fiume. Specifically the new solution embodied the annexation of the District of Volosa, lying between Fiume and Trieste, to Italy in order to establish a joint boundary between the enlarged Kingdom of Italy and the proposed buffer State of Fiume.

It was repeatedly indicated that there was a current of opposition to d'Annunzio in Fiume itself. On Oct. 5 Ruggero Gothardi, claiming to represent two-thirds of the voters of Fiume directly, laid appeals for prompt action "to save Fiume from ruin" before the Peace Conference in Paris. Gothardi styled himself President of the Democratic Autonomist Party of Fiume. On Oct. 11 d'Annunzio came to an open rupture with Professor Zanella, leader of the Italian population of Fiume opposed to the annexation of the city to Italy, but in favor of an Italian protectorate over it. In a stormy interview Zanella told d'Annunzio that his presence was perilous to the interests of Fiume. D'Annunzio then ordered him to leave the palace.

At this same date the steamer Persia, bound from Genoa for the Far East with a cargo of 30,000 rifles, 10,000,000 cartridges, twenty batteries of mountain guns, and two heavy guns for the troops operating under Admiral Kolchak against the Bolsheviks, arrived at Fiume, after a mutiny of the crew in the Mediterranean, who forced the Captain to take the ship into Fiume. This was the second "pirate" ship which had reached d'Annunzio within a week.

In an interview given by d'Annunzio on Oct. 15, the poet declared that if no one would attack him in Fiume, he would march on Rome. He and his men, he said, wanted to offer themselves in sacrifice, adding: "We want to light a fire that will burn high. It will awake in a portentous flame the deceived hopes of oppressed peoples, and no power of arms or money will be able to put it out." On Oct. 16 he sent a message to Premier Clemenceau asking that the French Premier take the initiative in securing a declaration from the allied Governments making Fiume a free port. In this message d'Annunzio said that he had drafted a new manifesto inviting Serbians and Italians to recognize mutual national rights. This manifesto, which would be delivered by airplanes, would call upon the two nations to "maintain the bonds of brotherhood which have been sealed by blood."

A press dispatch from Fiume on Oct. 20 indicated that the city was growing very weary of its adventure. D'Annunzio was having financial difficulties and had forced a large tax levy upon the business men of Fiume, as the people of Italy had not furnished sufficient funds to pay the expenses of his army. Their contributions up to that time had just passed the figure of 1,000,000 lire. The pay of d'Annunzio's men was at the rate of 5 lire daily, and there were 9,000 of them, which meant a total of 45,000 lire a day, aside from the pay of the officers. Also there was the expense of food and the necessary cost of maintaining the Government, creating a large deficit, all of which had been met through "gifts" of citizens. Thus the situation stood at the time these pages went to press.

The Peril of the Fiume Crisis

By GUGLIELMO FERRERO

[ITALY'S FOREMOST LIVING HISTORIAN]

Universal Service, Paris, Oct. 14, 1919

[COPYRIGHTED]

THE Fiume adventure of the fearless d'Annunzio has been dubbed "Garibaldian" and as such glorified. Judging by superficial appearances, in fact, it bears some resemblance to the famous expedition of 1860. But the likeness goes no further than mere appearances. Heroes, saints, geniuses, never come to life again even if the ignorant and credulous crowd kneel before their tombs praying and waiting for the miracle. The supposed reincarnations are only anachronisms, almost invariably sterile and often dangerous. If we compare d'Annunzio's expedition with Garibaldi's we soon discover a capital difference between them.

The one of 1860 was prepared and accomplished by a handful of private citizens free of military duty and "with the approval of the Government." The Fiume expedition has been conceived and carried out by fragments of the regular army, which refused obedience to the law, and it was against the wish of the Government. The outside world, I know, will not believe the bona-fide sincerity of the present Italian Government. But this will prove nothing more than that outside public opinion is at present misinformed. The Government was endeavoring to solve the question with other means, and the Fiume "coup" upset all its plans. This is the truth.

It is not necessary to be a great politician to understand how greatly the two adventures differ. The heroic self-abnegation of the great Garibaldi consisted chiefly in the fact that he assumed all risks and left no responsibility whatever to the Government. Had he failed he would have been disavowed, while in case of success he was embarrassing greatly the two powers which opposed the idea of Italy's unity, because they would have been obliged to start a war in the south of Italy in order to vanquish the conqueror and re-establish the Bourbons on their throne.

The Fiume expedition, instead, is such that, whether it fails or succeeds, it will get into further trouble the Italian Government and not the Allies. And when you say "Italian Government," you say "Italy" as a nation. The experience of a few days shows this clearly. If my information is correct, one among the Allies and associated powers wanted to meet the expedition with guns and high explosives. Let us suppose that this ferocious suggestion had been accepted and that the expedition had been defeated by superior forces. Could the Italian Government have disavowed it and washed its hands of the whole affair? It would be idle to even imagine such a course.

The Italian Government would have been placed in the dilemma of either accepting humbly an action which would have offended the whole country like a bloody and atrocious humiliation, or of declaring war upon the entire universe.

It seems, instead—always if my information is correct—that one of the Allies, the one nearer Italy geographically and historically, intervened and used pressure upon the impatient members of the world entente.

The d'Annunzio expedition has been able to reach and take Fiume. But what about Italy? The Allies have withdrawn without a fuss, and, smiling the while, have said to the Italian Government: "You are a loyal ally and we do not wish in any way to harm any of your men. We believe you when you say this expedition is none of your fault. But those men now in Fiume are soldiers of your army and therefore you have power over them. Use it. We shall wait for you to persuade them to leave the place and to make room for us and our rights. It is for you to act."

This, in my mind, is the most terrible problem of the Government. It cannot persuade the thousand or ten thousand Italians who are in Fiume. It has no strength to force them to its will. Yet it must honor its word to the Allies.

The difficulty is a terrible one, and I do not think I am exaggerating it. If the Italian Government does not succeed quickly in giving satisfaction to the national sentiment and to the Allies at the same time, we Italians, and with us the whole of Europe, might face a great catastrophe. It would be even more terrible if some one among the allied and associated Governments should try to settle the Fiume question before satisfying Italy's just demands. In such a case no crown council would have any power in Italy.

It is human and understandable that Poland, Bohemia, Rumania, and other small States, old and new, which in Paris are the judged and not the judges, have tried rebellion against some judgments of the Peace Congress. But Italy, which, at the Peace Conference, is, like Great Britain, France, America, and Japan, judge and at the same time judged, cannot possibly disavow this very tribunal whereof she is part and parcel by attacking one of its verdicts simply because it is iniquitous and against her. Such action would be tantamount to abdicating her position as a great power. It would light another torch of anarchy in the heart of Europe.

Italy is the first among the victors of the war to find herself between two fires: The Red revolution and the White revolution. There is unquestionably some one openly working to transform the army into a means to provoke civil war. Taken as a symptom of the disorder and anarchy blossoming forth all over the world, it must be admitted that it looks serious.

Western European civilization finds itself today in a terrible crisis. The world's war has disorganized it. Every Government is threatened by an incurable disorder. And with it industry, commerce, agriculture, administration, the State, spiritual culture, are all insecure.

No country can return to its old condition of peace and security without the help of a firm Government. But everywhere Governments have been weakened and reduced to almost powerlessness by the war, and at this very moment, when the most intelligent, vigorous action is necessary by those in authority to govern with wisdom, justice, and power. The world's war has not been won on the Piave, nor on the Meuse, nor in Champagne, nor in Belgium, because it is not yet won anywhere! It will be definitely won by that people or those peoples who succeed in saving from universal anarchy an authoritative Government. Those peoples will be tomorrow the arbiters and perhaps the masters of Europe.

Repatriation of War Prisoners

How Thousands of Captured Soldiers and Interned Aliens Were Sent Home—Problem of Russian Prisoners

ONE of the most important problems after the signing of the armistice was that of the repatriation of hundreds of thousands of war prisoners, as well as a considerable number of interned aliens. The most difficult part of the whole undertaking was the repatriating of the more than 250,000 Russian prisoners in Germany. After signing the armistice Germany released her Russian prisoners just as she released French, English, and American prisoners. They were all turned out to get home as best they could. The French, British, and Americans made their way through the allied lines, but the Russians could not pass the Bolshevik fighting lines, which barred them from their homes, and they soon became a problem for Germany. So serious did the situation become that the Allies took cognizance of it, and the American and British Governments, with the Red Cross, decided to get them home. To facilitate this a quarter of a million Russians that could be corralled were placed in forty camps, containing from 3,000 to 40,000 men each, scattered in East Prussia. Twenty were placed under American protection and twenty under British protection.

The American Mission, with a detachment of several hundred unarmed soldiers, left Coblenz Feb. 14, and took up the task of guarding camps three days later. Each camp was in charge of a field officer and his staff, with twenty-five enlisted men. The work of feeding and clothing the men began at once. Then they were also entertained in their own language, and an effort was made to raise their morale from the low state into which it had sunk. The Americans had found the prisoners in a wretched condition, with many cases of typhus. American dentists went to care for their teeth. Plentiful supplies were furnished, and the physical condition of the Russians improved materially.

MASSACRED BY BOLSHEVIKI

In the meantime General Harries and his co-workers in Berlin were trying to arrange the movement homeward. The Germans appeared perfectly willing to get rid of the Russians. No statement could be got from Russian leaders. However, early in April several trainloads of troops, mostly officers, started through to the East Prussian border. Bolshevik troops stopped the trains, and offered the Russians the choice of joining them or being killed. The officers of the old régime, who numbered about 600, refused, and most of them were shot. The Germans tried to send other prisoners by this same route, but General Harries, in the name of the President of the United States, forbade this as inhumane. An effort was then made to get the prisoners home through Austria, but the Red leaders there, on request of Trotzky, balked the movement.

Discussing the difficulties still standing in the way of sending the Russian prisoners home, Vorwärts toward the end of April published the following comment:

Despite the greatest good-will, the repatriation of the Russian prisoners of war can be accomplished only very slowly, especially because there are great transportation difficulties on the railroads. Furthermore, the Russians can be sent through at only one point on the Russian front, and recently the delivery of the captured Russians has been held up because fighting is going on just at that point. The negotiations being carried on with the Polish Government through the Entente's mediation looking toward the returning of the Russian prisoners of war to their homes via Poland have not yet been concluded. The sea route over the Baltic cannot be used until the middle of May. We lack ship tonnage for the purpose of using the other sea routes, such as via the Black Sea. The difficulties are also made greater by the fact that we always try to send the Russians back to their real homes. For instance, we don't send South Russians to North Russia. And, then, all the camps are treated alike in the matter of repatriation. And it must also be pointed out that, because of the unreliability of the Russians, large groups cannot be sent home together, especially not through the fighting district in the east.

Early in May the repatriation of Russians was virtually abandoned. However, some 15,000 Letts and Lithuanians, whose territories on the Baltic Coast were not in the hands of the Reds, were safely landed. The last lot of 1,500 were moved this way about the middle of August.

ACTION OF SUPREME COUNCIL

This question of repatriation of Russian prisoners in Germany gave the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference much concern, and the problem was discussed at many sessions. On July 18 it was pointed out during discussion that many of these prisoners were infected with Bolshevik theories, and that their repatriation would mean that they would join the Bolshevik forces. If they did not, indeed, they would be executed, as experience had shown.

On Aug. 2 Marshal Foch appeared before the Supreme Council in connection with this problem, and the council decided to inform Germany that all restrictions on the movements of Russian prisoners held in Germany had been lifted. Germany was given permission to release all such prisoners and would thereafter be responsible for their maintenance. In view of Poland's representations against releasing them on account of the additional strength they would give the Bolshevik forces, the council decided to consult its military advisers.

On the same date it was officially announced in Berlin that 50,000 prisoners whose homes were in the Caucasus and Transcaucasus were to leave shortly from Hamburg by water for the Black Sea. This long voyage, which would take four weeks, was made necessary because of Poland's refusal to allow their passage over her territory, on the ground already stated. The 200,000 prisoners remaining faced the prospect of spending another Winter in German camps.

Early in August the American Mission in Berlin received an order to withdraw its men, wind up its affairs, and leave Germany. The mission turned over its twenty camps to the Germans, leaving instructions regarding the care of the prisoners, and orders that they be sent home as soon as possible. American officers who saw the conditions on arriving regretted the necessity of giving the Russians back into German hands. These officers said that considerable stores of provisions and other supplies had been left at the camps, but expressed the fear that the Germans, and not the Russian prisoners, would consume those supplies, pointing out that during the time the Americans were in charge of the camps the German population resented the fact that the Russian war prisoners were fed much better than the natives.

On Oct. 11 the Supreme Council decided that the Allies would try again to get the unfortunate Russian prisoners home. The first attempt, which had encountered failure, was made through purely humanitarian motives; this new attempt, it was stated in Paris, would be dictated both by humanitarian motives and by the allied desire to secure reinforcements for the anti-Bolshevist armies of General Denikin and Admiral Kolchak. At that time about 150,000 of the Russians could still be located. The Allied Mission was authorized to co-operate with the German Mission in sending these men to the anti-Bolshevist armies. Thus the solution of the whole problem seemed near when the present pages were going to press.

RELEASING GERMAN PRISONERS

On the reverse side of the problem it was reported in the Kölnische Zeitung of April 19 that the repatriation of the German prisoners of war in Bolshevik Russia could be regarded as practically finished. Only a few thousand persons, some of whom had entered the Red Guard or the international regiments, had voluntarily remained in Russia. On May 15 a Paris cablegram said that the Council of Foreign Ministers had decided that the prisoners of war held by the Russians in Siberia, the Baltic Provinces, and the Caucasus might be sent home at once and that those in Soviet Russia would be repatriated later.

The release of British captives in Germany was effected soon after the armistice of Nov. 11, 1918. According to Berlin information, on Dec. 29 the British war prisoners in Germany still numbered 24,900, of whom 5,000 were in trains proceeding to Holland, and 8,000 more were soon to be sent there. British prisoners to the number of 7,000 were being repatriated by way of Baltic ports. Since the armistice 6,814 officers, 126,729 of other ranks, and 4,483 civilians had been repatriated.

The return of German prisoners of war from Great Britain, which began after Germany had ratified the Peace Treaty, was contemplated with a certain amount of anxiety. The Pan-Germans had asserted that German soldiers and civilians had been harshly treated in England. The Elberfeld correspondent of the Lokal-Anzeiger telegraphed on Sept. 2, 1919, that the first group of unwounded German prisoners had arrived in Cologne, and that the men looked well-nourished and were provided with good clothing. The Lokal-Anzeiger asserted that this was due to a sudden change of treatment when the prospect of sending the men home arose. The German prisoners, as they passed through Cologne, were given an ovation by the populace, and there were scenes of great enthusiasm, particularly on Sept. 3, when trams and ambulances came through the main streets of the city packed with prisoners waving handkerchiefs and cheering loudly. Women threw them gifts, and many wept. Crowds surrounded the trams, and the prisoners were questioned about their treatment while in England. The inhabitants were heard commenting on their good appearance.

PRESIDENT EBERT'S ADDRESS

Every returning German prisoner of war received a copy of the following welcome-home address by President Ebert:

I bid you a warm welcome to your native soil. You have bitter days behind you, days of hardships, of mental depression, and of unsatisfied longings for home and family. Through numerous reports I have seen how you, the defenseless ones, have had to feel the hatred of our enemies. I, together with the entire German people, know how to appreciate fully your position and your feelings.

You are returning at a time when our Fatherland is being shaken to its very base by our enemies' will to destruction, and by the transitional pains of a new order. Return to your homes as good Germans, determined to co-operate with all your powers in the restoration of the new republican fatherland, for only level-headedness, unity, and work can save us from the collapse aimed at by our enemies.

The Government, in so far as it lies in its power, will do everything to meet your wishes and relieve your troubles.

May you find your relatives in good health, and may you soon recover, both mentally and physically, from the sufferings you have endured. This is my honest desire!

EBERT,

National President.

As the result of a conference with the British representatives at Cologne, which opened on Sept. 6, the Imperial Central Bureau for War and Civil Prisoners announced that the British Government would supply the means of transport and hand over 3,000 prisoners daily in Cologne until further notice, and would send 3,000 additional prisoners to Rotterdam weekly in its own ships. This delivery of prisoners at Cologne was still in progress when the present issue of CURRENT HISTORY went to press in October.

INTERNEED IN HOLLAND

The work of the Red Cross for the interned British prisoners in Holland was of the greatest value. The British Commissioner for Holland was Mr. Francis Voulés, who supervised and directed the whole work of relief. When the interned men were first expected in Holland, toward the end of 1917, the reaction of war conditions on Holland imposed many obstacles to the work of the commission. The attitude of the Dutch labor unions was hostile. The labor market was overstocked, and the first condition laid down was that no prisoner should be provided with employment unless it was clear that Dutch workmen were unavailable. A carpenter shop was started, however, which paid its way and trained a large body of skilled men. The tailors' and bootmakers' shops at The Hague received the uniforms and army boots from England intended for the use of the prisoners themselves, and it was their duty to fit and repair them. They carried out the whole of this work for the 5,000 or more men interned in Holland up to the date of the armistice. As the scheme developed, many other trades were included. Besides these trade activities, many purely educational courses gave instruction in various languages and commercial subjects.

During 1919 the commission also distributed available supplies among the famishing Russians near the Dutch frontier. In a short time the commission was providing for the wants of 45,000. Of the effectiveness of this humane work it is sufficient to say that the monthly death rate, which in January was 272, fell from the moment that the Red Cross assumed control to twenty-nine for the month of May.

As for the 7,000 German deserters who arrived in Holland during the war and were interned, The Hague paper Vaderland on Aug. 8 announced that they would all soon be compelled to leave the country.

Two reasons were assigned for this decision: First, that Dutch laws provided that foreigners could be admitted only on foreign passports, and the deserters had no passports, and, secondly, that these deserters had enjoyed the right of asylum during the war, when deportation would have meant death, but that Germany had now granted amnesty to all deserters.

INTERNEED IN AMERICA

Some 1,200 German sailors and civilians interned in the United States left Atlanta, Ga., on Sept. 23 under guard of 200 American soldiers on a special train which included nine cars of baggage. Nearly 150 of the German seamen had made application to become naturalized American citizens, but only seventy-three of the applications were granted, and these provided only for probationary citizenship. Many dogs, much American-bought clothing, and many supplies accompanied the departing Germans, who had considerable money. Some 100 enemy aliens from Ellis Island were sent to the transport to take the Germans home, and a number of interned German soldiers arrived from Fort Douglas, Utah, and other camps. The Germans, numbering about 1,600 in all, departed on Sept. 26 on the steamship Pocahontas under a military guard. The men all seemed glad to be returning to Germany, and chatted, laughed, played cards, and sang.

The Chilean Government on Aug. 9 set free the crews of the German cruiser Dresden and the German raider Seeadler, the members of which had been interned in Chile for a long period, the men of the Dresden since 1915.

MAP OF CENTRAL EUROPE SHOWING BOUNDARIES AS DE- FINED BY PEACE TREATIES

This map shows some of the vast territorial losses of the Central Powers, as a result of their defeat in the war. In Europe alone Germany has been compelled to relinquish sovereignty over 47,787 square miles that were formerly included within her borders. Austria has lost still more from forced concessions to Italy, from the secession of Hungary and the formation of the new States of Jugoslavia and Czechoslovakia. From a territory of over 240,000 square miles ruled over by the Hapsburg Monarchy, Austria has become a third or fourth class State, with an area of between 5,000 and 6,000 square miles, and is now about three-fourths as large as the State of Massachusetts

Genesis of the Secret Treaty of London

By GORDON GORDON-SMITH

[CAPTAIN OF THE ROYAL SERBIAN ARMY AND ATTACHE OF THE SERBIAN LEGATION AT WASHINGTON]

THE factor in post-bellum politics which has done most to threaten the good understanding of the Allies has been the situation created by the secret treaty of London entered into by Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy on April 26, 1915. This document has been referred to in the harshest terms by many students of international politics. It has been characterized as "infamous" and "iniquitous" by men of "light and leading" in the world's affairs. It is, therefore, of interest to study the genesis of this much-discussed document and see if an explanation, if not a justification, can be found for the act of four statesmen of the eminence of Viscount Grey, M. Paul Cambon, the Marchese Imperiali, and Count Benckendorff in signing a document of which all right-thinking men are today heartily ashamed.

The excuses for it on the part of two of them, Viscount Grey and M. Cambon, were ignorance and dire necessity. In the case of the Marchese Imperiali there was no ignorance, (no one knew the scope and extent of the advantages for Italy contained in the treaty better than the Italian Cabinet whose mandatory he was,) but there was, in 1915, a comprehension of Italian interests which explains, if it does not excuse, the drawing up of what is now seen to be an iniquitous pact and one which Great Britain and France would today be only too glad to repudiate if they could do so without breach of their plighted word. In the case of the Russian plenipotentiary there was, perhaps, less ignorance of the interests at stake, but there was undoubtedly the same constraint of dire necessity which forced the hands of his British and French colleagues.

The principal rôle in the negotiation and conclusion of the secret treaty was that played by Italy. At the moment of the outbreak of the world war Italy was still a member of the Triple Alliance. The Consulta, however, did not regard the cause of the conflict put forward by the Central Powers as a casus foederis provided for in Italy's treaty with them. The Italian Government, therefore, informed its German and Austrian allies that it intended to remain neutral during the conflict. This the Rome Cabinet declared to both groups of belligerents, but without furnishing either with any absolute guarantee as to how long and under what circumstances this neutrality would be maintained.

BOTH SIDES COURTED ITALY

This uncertainty was a cause of deep anxiety and embarrassment, both to the Central Powers and to the Powers of the Entente. Their anxiety was further increased by the fact that there were in Italy two powerful parties, (minorities, it is true, but such as had to be reckoned with)—the pro-German party under Signor Giolitti, and the war party headed by the Independent Socialists under Signor Mussolini and the advanced wing of the Liberal Party, which were each trying to influence the policy of the Government in favor of its views.

As a consequence it became almost a matter of life or death for each of the belligerent groups to get Italy to "come off the fence" for good and come down on its side of the barricade.

Germany knew that it was hopeless to expect Italy to take up arms on the side of the Central Powers. But she hoped to obtain from her a cast-iron treaty of neutrality such as would relieve the Wilhelmstrasse and Ballplatz of all anxiety and allow them to shape their policies with the Italian danger eliminated. Prince Bülow, the German Ambassador to the Quirinal, therefore commenced a series of negotiations with this object in view. Then began an era of sordid huckstering which forms one of the most unlovely episodes of the recent world conflict. The negotiations between Berlin and Rome were carried on for weeks. They were the more long-drawn-out as it became increasingly difficult for Prince Bülow to get the Vienna Government to entertain the proposals of the Rome Cabinet. Finally, however, in April, 1915, the Wilhelmstrasse and the Consulta reached an agreement, and the terms on which Italy agreed to guarantee her neutrality to the Central Powers were committed to paper by Baron Sonnino, and on April 8 were formally submitted to the Central Powers.

WHAT GERMANY OFFERED

This document ran as follows:

ARTICLE 1.—Austria-Hungary cedes the Trentino to Italy, with the frontiers which the Kingdom of Italy had in 1811, that is to say, after the Treaty of Paris of Feb. 28, 1810.

Note to Article 1.—The new frontier separates itself from the present frontier at Mount Cevedale: it follows for an instant the rising ground between Val Venosta and Val de Noce, then descends on the Adige to Gargazone, between Meran and Botzen, follows the plateau on the left bank, cuts the Sarentina Valley in halves from the Isarco to the Chiusa, and rejoins the present frontier by the Dolomite territory of the right bank of the Avisio, not including the Gardona and Badia Valleys, but including the Ampezzan Valley.

ARTICLE 2.—A revision, in favor of Italy, will be made of her eastern frontier, by including in the territory ceded the towns of Gradisca and Goritzia. The new frontier separates from the present one at Troghofel, running toward the east to Osternig, whence it descends the Carnic Alps, to Saifniz. Then, by the rising ground between Selsera and Schliza, it remounts to the Wirscheberg, then again follows the present frontier to the Nevea Pass, and then descends the sides of the Rombone to Isonzo, passing to the east of Plazzo. It then follows the line of the Isonzo to Tolmino, where it leaves the Isonzo to follow a line more to the east, a line passing to the east of the Pregona-Planina plateau and following the hollow of the Chiappovano, descends to the east of Goritzia, and, across the Carso de Comen, runs to the sea between Monfalcone and Trieste, near Nalresina.

ARTICLE 3.—The town of Trieste, with its territory, which will be extended to the north to Nalresina (inclusive) so as to touch the new Italian frontier, (Art. 2,) and to the south in such a way as to include the present judiciary districts of Capo d'Istria and Pirano, will be constituted as an autonomous and independent State, as far as concerns international, military, legislative, financial, and administrative affairs, Austria-Hungary renouncing all sovereignty over it. It shall remain a free port. Neither Austro-Hungarian nor Italian militia shall enter it. It will take over its quota of the Austrian public debt, in proportion to its population.

ARTICLE 4.—Austria-Hungary cedes to Italy the group of the Cursola Islands, including Lissa (with the adjacent islets of S. Andrea and Busi) and Lesina, (with the Spalmadores and the Torcola,) Curzola, Lagosta, (with the adjacent islets and reefs,) Cazza, and Meleda, and, in addition, Pelagosa.

ARTICLE 5.—Italy will occupy the ceded territories (Arts. 1, 2, and 4) immediately. Trieste and its territories will be immediately evacuated by the Austro-Hungarian authorities and militia. All the soldiers and sailors from the towns and territories serving in the Austro-Hungarian Army will be at once mustered out.

ARTICLE 6.—Austria-Hungary recognizes the full sovereignty of Italy over the town and Bay of Valona, including Sasseno, with, in the hinterland, the part of territory necessary to their defense.

ARTICLE 7.—Austria-Hungary will cease completely to take any interest in Albania, comprised within the limits assigned to it by the conference of London.

ARTICLE 8.—Austria-Hungary will grant a complete amnesty and will immediately liberate all persons sentenced for military or political offenses, who belong to the territory ceded (Arts. 1, 2, and 4) or evacuated, (Art. 3.)

ARTICLE 9.—Italy, for the liberation of the territories ceded, (Arts. 1, 2, and 4,) of the quota of the Austrian or Austro-Hungarian public debt and for the pensions payable to former imperial and royal functionaries and in exchange for the complete and immediate transfer to the Kingdom of Italy of all real and movable property, excepting arms, on the territories and in compensation for all the rights of the State on the said territories, for the present and the future, without any exception, will pay to Austria-Hungary a capital sum of 200,000,000 Italian lire in gold.

ARTICLE 10.—Italy undertakes to observe complete neutrality during the present war as far as Austria-Hungary and Germany are concerned.

ARTICLE 11.—During the whole duration of the present war, Italy renounces her right to invoke later in her favor the dispositions contained in Article 8 of the treaty of the Triple Alliance, and Austria-Hungary makes the same renunciation for the Italian occupation of the Dodecanesus.

(Signed)

SONNINO.

MAP SHOWING CHIEF POINTS ON THE ADRIATIC EAST COAST CLAIMED BY BOTH ITALY AND THE SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE STATE, INCLUDING FIUME AND VARIOUS ISLANDS NAMED IN THE TREATY OF LONDON

AUSTRIA'S OBJECTION

Prince Bülow and his Government thought that they would be able to bring such pressure to bear on their Austrian ally that the Vienna Government would agree to these terms. But there was one point on which the Ballplatz remained adamant, and that was the immediate carrying out of the terms asked by Italy. Austria was willing to subscribe to them, but on condition that their execution be postponed till after the war. The point on which the long and painful negotiations met shipwreck was Italy's demand for the immediate military occupation of the territory ceded to her and the immediate evacuation by Austrian troops of the territory to be erected into the autonomous and independent State of Trieste.

To this the Vienna Government absolutely refused to consent, while Baron Sonnino, on his side, declared it was a conditio sine qua non of Italy's signature of a treaty of neutrality. All further negotiations were therefore broken off.

This was the opportunity of the Entente Powers. London, Paris, and Petrograd approached the Consulta and asked what it would demand as the price of coming into the war on the side of the Entente. In view of the offer Italy had just turned down it was clear that the price would be high. The Entente statesmen were, however, not a little horrified when the Rome Government disclosed its conditions in all their nakedness. But the situation of the Allies was such that they were forced to pay almost any price to assure themselves of Italian support. As long as Italy was "on the fence" France had to keep at least 500,000 men to guard her southern frontier, and this at a moment when every soldier was worth his weight in gold.

As the Entente Powers regarded it as a life-and-death matter to get Italy into the war on their side, they signed on April 26, 1915, the following secret treaty:*

The Marquis Imperiali, acting on the instructions of his [the Italian] Government, has the honor to communicate the following memorandum to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir Edward Grey; the Ambassador of France, M. Cambon, and the Ambassador of Russia, Count Benckendorff:

ARTICLE 1.—A military convention is to be concluded without delay between the General Staffs of France, Great Britain, Russia, and Italy to determine the minimum number of troops which Russia would have to throw against Austria-Hungary if the latter should want to concentrate all her forces against Italy. Russia should decide mainly to attack Germany. Similarly the said convention is to regulate the questions relating to armistices, in so far as such armistices form an essential part of the competence of the Supreme Army Command.

ARTICLE 2.—On her part Italy undertakes by all means at her disposal to conduct the campaign in union with France, Great Britain, and Russia against all the powers at war with them.

ARTICLE 3.—The naval forces of France and Great Britain are to render uninterrupted and active assistance to Italy until such time as the navy of Austria has been destroyed or peace has been concluded. A naval convention is to be concluded without delay between France, Great Britain, and Italy.

ARTICLE 4.—By the future treaty of peace, Italy is to receive the district of Trentino; the entire Southern Tyrol up to its natural geographical frontier, which is the Brenner Pass; the city and district of Trieste; the County of Gorizia and Gradisca; the entire Istria up to the Quarnero, including Voloscoe and the Istrian islands of Cherso and Lussina, as well as the smaller Islands of Plavinika, Unia, Canidoli, Palazzuoli, S. Petro dei Nembi, Asinello, and Gruica, with the neighboring islets.

Note 1.—Here follow the details of the frontier delimitations: In execution of the conditions of Article 4 the frontier line should run as follows: From the summit of the Umbrile northward as far as Stelvio, thence along the watershed of the Rhetian Alps as far as the sources of the Adige and the Eisach; after which it will cross the heights of the Reschon and the Brenner and those of the Etz and the Tiller. The frontier will then turn southward, passing round Mount Tobloch in order to reach the real frontier of Carniola, which is near to the Alps. Passing along this frontier, the line will reach Mount Tarvis and follow the watershed of the Julian Alps beyond the crests of the Predil, the Mangart, and the Tricorne, (Triglav,) and the defiles of Podberdo, Poldansko, and Idria. Thence it will turn in a southeasterly direction toward the Schneeberg, in such a way as to exclude the basin of the Save and its tributaries from Italian territory. From the Schneeberg the frontier will descend toward the seacoast—Castua, Matuglia, and Volosca being considered as Italian districts.

ARTICLE 5.—Italy will likewise receive the Province of Dalmatia in its present frontiers, including Lissierica and Trebigne, (Trebanje,) in the north, and all the country in the south up to a line drawn from the coast, at the promontory of Planka, eastward along the watershed in such a way as to include in the Italian possessions all the valleys of the rivers flowing into the Sebenico—viz., Cikola, Kerka, and Buotinsnica—with all their affluents. Italy will likewise obtain all the islands situated to the north and west of the coasts of Dalmatia, beginning with Premuda, Selve, Ulbo, Skerda, Maob Pago, and Puntadura, and further north, and down to Melada in the south, with the inclusion of the Islands of St. Andrea, Busi, Lissa, Lesina, Torcola, Curzola, Cazza, and Lagosta, with all the adjacent rocks and islets, as well as Pelagosa, but without the Islands of Zirona Grande and Zirona Piccola, Bua, Solta, and Brazza.

The following are to be neutralized: (1) the entire coasts from Planka, in the north, to the southern extremity of the Sabbioncello peninsula, including this last-named peninsula in its entirety; (2) the part of the littoral from a point ten versts south of the promontory of Ragusa Vecchia to the Viosa (Vojuzza) River, so as to include in the neutralized zone the entire Gulf of Cattaro, with its ports of Antivari, Dulcigno, San Giovanni di Medua, and Durazzo; the rights of Montenegro, arising from the declarations exchanged by the two contracting parties as far back as April and May, 1909, remaining intact. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that those rights were guaranteed to Montenegro within her present frontiers, they are not to be extended to those territories and ports which may eventually be given to Montenegro. Thus, none of the ports of the littoral now belonging to Montenegro is to be neutralized at any future time. On the other hand, the disqualifications affecting Antivari, to which Montenegro herself agreed in 1909, are to remain in force; (3) lastly, all the islands which are not annexed to Italy.

Note 2.—The following territories on the Adriatic will be included by the powers of the Quadruple Entente in Croatia, Serbia, and Montenegro: In the north of the Adriatic, the entire coast from Volosca Bay, on the border of Istria, to the northern frontier of Dalmatia, including the entire coast now belonging to Hungary,

*This treaty was published in CURRENT HISTORY, March, 1918, soon after the Bolshevik Government at Petrograd had made it public; but it is given again here to complete the author's statement.—EDITOR.

and the entire coast of Croatia, the port of Fiume, and the small ports of Novi and Carlopago, and also the islands of Veglia, Pervicchio, Gregorio, Coll, and Arbe; and in the south of the Adriatic, where Serbia and Montenegro have interests, the entire coast from Planka up to the River Drin, with the chief ports of Spalato, Ragusa, Cattaro, Antivari, Dulcigno, and San Giovanni di Medua, with the islands of Zirona Grande, Zirona Piccola, Bua, Solta, Brazza, Jakljan, and Calamotta.

The port of Durazzo may be given to the independent Mohammedan State of Albania.

ARTICLE 6.—Italy will receive in absolute property Valona, the Islands of Saseno, and as much territory as would be required to secure their military safety—approximately between the River Voyazza in the north and in the east down to the borders of the Chimara district in the south.

ARTICLE 7.—Italy, having received Trentino and Istria in accordance with Article 4, and Dalmatia and the Adriatic islands in accordance with Article 5, and the Gulf of Valona, is not, in case of the creation of a small autonomous and neutralized State in Albania, to resist the possible desire of France, Great Britain, and Russia, to distribute among Montenegro, Serbia, and Greece the northern and southern parts of Albania. The latter's southern littoral from the frontier of the Italian district of Valona to Capo Stylos is to be neutralized. Italy is to have the right to conduct foreign relations with Albania; at any rate, Italy is to agree to the inclusion in Albania of a territory large enough to allow her frontiers to touch those of Greece and Serbia, west of Ochrida Lake.

ARTICLE 8.—Italy will obtain all the twelve islands (Dodecanese) now occupied by her, in full possession.

ARTICLE 9.—France, Great Britain, and Russia admit in principle the fact of Italy's interest in the maintenance of the political balance of power in the Mediterranean, and her rights, in case of a partition of Turkey, to a share, equal to theirs, in the basin of the Mediterranean—viz., in that part of it which adjoins the Province of Adalia, in which Italy has already acquired special rights and interests defined in the Italo-British Convention. The zone which is to be made Italy's property is to be more precisely defined in due course in conformity with the vital interests of France and Great Britain. Italy's interests will likewise be taken into consideration in case the powers should also maintain territorial integrity of Asiatic Turkey for some future period of time, and if they should only proceed to establish among themselves spheres of influence. In case France, Great Britain, and Russia should, in the course of the present war, occupy any districts of Asiatic Turkey, the entire territory adjacent to Adalia and defined more precisely below (?) is to be left to Italy, who reserves her right to occupy it.

ARTICLE 10.—In Libya, Italy is to enjoy all those rights and privileges which now belong to the Sultan in virtue of the Treaty of Lausanne.

ARTICLE 11.—Italy is to get a share in the war indemnity corresponding to the magnitude of her sacrifices and efforts.

ARTICLE 12.—Italy adheres to the declaration made by France, England, and Russia about leaving Arabia and the holy Moslem places in the hands of an independent Moslem power.

ARTICLE 13.—Should France and Great Britain extend their colonial possessions in Africa at the expense of Germany, they will admit in principle Italy's right to demand certain compensation by way of an extension of her possessions in Erythraea, Somaliland, and Libya, and the colonial areas adjoining French and British colonies.

ARTICLE 14.—Great Britain undertakes to facilitate for Italy the immediate flotation on the London market of a loan on advantageous terms to the amount of not less than £50,000,000.

ARTICLE 15.—France, Great Britain, and Russia pledge themselves to support Italy in not allowing the representatives of the Holy See to undertake any diplomatic steps having for their object the conclusion of peace or the settlement of questions connected with the present war.

ARTICLE 16.—The present treaty is to be kept secret. As regards Italy's adhesion to the Declaration of Sept. 5, 1915, this declaration alone will be published immediately on the declaration of war by or against Italy.

Having taken into consideration the present memorandum, the representatives of France, Great Britain, and Russia, being authorized thereto, agreed with the representatives of Italy, likewise authorized thereto, as follows:

France, Great Britain, and Russia express their complete agreement with the present memorandum submitted to them by the Italian Government. In respect of Articles 1, 2, and 3 of the present memorandum, regarding the co-ordination of the military and naval operations of all the four powers, Italy declares that she will actively intervene at an earliest possible date, and, at any rate, not later than one month after the signature of the present document by the contracting parties.

The undersigned have confirmed by hand and seal the present instrument in London in four copies. April 26, 1915.

In the light of subsequent events this treaty seems a flagrant betrayal of one of the bravest and most loyal allies of the Entente, the Kingdom of Serbia. The carrying out of the secret treaty would indeed have been a terrible blow to the aspirations of Serbia and the Southern Slavs for unity, as, by its terms, nearly a million of them would, without their consent being asked, have been transferred from the yoke of Austria to that of Italy.

What arguments can be advanced in palliation of this apparent betrayal? As concerns Great Britain and France the chief cause was probably, as I have stated above, ignorance and dire necessity. The world war had opened up so many and such vast problems that the statesmen of the Entente were not able to grasp them all. One of these was the aspiration for unity on the part of the various sections of the Serbo-Croatian race, that is to say, Serbia, Montenegro, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene Provinces of the Austrian Empire, (Bosnia, Herzegovina, Istria, Dalmatia, Slavonia, Carniola, Croatia, the Banat, and the Batchka.)

Of all the international questions raised by the war the Yugoslav one was probably the furthest removed from the beaten tracks followed by European statesmen. The Polish question, Italia Irredenta, the Danish duchies, the future of Constantinople, and similar problems were more or less familiar and within the range of practical politics. But the study of the Yugoslav question had been confined to a few experts like Dr. Seton-Watson, Mr. Wickham Steed, and Sir Arthur Evans in England, and Professor Denis, M. André Choradame, and M. August Gauvin in France. But they were experts, and it is notorious that during the recent world conflict the men in power showed a curious disregard of expert advice and preferred to follow rule-of-thumb methods imposed on them from day to day by the march of events.

OLD IDEALS STILL PREVAILED

Another point which contributed to their shortsighted policy was their curious skepticism as to the ultimate and complete break-up of the Austrian Empire. The statesmen in Vienna had balanced successfully on the tight rope for so long that they were credited with being able to continue the performance indefinitely. The idea that the Poles, the Czechoslovaks, the Rumanians, the Italians, and the Southern Slavs could break away completely from the Austrian yoke, either forming new States or joining others already in existence, was not realized by the statesmen of the Entente Powers till nearly the end of the war. And if they knew little, the peoples at large knew still less. The result was that there was no force of public opinion to check the arbitrary course of the men in power. These nearly all belonged to the old school of diplomacy, which was accustomed to assembling around a board of green cloth and to shuffling the smaller and subject races about, without consulting them in any way, as the pawns on the European chessboard. The Southern Slavs were subjects of Austria, an autocratic and reactionary empire; Italy was a free and enlightened democracy; therefore, the transfer of the Southern Slavs from the Emperor Franz Josef to King Victor Emmanuel was, in the opinion of the Entente, all to their advantage. Any protest on their part would be base ingratitude. In 1915 President Wilson had not yet enunciated the freedom-giving principle of the self-determination of peoples.

THE ENTENTE VIEW

The argument of the British, French, and Russian statesmen was therefore: "If we cannot bring Italy in on our side we may lose the war. If we lose the war the Southern Slavs will remain forever under the yoke of their Austrian masters. If we, by granting Italy's demands, win the war, the Southern Slavs will be incorporated in a free and democratic state like Italy. It is true they might, and doubtless would, prefer to join with their brothers-in-race of Serbia and Montenegro and form an independent Yugoslav State, but this is at present a Utopia, and the times are too critical for us to waste time on dreams that cannot be realized. They must understand that a 'half-loaf is better than no bread,' and let us, the Great Powers, in our wisdom, settle their destiny."

Of course, this was a purely unjustified conception of the problem of the Austrian Empire. A little study would soon have convinced the Entente statesmen of their complete error. They would have found that the Yugoslav and Czechoslovak aspirations were a tremendous force, and one with which the whole world would have to reckon. They did not realize that, as Joseph le Maître declared, "une aspiration Slave fera sauter une forteresse," and that when twenty-odd million Austrian Slavs had declared for independence no questions of policy or opportunity put forward by the so-called great powers would make them consent to become subject to any power against their will. Britain, France, and Russia could not plead entire ignorance of Yugoslav aspirations, for these, a few days before the signing of the secret treaty, were voiced with no uncertain sound in the Serbian Parliament by M. Pashitch, the Prime Minister.

In spite of the secrecy of the negotiations regarding the secret treaty, rumors had begun to circulate and had caused a certain amount of anxiety in Serbia. On April 15, eleven days before it was signed, M. Drogoľub Pavlovitch, a member of the Skupchina, addressed the following question to the Government:

In the foreign press and in our own, rumors are obstinately in circulation concerning an early action on the part of Italy. This action is to be determined by certain compensations. These are again to be made at the expense of the Serbian, Croatian, and Slovene peoples. I ask the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister if these rumors correspond to the truth.

STATEMENT OF M. PASHITCH

In reply to this interpellation M. Pashitch, the Prime Minister, made the following declaration:

All I can say for the present in reply to the question of M. Pavlovitch is the following: It is true that rumors have reached us from various sides of pourparlers that have been begun between Italy and the powers of the Triple Entente for the participation of the former alongside the latter in the solution of the various questions. As before, rumors have been current that pourparlers have also been begun between Italy and Germany and Austria regarding the concessions which Italy could obtain by remaining neutral and associated with Germany and Austria. These rumors are not confirmed officially. This is why we cannot know whether or not they correspond to the truth. For it often happens that false rumors are spread with a view of bringing about declarations and of sounding the opinions and sentiments in certain quarters.

For the moment I cannot put faith in these rumors or believe that they conform with the truth, for I believe that Italy will not violate the principles in the name of which she realized her own unity. I do not think she will abandon this just principle at the time when we are seeking the solution of the problem of nationalities.

Italy realized her unity on the basis of the principle of nationalities. All her juridical science leads up to the inviolable postulate that the State must maintain and respect the principle on which it is founded. If it abandons it, it shakes its own foundations. This is why I think that Italy, in ranging herself alongside the Triple Entente, will be guided by the principle of nationalities and that she will be able to arrange her interests in the Adriatic in such a way that there will be no regrettable consequences either for her or for us, and that there will not be a disaccord between the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and the Italians. For it is only an accord between these two peoples that would furnish the surest guarantee against the "push" of Germany toward the Mediterranean.

In Italy there are great political men whose wisdom is able to appreciate the importance of an accord between the Serb-Croat-Slovene people and Italy, an accord which alone can assure the prosperity of the two peoples by increasing their mutual friendship and by assuring the communications between them for the development of their commerce. This is why, gentlemen, I think that the Italian statesmen will not be guided by the idea of obtaining a town or an island more or less. They must know in advance that Italy's force does not lie in this or that town or island, but in the friendly relations between her and the Serb-Croat-Slovene people.

These friendly and statesmanlike utterances of M. Pashitch found, however, no echo in Rome nor in the capitals of the Entente Powers, and did not prevent the signing of a treaty which bartered away the freedom of nearly a million Yugoslavs.

ITALY'S VIEWPOINT

If want of knowledge cannot be invoked on the part of Italian statesmen, what arguments, it will be asked, can be put forward by them in justification of the terms of the secret treaty? The answer is: Reasons of strategy, and the necessity of assuring the safety of Italy in the future. In 1915 Italy had to consider two possibilities regarding the conclusion of the war. One was that it would end in a drawn battle, a kind of stalemate, as the result of which Germany and Austria would still remain in being as great powers, and still be a future menace for Italy. In these circumstances it was to Italy's interest, and it was even her duty, to assure herself of every possible strategic advantage, so that if she had ever to renew the struggle against Austria she would do so with as many trump cards in hand as possible. If the Austrian Empire still continued to exist, no free and independent Yugoslavia could come into being, so that Italy's annexations could not harm a State that was nonexistent.

The second hypothesis was that Austria should be defeated and dismembered, but that Russia should still exist as the greatest military and autocratic power in Europe. She would naturally establish herself as the protector of all the smaller Slav nations. Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia would therefore only be outposts of the Russian Empire, and the menace of Pan-Slavism would replace the menace of Pan-Germanism on the Adriatic and elsewhere. By the secret treaty entered into by France, Britain, and Russia before the war, the latter power was assured the possession of Constantinople and the Dardanelles, so that, as the Black Sea fleet could enter the Aegean at any time, Russia might become a formidable rival to Italy in the Mediterranean. Through Yugoslavia she could challenge Italy's mastery of the Adriatic and from the Croatian and Dalmatian ports could threaten Italy's Adriatic coast line.

THE CHANGED SITUATION

Such a danger might be an excuse, if not a reason, for Italy's claim to Istria, Dalmatia, and the islands. In 1915 the realization of either of these hypotheses was possible and could be pleaded in justification of the terms of the secret treaty.

But in 1919 no such reason can be invoked. The Austrian Empire has ceased to exist, and Russia, as a military and autocratic power, has disappeared forever from the political stage. The new State of Yugoslavia has come into existence, but cannot threaten Italy or challenge her supremacy in the Adriatic. The new kingdom possesses no navy, and the great powers can make it a condition of its existence that it shall not create one. A country may raise an army in secret, but can never create a fleet without its being known. With the possession by Italy of Brindisi and Valona, Trieste and Venice, the Adriatic, from the point of view of naval strategy, becomes an Italian lake.

There is now no reason whatever why Italy should insist on receiving the strategic guarantees contained in the secret treaty. Great Britain and France both realize today the bitter injustice they did their gallant ally, Serbia, the "Piedmont" of the new Yugoslavia, by signing the secret treaty; but they do not, as long as Italy insists on her pound of flesh, know any way to escape from the dilemma in which they have placed themselves. The only solution would be that Italy should voluntarily renounce the terms of the secret treaty and thus set them free.

But this Italy shows no signs of doing. On the contrary, she even went beyond that document and claimed Fiume, to which in the treaty she renounced all claim, categorically admitting that it was a Croatian port.

ITALIAN IMPERIALISM

This is a fresh proof of the truth of the French proverb that l'appetit vient en mangeant. The concluding of the secret treaty has been the starting point of a wave of imperialism which has swept over the whole Italian peninsula. In addition to Yugoslav territory the secret treaty also assured to Italy the permanent possession of the Dodecanese, the twelve Greek islands she seized during the war with Turkey, and which, in spite of her written promise to evacuate them made in the Treaty of Lausanne, she still holds. She further disputes Greek claims to Northern Epirus, has proclaimed an Italian protectorate over Albania, and demands large territories on the Turkish mainland.

We are thus brought face to face with a new Eastern question. With the possession of the Eastern Adriatic ports of Trieste and Fiume Italy would complete her control of the Mediterranean traffic to and from Switzerland, South Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Jugoslavia, and thus arm herself with an economic weapon of the first importance. Trieste has long been a centre of trade with the Levant. Its shipping and banking facilities will now fall into Italian hands and provide a powerful agency of peaceful penetration. The possession of the islands of the Dodecanese is a stepping-stone to the domination of a section of the Turkish Empire. But the realization of such vaulting ambitions can only be achieved by making tabula rasa of all the principles for which the United States and the Allies fought the war, and would simply be the substitution of Italian imperialism on a small scale for German imperialism on a grand.

Every real friend of Italy regards with anxiety the line of policy on which Baron Sonnino and Signor Orlando embarked, and is hoping that Signor Nitti and Signor Tittoni will renounce the grandiose visions of their predecessors and adopt a more sane and moderate policy.

Italy's Rights Across the Adriatic

Italian Official Review in Justification of the Treaty of London and Italy's Claims

By CAPTAIN ALESSANDRO SAPELLI

[FORMER GOVERNOR OF BENADIR, EAST AFRICA; DIRECTOR OF ITALIAN BUREAU OF INFORMATION, NEW YORK]

CURRENT HISTORY MAGAZINE, in accordance with its non-partisan policy, submitted Captain Gordon-Smith's article on the Treaty of London, with his knowledge and approval, to Italian official representatives in America for a reply. The Italian view of the subject is given below.

THERE has been growing up in certain quarters a curious predilection to visit many of the ills of the Peace Conference on the Treaty of London—to hold up that document, amid all the covert diplomacy of the war, as the most iniquitous example, compared with the impiety of which the contracts of England and France to bestow Constantinople on Russia, Shantung on Japan, and to divide Asiatic Turkish vilayets between them, and even England's recent treaty with Persia, which renders the League of Nations still-born, loom almost in the light of sanctified covenants. Many censors of this supposed nefarious document cheerfully admit that it would not gleam with quite such an unholy light if only Italy would do what England and France, however, reveal little intention of doing in regard to their own advantageous private engagements, and denounce the Treaty of London as a "scrap of paper."

The methods employed, the pressure brought to bear on Italy in order to have her Government consummate "il gran rifiuto," are quite familiar. They are not particularly praiseworthy, but that may be due to the character of the result they are feverishly striving to reach. And now the moral aspects of these methods and this pressure, which could hardly be attractively sustained by the British desire to perpetuate the Cunard concessions in the Adriatic and the French jealousy of Italian expansion in the Mediterranean, are receiving a constantly increasing ethical impetus from the attractively advertised claims of the Yugoslavs.

It is quite natural, therefore, that Captain Gordon-Smith, in the light of his titles and his office, should ignore all less popular considerations and base his argument for the denouncement of the treaty chiefly upon this ground. His method, if allowed to go unanalyzed, his conclusions, if left unanswered, would be singularly appealing. It is my purpose to analyze his method and to answer his conclusions. I shall try to do so as politely as possible by showing the same consideration for the contentions and claims of Yugoslavia that he does for the contentions and claims of Italy.

In the first place he is to be congratulated on his method. Singularly impressed by his opening denunciations, the gentle reader glides smoothly on from the abstract to the concrete, from the general to the specific with intellectual, even emotional satisfaction, so that the final apostrophe arrives with peculiar clearness, force, and beauty:

Every real friend of Italy regards with anxiety the line of policy on which Baron Sonnino and Signor Orlando embarked, and is hoping that Signor Nitti and Signor Tittoni will renounce the grandiose visions of their predecessors and adopt a more sane and moderate policy.

I have heard that there are some benighted persons who consider themselves "real friends of Italy" who might resent this imputation, and, while criticising the statesmanship of Sonnino and Orlando, would deny that their policy embraced "grandiose visions," or that what are called grandiose visions must be renounced by Nitti and Tittoni for the reasons so cleverly set forth by Captain Gordon-Smith.

THE DOCUMENTS INVOLVED

His argument, chiefly concerned with Italy's iniquity, with the former gullibility but present contrition of England and France, and with the worthy ambitions of the Yugoslavs, is based upon three documents. In such cases it is customary to employ authentic documents, or, failing these, candidly to admit their shortcomings. Captain Gordon-Smith does not employ authentic documents, yet he has nothing to say about the untrustworthiness of those he does employ. It would be quite unnecessary to dwell upon this fact were it not for the advantage he takes of it.

His documents are (1) a perverted translation of a fragment of a dispatch sent by Baron Sonnino to the Duke of Avarna, the Italian Ambassador at Vienna, on April 8, 1915, and his designation of this fragment that it represents a German-Italian agreement is quite gratuitous; (2) the version of the Treaty of London contained in F. Seymour Cocks's book, "The Secret Treaties," (London: The Union of Democratic Control,) which is open to serious objections, as will presently be seen; (3) a garbled translation of a speech made by M. Pashitch, the Serbian Prime Minister, which, however, might be ignored except for the fact that it makes the speaker presuppose an expanded Serbian unity which at the time had no existence.

There is nothing in the Italian Green Book to show that von Bülow had a hand in framing the Italian proposals of April 8; there is much in the Austrian Red Book to show that he did not see them until after they had been sent. For example, the dispatch Baron Macchio, the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador at Rome, sent Baron Burian, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, on April 14, reads in part:

Prince Bülow has given me the following information on a conversation he had yesterday with Baron Sonnino:

The two gentlemen went over each individual article of the latest Italian demands together. In the matter of the Trentino, Baron Sonnino admitted that he had included purely German districts, but endeavored to excuse this by saying that you in your proposal had retained purely Italian districts for the Dual Monarchy. Prince Bülow gained the impression that the Italians would be open to negotiations as to the extent of territory to be ceded as well as on the question of the Isonzo border.

Prince Bülow considered the stipulations about Trieste to be entirely too obscure in their disclosures of Baron Sonnino's real aspirations. When Baron Sonnino explained that he had in mind a status similar to that of Hamburg, Prince Bülow retorted that Germany was a confederation of States and that therefore an analogy between the two situations could hardly be established. Moreover, he re-capitulated with all his available energy all the reasons why Austria-Hungary could not renounce Trieste. . . .

The chief elements which dominate the Italian Government still remain the same: Fear of England, fear of revolution—and at court revolution seems to be feared even more than war—and on the other hand the uncertainty as to the relative power of the two camps.

It certainly does not look as though the proposals sent on April 8 were the result of an agreement between Wilhelmstrasse and the Consulate, as Captain Gordon-Smith affirms. Even the preface to the Sonnino dispatch would have enlightened him. Was its avoidance innocent or calculated? An oversight that is certainly innocent is to be noticed in the last paragraph of the proposals, where he mentions Article 8 of the Triple Alliance Treaty, when, of course, 7 is intended.

TREATY OF LONDON TEXT

The authentic text of the Treaty of London should, without transgressing one of its stipulations, be known only to the Governments of the signatories. That President Wilson in his "Memorandum concerning the question of Italian claims on the Adriatic" presented to the Italian delegation at Paris, on April 14, 1919, and in his statement to the Italian people on the same subject nine days later, should have shown a singular knowledge of the details of the treaty is beside the point. That mystery may be cleared up some day. All published versions are based on a Russian translation made from the French original in the Russian imperial archives and published in the Izvestia of Petrograd by orders of the Lenin Government in December, 1917. The New Europe of London published an English version of the Russian text, and from it an Italian translation was made which was read in the Rome Chamber by Deputy Bevione, and its accuracy challenged, but naturally without corrective specifications. The origin of the Cocks text employed by Captain Gordon-Smith is quite unknown, but its substance shows that it is even further remote from the original than the Bolshevik publication obviously is. At least its careless construction is revealed in the last sentence of Article I., where the context plainly shows that between the words "such armistices" and "form" a negative should have been inserted.

In the Izvestia version the geographical designations are shown to be so inexact that they could hardly have been that way in the authentic text. This is proved when they are compared with those portions of the treaty incorporated in the armistice of Nov. 4, 1918. The concessions to Croatia are lightly passed over. The insignificant ports of Novi and Carlopago are mentioned, but the larger ports of Buccari, Segna, and Cirquenizza are omitted.

FIUME AND DISPUTED POINTS ON THE NEIGHBORING COAST

As to the Pashitch speech, according to the official English version sent out by the Serbian Press Bureau at Nish the last sentence should read:

I believe that Italian statesmen will not fix their aim on the acquisition of a town more or less or any particular island, because they know that the strength of Italy will lie, not in any such town or island, but in harmonious relations with the Serbo-Croatian and Slovene peoples.

INACCURATE CONCLUSIONS

It will be admitted, I think, that the further any documents depart from their authentic sense, form, and setting, the greater become the opportunities for casuistry. The opportunities thus presented in the present instance are not shunned by Captain Gordon-Smith. From his gratuitous assumption that the proposals of April 8 are of German-Italian origin, it is but a step to designate them as German, and so to pass nonchalantly on from what he calls the "era of sordid huckstering" to that other era in which he represents the Entente statesmen as "not a little horrified when the Rome Government disclosed its conditions in all their nakedness."

And so in making this approach he is able to impart the important information that while "Germany knew it was quite hopeless to expect Italy to take up arms on the side of the Central Powers," this was all artfully concealed from the Entente statesmen, who "were forced to pay almost any price to assure themselves of Italian support," for, writes Captain Gordon-Smith: "As long as Italy was 'on the fence' France had to keep at least 500,000 men to guard her southern frontier, and this at a moment when every soldier was worth his weight in gold."

Is it possible that he does not know that because of the assurance given France by Italy in early August, 1914, a measurable majority of these troops were removed and incorporated in Foch's Ninth Army, where they played an important, possibly a decisive, rôle in the battle of the Marne?

In a similar manner Captain Gordon-Smith's special text of the Treaty of London, ignoring as it does the concessions made to Croatia and disparaging those made to Serbia and Montenegro, enables him to state with unblushing assurance that the document "seems a flagrant betrayal of one of the bravest and most loyal allies of the Entente, the Kingdom of Serbia," and that its carrying out "would indeed have been a terrible blow to the aspirations of Serbia and the Southern Slavs for unity."

And although later he speciously admits Italy's justification on two hypotheses, it is not before he has attempted to annihilate their moral value by making the most of M. Pashitch's righteous objections uttered at about the time the treaty was being negotiated.

BASIS OF ITALY'S CLAIMS

Now, the negotiation of the Treaty of London was much more complicated, the tentative proposals advanced by the various parties much more complex, than Captain Gordon-Smith probably has any idea of. The boundaries put forward by Italy were purely defensive. For centuries she had been invaded, because she lacked them, by German, Magyar, and Slav, and unless she now secures these defensive ramparts her future will still be menaced by the same races. The laws of racial migration are immutable and their execution can only be prevented by force.

Italy's claims as represented in the Treaty of London do not therefore constitute, in so far as the Adriatic is concerned, her maximum demands, but rather her minimum postulates. They were the result of a compromise adjusted, I believe, from the following formulæ, the first presented by Italy, the second by Russia:

1. Istria, (including Trieste;) Pola, as a military and naval base; and Fiume.
 2. The Croatian coast, from Fiume southward to the neighborhood of Zara.
 3. The Dalmatian mainland from Zara to the Montenegrin frontier, with the naval bases of Sebenico and Cattaro.
 4. The Dalmatian Archipelago, which constitutes a formidable maritime position.
1. A part of Istria, including Pola as well as Trieste, to belong to Italy.
 2. A part of Istria, with Fiume, to belong to a future independent Croatia, together with the present Croatian coast and with Dalmatia as far as the river Narenta.
 3. Dalmatia, from the Narenta southward, to belong to Serbia.
 4. The greater part of the Dalmatian Archipelago to belong to the future Serbo-Croatia.

When the treaty was negotiated the national attitude of Greece, with dynastic proclivities toward the Central Powers, was problematical. Italy had taken the Dodecanese from Turkey, not from Greece. According to the Treaty of Lausanne these islands were to be returned to Turkey when the last Turkish officer had been removed from Libya Italiana. At what period of the war would Captain Gordon-Smith suggest that Italy should have returned them? And has he so carelessly followed the diplomacy of M. Venizelos as not to know where Greece stands in the ultimate readjustment?

THE ALBANIAN PROTECTORATE

Italy proclaimed a protectorate over Albania—whose students for centuries have been educated in the universities of the Peninsula—much less selfishly than England did over Egypt, and to offset the claims of Austria-Hungary, which had already proclaimed a protectorate there. The Italian proclamation delivered on June 3, 1917, at Argyrocastro, by General Ferrero, reads in part:

By this act, Albanians, you will have free institutions, troops, law courts, and schools directed by Albanian citizens; you will be able to manage your properties and the product of your labor to your own advantage, and for the ever-increasing well-being of your country.

As the Treaty of London provides for Italian concessions in Asiatic Turkey dependent on British and French acquisitions there, and as further Franco-British acquisitions are provided for in a treaty concluded behind the back of Italy in 1916, quite out of order with the letter and spirit of the London covenant, it seems unnecessary to do more than mention Captain Gordon-Smith's statement that Italy now "demands large territories on the Turkish mainland," and to add that such demands exist nowhere except in the Captain's imagination.

"Ignorance," it has been seen, is hardly the word to apply to the British and French negotiators of the Treaty of London. "Dire necessity" was theirs, but it was hardly Italy's fault, for she, aside from making it safe for the withdrawal of French garrisons in the south, had forced Austria-Hungary to keep half a million men inactive on the Italian frontier.

SERBIA'S ASPIRATIONS

But let us return to the burden of Captain Gordon-Smith's remarks—his solicitude for Greater Serbia, for the monarchy of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, for Yugoslavia. He will probably not deny that during the negotiation of the Treaty of London M. Boskarich was made conversant with the Serbian provisions in the document and approved of them. M. Boskarich was the Serbian Minister at the Court of St. James's. At any rate a note was sent to the press stating that Serbia had received "her little window on the sea." Nor is he likely to deny that Italian ships rescued the survivors of the Serbian Army from Montenegro and Albania, and conveyed them to Corfu. And Serbia, betrayed by her great allies in the Autumn of 1915, as Captain Gordon-Smith has already shown in the September number of CURRENT HISTORY, is still worthy of special consideration. Unfortunately, since her rescue and rehabilitation her condition has become somewhat complicated by her assumption of larger powers, of greater responsibilities. Prudence does not always go hand in hand with valor, and Serbian aspirations are now arousing considerable apprehension among her former admirers.

Her expansion into Yugoslavia was achieved by three events: The Declaration of Corfu, July 20, 1917, which placed the Monarchy of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes on paper; the Pact of Rome, April 10, 1918, which gave Croats and Slovenes and the subject Serbs the moral support of the allied and associated nations, just as it did the subject Poles, Rumanians, and Czechoslovaks, in their projected revolt against the Hapsburgs—an advantage of which the subject Poles, Rumanians, and Czechoslovaks quickly availed themselves, and the Croats, Slovenes, and Serbs did not—and, finally, the recognition by the United States of the Greater Monarchy, Feb. 7, 1919, which raised the mandate of the Serbian delegates at the Peace Conference so that they were able to plead the cause of the Croats and Slovenes, as friendly peoples, and dispute the claims of Italy based on the Treaty of London.

Really this distinction bestowed on the Croats and Slovenes was hardly deserved. Their revolt against the Hapsburgs never occurred. Even the prisoners among them in Italy declined to fight for freedom, and showed their contempt for the Czechoslovaks, who eagerly embraced the opportunity to do so. They transgressed the spirit of the Pact of Rome by conducting an anti-Italian propaganda in France, England, and the United States, until those Italians who had generously labored to make the Rome Convention a success revolted at their ingratitude. The Austro-Hungarian divisions in which Serbo-Croats and Slovenes predominated fought cruelly at Caporetto, committed unspeakable atrocities in Veneto, and fought to the last at the Piave for the Dual Monarchy of the Hapsburgs. Their numbers are upon record: The 28th, 31st, 36th, 42d, 58th, 44th, 52d, 55th, 60th, 32d, 49th, 50th, 57th, and 70th, and the 53d Regiment of Zagabria with 95 per cent. Croats, the 79th Regiment of Ottociaz with 100 per cent. Croats, and the 37th Regiment of Gravosa with 95 per cent. Serbo-Croats. A Slav General commanded the enemy's armies on the Isonzo. To a Croatian regiment was promised the privilege of being the first to enter Venice and to loot the Pearl of the Adriatic. Some of the attachés of the Yugoslav delegates at Paris are said to be under indictment in Italy for having committed atrocities in Veneto.

THE CASE OF FIUME

And yet it disturbs some persons that Italy does not surrender Fiume to the tender mercies of these people—Fiume, whose deputy, Andrea Ossoina, on Oct. 18, 1918, defied the Hapsburgs in the Parliament of Budapest by declaring that his city was and would always remain Italian; Fiume, whose people a week before the armistice elected a National Council to proclaim its union to Italy; Fiume, whose people resented President Wilson's advice, given last April to the Italian people, to surrender their city to the Croats, in the following language:

The population of Fiume, assembled under the Italian flag, in the presence of representatives of the glorious American Army, replies to your proclamation by conferring full power over the city upon the representatives of the Italian Government.

In the name of our dead on the Piave and Isonzo, we express to you our greatest gratitude for provoking by your attitude the highest and most solemn manifestation in favor of Italian sentiment, which this city could make before the whole world.

We inform you that Fiume's union with Italy is an accomplished fact.

And yet Captain Gordon-Smith appears to be grieved that Italy should have gone beyond the Treaty of London "and claimed Fiume, to which in the treaty she renounced all claim, categorically admitting that it was a Croatian port."

Well, we have seen why it was not claimed by Italy in the treaty; also, we may at length have some idea why the treaty "is now seen to be an iniquitous pact and one which Great Britain and France would today be only too glad to repudiate if they could do so without breach of their plighted word"; of the "ignorance and dire necessity" of their plenipotentiaries "in signing a document of which all right-thinking men are to-day heartily ashamed," of gross neglect of the said plenipotentiaries to realize the fact that "the study of the Yugoslav question had been confined to a few experts like Dr. Seton-Watson, H. Wickham Steed, and Sir Arthur Evans in England, and Professor Denis, M. André Cheradame, and August Gavrin in France," so that they seemed to rely on such ignoramuses as Richard Bagot, G. T. Plunkett, Julius M. Price, and Thomas G. Jackson in England, and Adolph Landry, Gabriel Hanotaux, Jules Destrée, and Robert Lambel in France, and thus "bartered away the freedom of nearly a million Yugoslavs."

Now, as I understand it, while the maxim, "self-determination of nationalities," was an inspiring phrase for martial sentiment its practice was never intended to be paramount to the exigencies of national defense, or even to large national interests. I may be wrong, but the remaking of the maps of Europe, Asia, and Africa, as far as it has proceeded, does not prove me so.

And there is one word more: If Serbia had defeated the Central Powers unaided she could scarcely dictate more arrogantly to Europe than she does today with the self-assumed mandate of Jugoslavia; if Italy had been indifferent to the "dire necessity" of the Entente and had let them fight the Germans without her she could scarcely receive less consideration than she does today through the disloyalty, injustice, and contempt of her allies.

General Ludendorff's Memoirs

Many Interesting Points of Inside History Told in the German Commander's Narrative of the War

GENERAL ERICH VON LUDENDORFF'S book, "My War Memoirs," published late in the Summer of 1919, throws new light on many points in the progress of the war as conducted on the German side. It reveals the author's personality as possessing a stern fidelity to military discipline and a profound devotion to the Hohenzollern dynasty. With this goes a conviction "of the greatness and significance of the peaceful services rendered by the Fatherland to civilization and mankind." His book is written in the impersonal vein characteristic of a soldier, and discloses a straightforward honesty of purpose. Throughout, he makes plain his distrust of those whom he terms the "politicals."

General Ludendorff was with the first German column to enter Belgium. He attributes the plan to invade France by way of Belgium to "one of the greatest soldiers that ever lived," General Count von Schlieffen. He sums up his part in the attack on Liège as "a bold stroke in which I was able to fight just like any soldier of the rank and file who proves his worth in battle."

On Aug. 22 he was summoned from headquarters of the 2d Army between Wavre and Namur to General Headquarters at Coblenz to take the position of Chief of Staff of the 8th Army in East Prussia. En route to the east front he reported to the Kaiser, who bestowed upon him the Order Pour le Mérite for his services at Liège. Referring to that occasion, Ludendorff remarks: "All my life this will be a proud if sad memory." At Hanover he picked up General von Hindenburg, and wishes it understood that this was positively the first time he had met his titular superior in that close relationship which was to last until the end of the war. Though General Ludendorff does not state as much precisely, yet it presently becomes clear that his was the directing hand thereafter, thus upsetting much that was written at the time regarding Hindenburg's strategy based upon foreknowledge.

A MILITARY OPPORTUNIST

In approaching the decisive victory over the Russians at the battle of Tannenberg, Ludendorff states that there had been no previously settled plan of action. He practically admits being somewhat of a military opportunist, if the later charge of "gambler" made against him can hardly be sustained. "The civilian," writes Ludendorff, "is too inclined to think that war is only like the making out of an arithmetical problem. On both sides it is a case of wrestling with powerful, unknown physical and psychological forces, a struggle which inferiority in numbers makes all the more difficult. It means working with men of varying force of character and with their own views. The only quantity that is known and constant is the will of the leader." From this time forth Ludendorff figured as a bold though not reckless watcher for any promising weakness in the enemy's strategy. His victory at Tannenberg shows that where the enemy's morale was undeniably weaker than that of the German Army, tremendous will-to-conquer blows, combined with fortuitous circumstances, bade fair to be successful, but in the west, where both resistance and resilience were as great, if not greater, than his own, his theory proved disastrous.

Following Tannenberg, a very large part of Ludendorff's book is taken up with events in the east. Tannenberg merely served to open his eyes to the precarious situation with which he had to deal. This was specially manifested in the weakness of Germany's allies. From both the military and the political point of view he had only contempt for Austria-Hungary. While admitting the complaint of Austria that Germany had failed in France in the Autumn of 1914, and that she was left without assistance to fight the Russian hordes, he argues: "In any case, it was fatal for us that we allied with decaying States like Austria-Hungary and Turkey. A Jew in Radom once said to me that he could not understand why so strong and vital a body as Germany had allied herself with a corpse. He was right." After Mackensen's victory at Gorlice, Ludendorff proclaimed him "a brilliant soldier whose deeds will live in history for all time." He also praises his adversary, the Grand Duke Nicholas, as a really great strategist.

WORKING WITH HINDENBURG

One of Ludendorff's most illuminating chapters deals with the military crisis of 1916, after the disastrous six months' attempt to capture Verdun, and upon the eve of Rumania's entry into the war on the side of the Entente. On Aug. 28 Hindenburg and Ludendorff received orders to proceed to General Headquarters at Pless. There General von Falkenhayn, Chief of Staff, was dismissed, and Hindenburg appointed in his place. Explanation is given of the somewhat curious military position of First Quartermaster General assigned to Ludendorff. The title of Second Chief of the General Staff had been intended for him, but at Ludendorff's request the other was granted him. He confesses a deeper personal anxiety over the task before him than was known at the time. "I realized only too fully that my post was thankless," he writes. "I entered it with the solemn resolve that my deeds and actions should have no other motive than to lead the war to a victorious end. For that alone had the General Field Marshal and I been summoned. The work was stupendous. I never felt free from a heavy weight of responsibility. The sphere of effort was in many respects new to me and was multifarious; the mere extent of the duties was more than I was accustomed to. Never did fate lay so suddenly so heavy a burden on a mortal."

Rumania's entry into the war first occupied the dual German High Command. Falkenhayn's plan for Mackensen to cross the Danube and march on Bucharest was rejected as leading to certain disaster, and the march into the Dobrudja was substituted. Its ultimate success was praised by enemy military critics as a great strategic movement, the credit for which, at the time, mainly went to Mackensen.

Turning to the west, Ludendorff was profoundly concerned with the gravity of the situation. Nothing but heavy losses had resulted from the Verdun failure. The Somme battle progressed without satisfactory promise. The fear of a breakdown on the western front carried with it a threatening probability of the loss of all their efforts in Russia. Ludendorff's mind was occupied with tactics of defense. Marshal Hindenburg agreed with him that the German infantry could not be utilized to the best advantage by merely doggedly clinging to their lines; that the deep dug-outs and cellars too often became man-traps, and that the rifle had been forgotten in the use of the hand grenade. All this must be changed.

GERMANY'S PEACE OFFER

The move of Chancellor von Bethmann Hollweg to induce President Wilson to act as peace mediator was attractive to Ludendorff. He agreed to a direct proposal, but stipulated that it should not be made until after the fall of Bucharest. That event took place on Dec. 6, 1916. It was followed by the offer on the 12th. Its reception by the Entente press and the reply of Jan. 30 convinced Ludendorff that an acceptable arrangement was impossible, that the Entente were bound by secret treaties to destroy the Central Powers. Henceforth, therefore, the watchword must be "Victory or Downfall!" The later draft of a proposed basis for President Wilson's intervention, dispatched to Ambassador Bernstorff on Jan. 29, 1917, contained, in Ludendorff's words, "the only terms of peace which ever reached the enemy from our side with my co-operation." They read as follows:

Return of the part of Upper Alsace occupied by the French. Establishment of a frontier securing Germany and Poland strategically and economically against Russia.

Restitution of the colonies in form of an agreement securing to Germany colonial domains in proportion to her population and economic interests. Return of French territory occupied by Germany, with provision for strategic and economic rectification of frontiers and financial compensation.

Restoration of Belgium, with definite guarantees for the security of Germany, these to be arranged by direct negotiation with the Belgian Government.

A commercial and financial agreement on the basis of the exchange of territory captured by either side and to be returned when peace was concluded.

Compensation to German undertakings and private persons injured by the war.

Repudiation of all arrangements and regulations which might interfere with normal trade and commerce after the peace, by the abrogation of the treaties concerned.

Establishment of freedom of the seas.

General Ludendorff devoted considerable space to his conflict with the Civil Government. His chief accusation is that it was insufficiently "national." It failed to work out a strong and consistent peace policy. It expressed itself clumsily, and laid itself open to attacks of clever enemy propaganda. The author complains of the difficulty of persuading the Government to adopt the army command's demand for the better organization of Germany's man power. When the Government was pressed to this course, it presented a changeling. Manifest injustices appeared in the bill laid before the Reichstag. To Ludendorff's mind a glaring instance among these was that troops withdrawn after heavy battles saw in the military stations the new auxiliary helpers, male and female, receiving for peaceful labor much higher pay than that of the soldier.

THE SUBMARINE CAMPAIGN

Coming to the unrestricted submarine campaign, both Hindenburg and Ludendorff were somewhat slow to assent, not so much on principle as on questions of policy. Ludendorff was for waiting until the end of the Rumanian campaign in order to bring troops from the east; then he thought it advisable to defer action until the peace proposals terminated. Its effect on America was considered.

The General continues:

The Government * * * thought it very probable the United States would join in the war against us. The Supreme Army Command had to take into account, in dealing with the military situation, the views thus expressed in responsible quarters. It would involve an addition to the armed forces of the Entente of five or six divisions in the first year after America entered the war, and later on, if the submarine war did not have a decisive effect, a serious, indeed, a vital, increase in the strength of the enemy. It could not be doubted that America, if she came into the war, would arm herself in the same way that England had done, and that the Entente would lead the United States from one energetic step to another. I had, however, no serious fear as to any increased output of munitions in the States, as they were already working with all their might for the Entente.

General Ludendorff goes on to quote the Chief of the Naval Staff, a friend of the Chancellor and a warm partisan of unrestricted submarine war—presumably Admiral von Tirpitz—as being confident that the campaign would produce decisive results within six months, that in the loss of freight space and the reduction of overseas imports England would be compelled to abandon the war. It would also make it impossible for America to transport large forces overseas. While Ludendorff was doubtful of these promises, being mindful of the American Navy, he finally arrived at the conclusion that, given twelve months of unrestricted submarine warfare, a decisive result would be reached before America could throw formidable armies into the conflict. The actual decision was made on Jan. 9, 1917, but Ludendorff adds that had a hint of the forthcoming Russian collapse reached the High Command at that moment it would "have altered the whole situation, and would have had the greatest weight in the formation of our opinions."

It will be recalled that at this period Ludendorff was freely spoken of in the Entente press as the dictator of Germany. From his own narrative it appears the position was within his grasp. At the crisis reached with the resignation of Bethmann Hollweg in July, 1917, the "Dictatorship of Berlin" was offered or proposed to him. After much anxious consideration he refused it. In the Spring of that year had come the Russian revolution and the break with the United States. Ludendorff enters into the probable effect of these events at length. In the meantime he was occupied in shortening his line in accordance with his new plan of defensive warfare. Hence the construction of the Hindenburg and Siegfried lines, and the devastation of the vacated Somme districts, which he seeks to explain.

THE LAST GERMAN DRIVE

The motives which prompted him to decide on the last and greatest battle of the war may be summed up in a now-or-never chance. He regarded the military situation as more auspicious for Germany than he had ever anticipated. True, the submarine war had not produced the results forecast by the Naval Staff, and American formations had to be reckoned on as arriving in the Spring of 1918; but, at the beginning of that year, due to the Russian collapse, Germany was numerically in greater strength than she had ever been relative to that of the Entente. As the year drew beyond mid-summer this advantage would decrease with the pouring in of American legions.

In Ludendorff's reckoning this was an incontestable argument for a great Spring offensive, though there were many other contributing factors. Of these he enumerates the following:

The Quadruple Alliance was only held together by the hope of a German victory.

In Germany the national spirit appeared to be better than with our allies; nevertheless, it had sunk very low. I must admit I formed too favorable an estimate of our energy.

The army had come victoriously through 1917, but it had become apparent that the holding of the west front purely by a defensive could no longer be counted on, in view of the enormous quantity of material of all kinds which the Entente had now at their disposal.

The troops no longer displayed their old stubbornness in defense, they thought with horror of fresh defensive battles; they longed for the war of movement. Skulkers were already numerous.

In defense the army was bound gradually to succumb to the ever-increasing hostile superiority in men and material. This feeling was shared by everybody.

All that had gone before was merely a means to the one end of creating a situation that would make it a feasible operation. Until now the situation had not arisen.

While the final decision rested with Ludendorff, opposition developed which postponed it. "The American danger rendered it desirable to strike as early as possible." Ludendorff's impatience grew, until on Jan. 23, 1918, he practically forced a settlement.

PREPARING FOR THE BLOW

Ludendorff enters into the preparations for his great offensive. This part provides an interesting illumination of its many phases, of especial value to the military student. It comes with somewhat of a surprise to read a criticism of the use of mass attacks, a method previously in high favor with the German command, and Ludendorff's profession of faith in extended order "to be grounded afresh" in his army. "On the attack," he writes, "just as had been the case during the defensive, the main thing was to loosen formations and sharpen up the shooting group tactics of the infantry." Of the light machine gun he had formed a very favorable opinion, but was not much impressed with the value of tanks. Nerve discipline and fearlessness were the best weapons against the tanks. He gives several instances of how readily they were put out of action at close range. "It was only as discipline declined and the fighting strength of our infantry weakened that the tank in mass formation and in combination with artificial fog secured a disastrous influence upon the course of events in the field."

Turning to his artillery, Ludendorff's plan included "twenty or thirty batteries, or about 100 guns, to every 1,000 yards of the front of attack. These were figures such as no man had thought possible, still less had there ever been any idea of the quantities of ammunition these guns discharged against the enemy. These were indeed massed attacks." In the discussions relative to the area of attack, the centre at St. Quentin was finally chosen. At that point the enemy line was found to be weakest. The plan was to drive in between the French and British Armies, and crowd the British Army back to the sea. This was the stupendous task undertaken by First Quartermaster General Ludendorff. He marshaled his armies as follows:

6th Army, Armentières.

17th Army, (von Below,) Arras.

2d Army, Moeuvres to Omignon Brook.

18th Army, (von Hutier,) St. Quentin.

7th Army, La Fère.

THE RESULTS DISAPPOINTING

He frankly confesses that the battle, beginning on March 21 and continuing until April 4, was a disappointment. He states that in the failure of the 17th Army to keep in touch with the onswEEPing barrage lay the key to the whole situation. Also, in fighting in too close formation it lost heavily on the 22d, and by the 25th was exhausted. The 2d and 18th Armies did better, but failed to pass beyond Albert. Ludendorff holds that the battle was a brilliant feat "in accomplishing what the English and French had not succeeded in doing," but adds, "strategically we had not achieved what the events of the 23d, 24th, and 25th had encouraged us to hope for," especially the capture of Amiens. He expresses the belief that the German failure was due to the fact that the men were still fighting in too close formation and were not in all cases under the firm control of their officers. They were checked by finding provisions, and valuable time was thus lost. He regarded the strategical situation as now by no means favorable. In this battle Ludendorff lost his youngest son, later identifying the grave by the English inscription, "Here rest two German flying officers." He adds feelingly, "The war has spared me nothing."

FACING AMERICAN TROOPS

The offensive of the Lys Valley was even more disappointing to Ludendorff. Again the 17th Army, "which fought under an unlucky star," failed in its attacks. At this period he refers to the American troops. He observes: "The individual American soldier fought well, though our success had been easy." He adds that by June 20 sufficient American divisions had landed in France to equalize the German superiority of March. That was decisive. At the same time a mental "disease" infecting the German people was transmitted to the army. Disintegration was one of its manifest symptoms. "Time and again," he writes, "I communicated my anxieties to the gentlemen who, together with me, were appointed to effect a cure and to ascertain the origin of the disease. I did not find a ready hearing. The German people, itself, not altogether blameless in the matter, is now paying for this with its life."

The Entente offensive which now commenced is somewhat ramblingly treated by Ludendorff. He wanders from the field of action to dwell upon subjects remote from the last scene of the great military drama. The defeat of the Bulgarian Army in the east and the events of Aug. 8 on the west front, however, stand out in his narrative as leaving Germany without a shadow of hope to continue the conflict. He writes that Aug. 8 was "the black day of the German Army in this war." He graphically describes the breach made in the German line between the Somme and the Luce, resulting in an "uncommonly serious situation." It grew daily more so in the face of German losses, diminishing reserves, and demoralization sweeping through the German Army. Of the latter he instances a division going up gallantly to the attack and being assailed with German shouts of "Blacklegs!" and "War-prolongers!" He thus concludes:

Everything that I had apprehended and against which I had uttered such countless warnings had come to pass at a single spot. Our fighting weapon was no longer full weight. * * * Aug. 8 marked the decline of our fighting power, and the man power situation being what it was, it robbed me of the hope of discovering some strategic expedient that might once more stabilize the position in our favor. * * * The war would have to be ended.

Defeat of the German Army Ludendorff does not concede, but rather a stern chastening by Providence of those he holds guilty for the degeneration of German morale.

AMONG THE NATIONS

Survey of Important Events and Developments in Both Hemispheres

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 18, 1919]

THE BALKANS

THE publication of the Bulgarian treaty of peace, including the taking away of a part of Thrace given to Bulgaria by the Treaty of Bucharest in 1913 and the partial withdrawal of the Rumanian troops from Budapest, somewhat modified the situation in the Balkans, although lack of comprehensive communication from the States concerning their policies since these events has made it impossible to say to what extent.

BULGARIA.—The day after receiving the treaty, General Theodoroff and the Bulgar delegates departed from Paris for Sofia. This was on Sept. 20. The text of the document was published in the press of Sofia in the first week in October. On the 8th La Epocha inaugurated a movement, alleged in Vienna to be supported by the Government, to prevent the signing of the treaty and the carrying out of its terms by force of arms, if necessary. The features of the document particularly resented were the demand for the payment of $445,000,000, the loss of Thrace, and the rectification of the western frontier in favor of Greece and Serbia, the cutting of the army to 20,000 men, the surrender of the movable spoils of war, and the exigency of being obliged to deliver 250,000 tons of coal to Serbia.

In the midst of the agitation the intransigent ministry went out of office and M. Stambuliwsky, on Oct. 14, was reported to have succeeded in forming a new one for the express purpose of signing the treaty. M. Kaloff took the portfolio of War, M. Dimitreff that of Interior, and M. Maggiaroff that of Foreign Affairs. All were members of the political faction which did its best to prevent Bulgaria from going over to Germany in the Autumn of 1915.

Bulgarian propaganda instituted for the purpose of confuting the charges of atrocities made against the Bulgars by the Interallied Commission investigating under the auspices of the Peace Conference received renewed impetus. Hitherto this counter propaganda had concerned itself chiefly with denying the charges of the commission, or refuting its evidence, and, by copious extracts from the Rockefeller report of 1913, seeking to show that Bulgarians had also been victims of savage Serbs and Greeks. Its new phase finds expression in four publications, issued from the headquarters of Bulgar propaganda in Switzerland, of a series known as "The Library of the Balkan Peoples." The first is a volume of 216 pages with material arranged after the fashion of the commission's report; in a similar manner it deals with the alleged atrocities of the Serbs, arranging the evidence in a like manner. It copiously cites the documents of the Carnegie Foundation and the stories of newspaper correspondents. Its material is just as horrible. The compiler is M. D. Skopiansky, former editor of the Macedonian Fatherland. The other publications in the series are "A Maligned People," by B. Velianoff, "The Detractors of the Bulgarian People, with Special Reference to Léon Savadjian," by Georges Maritzine, and "Bulgars and Greeks Before Swiss Public Opinion," by J. Ivanoff of the University of Sofia, all issued at Lausanne in French.

GREECE.—The provisions of the Bulgarian Peace Treaty, while they deprived Bulgaria of Thrace, did not assign that territory elsewhere. On Oct. 20 the Peace Conference was still seeking a solution of the problem. Meanwhile, Greek refugees in Thrace addressed an appeal to the American people and press, and a petition to President Wilson was being signed throughout the disputed territory (on Oct. 4 it had 87,380 signatures from the Saloniki region alone) asking him to give his approval to the union of Thrace and Greece. The appeal, after expressing surprise that the American peace delegation should have ignored or violated "the very principles for which President Wilson and the American people stand, viz., the right of self-determination and the condemnation of the old diplomacy whereby countries and populations were disposed of without being consulted," continues:

BULGARIAN TREATY, PART II., SECTION 3.—THRACE.—Bulgaria renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all rights and title over the territories of Thrace which formerly belonged to the Bulgarian Monarchy, and which, being situated outside the new frontiers of Bulgaria, have not at present been assigned to any State. Bulgaria undertakes to accept whatever settlement may be made by the principal allied and associated powers in regard to these territories and the principal allied and associated powers undertake, on the other hand, to insure economic outlets for Bulgaria to the Aegean Sea under the conditions which will be fixed at a later date.

It is a well-known fact that of the population of Bulgarian Thrace and Turkish Thrace the Turks and Greeks together form 85 per cent. and the Bulgarians only 6 per cent., and the latter are nowhere in compact groups. . . . The artificial and unjust solutions proposed by the American delegation will only create immediate trouble and future wars.

Before this appeal reached the United States, however, it had been deprived of its impetus by the terms of the Bulgarian treaty, which, naturally, gave relief to the 90,000 Greek refugees of West Thrace, who had been living for the last five years in Greece, and who began to look forward to a speedy return to their homes, freed henceforth from the incubus of Bulgar rule. So their aspirations took a new form which found expression in the Greek press in terms such as the following:

In the first place the conference must at once take effective measures to secure the peaceful evacuation of Western Thrace by the Bulgars. Besides the Bulgarian troops there were some thirty Comitadjis or irregulars, armed by the Government and officered by regulars, scattered over the country. In the second place, an immediate settlement of the political status of Thrace was urgently demand. To send an allied commission there would, it was said, be like putting the cart before the horse, because there were in Greece alone nearly 200,000 Greek Thracians from Bulgarian and Turkish Thrace, who had been driven mercilessly from their homes and property in 1913, 1914, and 1915, and who had since been living in Greece at the expense of the Government. Thousands had also in those years fled to America. What was needed, therefore, according to the Hellenic press, was a large allied repatriation commission to reinstate these exiles in their homes and lands and expel therefrom the Bulgarian and Turkish squatters, who had since taken possession. "Only after these preliminaries have been completed," it was added, "can the question even be discussed as to what portion, if any, of Thrace should be annexed to the proposed International State of Constantinople."

RUMANIA.—The evacuation of Budapest was begun in the third week of September and then discontinued on the discovery of an alleged plot on the part of Premier Stephan Friedrich to restore King Charles, and the subsequent publication of the Bulgarian Peace Treaty forecasting the probable surrender to Bulgaria of the Bulgar portion of Dobrudja. The effect of these developments revealed in Rumania a national spirit satisfied with work well done and a consciousness of self-reliance as to the future. The people, therefore, to judge from the unified opinion of the press, awaited the terms of the Hungarian Treaty with no misgivings. This treaty, which would, it was expected, settle the northwestern frontier, had long ago been drafted by the Paris Conference and was waiting for some representative of a responsible Government at Budapest to come and get it.

On the receipt of what Bucharest considered an ultimatum from the Conference, the troops, it was said, simply began the evacuation of the dual city on the Danube without leaving any constituted, responsible authorities in charge.

"Let the Conference attend to that," was the opinion of the Bucharest press. "We ousted Bela Kun, for which we received small thanks. But let us advise the Conference to lift the blockade from Hungary, otherwise the country of the Magyars is doomed."

The whole tenor of opinion was neither that of resignation nor of defiance, but of unbounded faith in people capable of great social and political idealism, and in the country's resources, which were described, as far as food and clothing were concerned, as being self-sustaining. It was admitted, however, that a foreign combination bent on preventing Rumania from reaching her rightful destiny as the pre-eminent State in the Balkans might debase her currency and, for a time, arrest her industrial development by preventing her from receiving the necessary tools and machinery on which her immediate reconstruction depended.

The resignation of Prince Carol as heir to the throne was accepted by the King at a council of Ministers.

Prince Nicholas, whose position as hereditary Prince was recognized, is the second son of King Ferdinand, and was 16 years old on Aug. 18. When his mother, Queen Mary, visited France and England last Spring, she placed him at Eton. Accounts received in Budapest represented him as a boarder at Herbert Brinton's house and as entering with great spirit into the sports of the famous school among the pupils of which he was a great favorite. It was reported from Bucharest that orders had been issued in Bessarabia for the male population of military age to be prepared to accept conscription in the Rumanian Army. Bessarabia was a Russian province, lying to the northeast of Rumania, from which it was separated by the Danube and the Pruth. Its area is 18,000 square miles. It has a population of 2,000,000, half of whom are Rumanians and the other half Russians, various Slavs, Jews, (190,000,) Tartars, gypsies, Greeks, Armenians, and Germans. The Rumanian troops were authorized by the Central Powers in January, 1918, to enter Bessarabia, ostensibly for the purpose of restoring order. They remained there after the collapse of the Central Powers on account of the danger of Bolshevism reported at the Paris Conference. On Sept. 23, Bessarabian delegates at Paris transmitted a memorandum to President Wilson protesting that Rumania had established a complete civil service in Bessarabia.

SERBIA.—The Davidovitch Government, which came in on Aug. 16, and registered its policy on the 23d, went out of office in the first week in October. Then the predecessors of M. Davidovitch, Stoyan Protitch, who had resigned because of his inability to get along with his colleagues, was asked by the Prince Regent to return, but meeting with less than the requisite support he gave way to M. Trikovitch, who tried in his turn to form a radical Government, but was equally unsuccessful. Failing to conciliate the Serb and Croat elements he, on Oct. 7, gave way to M. Pavlovitch, who, it was reported from Belgrade, could rely upon the full support of the Prince Regent and a majority of the Provisional Assembly. The Government of M. Davidovitch, it will be recalled, consisted of thirteen Democrats, mostly Serbs, and three Socialists, all Croats. In his letter to the Prince Regent M. Davidovitch told why it resigned:

The Government and our delegation have in vain made every endeavor to obtain the suppression, or at least the mitigation, of the stipulations contained in the treaty of peace with Austria and in the political treaty relating to the protection of minorities. These stipulations constitute an infringement of the sovereignty of our State and our nation, and show disregard for our peaceful development in the future. The Government neither can nor will accept on behalf of the country stipulations with restrictions on our sovereignty, and, taking into account the state of feeling in the nation, it therefore tenders its resignation to your Royal Highness.

Behind the intransigence of the situation, according to advices from Belgrade, was a duel for supremacy between the veteran M. Protitch, leader of the Old Serbian Radical Party of M. Pashitch, and M. Pribitchevitch, the founder and leader of the Democratic Union, whose lieutenant is M. Davidovitch. The Old Radicals represent a purely Serbian constituency, but are accused by the Democrats of trifling with the sacred ideal of national union between the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, and even of regarding it as a temporary expedient to be set aside in favor of a Greater Serbia when the international question becomes settled. The Old Radicals hotly deny this, but declare that the occasion calls for deliberation, both nationally and internationally.

On the other hand, the Democratic Party, otherwise known as the Serbo-Croat Union, principally made up of the opposition in the old Skupshtina, aspires to carry out vast schemes of social reform which shall provide national bonds for all Yugoslavia in the shortest possible time. Its advance tendencies were indicated when it favored three Socialists, out of eleven members of the Provisional Assembly, with important portfolios in the late Davidovitch Government, and when six of its Croatian members, led by M. Medacovitch, formerly President of the Croatian Diet, voted against their own party on the motion to accept the Davidovitch program. On the question of agrarian reform the Democrats are for the most drastic measures; the Old Radicals would proceed with caution and moderation, which policy particularly appeals to the big Croatian and Bosnian land owners.

The balance of power, until the election of the promised Constituent Assembly, is held in the Provisional Assembly by the Catholic Clerical Party of nineteen Slovenes led by M. Koroshetz, and the National Club, or Party of the Right, with twenty-nine Croats under M. Lazinya, which stands for the economic autonomy of Croatia within the kingdom.

BELGIUM, HOLLAND, LUXEMBURG.

The Belgian-Dutch dispute reached an acute stage, but ended on Oct. 14 by the Brussels press declaring and The Hague press intimating that an alliance was about to be formed by which, for concessions ranging anywhere, it was surmised, from the surrender of a Dutch province to the freedom of the Scheldt and the Ghent-Terneuzen Canal, Belgium would give Holland military guarantees.

The trouble began as follows: The Belgian delegate, M. Segers, had just finished his plea for freedom to the sea before the Dutch-Belgian Commission in Paris, and had ended with the words, "It is, therefore, through the apprehension that Germany may eventually be able to exercise pressure on Holland that we demand bolts for our door," when the Dutch press printed a secret note, issued from the Belgian Foreign Office on May 29, from which the following is a quotation:

At this moment all Belgian agents in Dutch Limburg must to the limit of their capacity assist in the preparation of the return of this province to the mother country.

Thereupon the Dutch Government sent a formal letter of protest to the Belgian Government, and excitement ran high in each country, even after it was pointed out that the note was issued before the Paris Conference had put aside the question of any change of sovereignty in Dutch Limburg, and no longer represented the policy of the Belgian Government. In his note of protest the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs said:

The Government of her Majesty the Queen has instructed me to inform you [the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs] of the exceedingly painful impression made upon their minds by the perusal of the original document, from which it appears that the Belgian Government has thought fit to permit itself to organize a political propaganda in Dutch Limburg with the object of severing that province from Holland and to prepare for its annexation to Belgium. * * *

In replying to the Dutch protest the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs, after disposing of the current value of the note, seized the opportunity to set before the public the whole case of Belgium in a manner which was highly praised by diplomats all over the world for its cleverness. He proceeded:

The observations of the Dutch Government and the protest which it formulated can only be explained by fundamental differences in the manner of regarding the situation. The Belgian Government, without ever having raised any formal claims upon any portion of Dutch territory, did not lose sight of the fact that the Supreme Interallied Council, in approving on March 8 the report of the Commission on Belgian Affairs, had proclaimed:

(1) That the treaties of 1839 had been so attacked that their revision was essential in the interest of general peace.

(2) That all the clauses formed a complete whole.

(3) That the territorial and waterways clauses of the treaties were seriously prejudicial to Belgium.

In view of this decision the Belgian Government considered that a solution of the problems thus brought forward could include modifications in the allocation laid down in the treaties of 1839 between Belgium and Holland of territories reunited in 1815 to the Netherlands.

If since then Belgium had consented to seek by means of an international commission a solution which would not admit of any transference of sovereignty, it was in the firm hope that the procedure adopted on June 4 would not deny Belgium sufficient acceptable guarantees for the security of the free development of her economic relations. Until May 20 no limit had been set to the search for new formulae to replace the articles of the treaties of 1839, the revision of which was necessary.

Therefore, the Dutch Government is wrong in considering that the preoccupation of the Belgian Government to which the official note of April 20 bears witness, is incompatible with the sentiments of friendship and good understanding which exist between the two countries. The very terms of the note show that respect for established authority was the dominant principle of the instructions contained therein. It was in no way a question of striking a secret blow at the rights of Holland, which in Limburg arise from the treaties now submitted to revision. It was a question in particular of creating a reaction within permissible limits against the effects of German propaganda, hostile to Belgian interests, the development of which had been reported to us.

Queen Wilhelmina made a veiled reference to the matter in her speech from the throne on Sept. 16, and she said nothing in favor of the League of Nations, merely remarking that the question would in due time be submitted to the States General. Meanwhile the controversy, omitting of course the scandal over Limburg, had been submitted to the experts appointed by the joint commission. They delivered their report on Oct. 6. The report was based upon the following claims of Belgium, offset by a definite refusal of Holland to grant them, save in a few concessions made in regard to the navigation of the Ghent-Terneuzen and Muse Canals.

Economic claims: (1) The right to control the Dutch waterway (the Scheldt) and to execute all works of repair and improvement considered necessary for the prosperity of Antwerp; (2) the cession of the Ghent-Terneuzen canal and railway, with the execution thereon of any work tending to improve the prosperity of Ghent; (3) the suppression of the commercial barrier created by the Maestricht enclave, giving Belgium the control of the communications by water between Antwerp and Liège; (4) the right to build through Dutch Limburg the Rhine-Meuse canal referred to in the Peace Treaty.

Military provisions: (1) A military arrangement with Holland for the common defense of the line of the Meuse, (Limburg); (2) the free use of the Scheldt in time of peace or war by Belgium and her allies for the relief of the country attacked.

In spite of the French and British support of the military provisions, the report of the experts, while acknowledging that it was to the interest of Belgium to use the Scheldt in wartime, pointed out that it was impossible to reconcile this interest with Dutch neutrality; the same argument was used in regard to the Meuse line. Finally the report submitted this formula for Belgian and Dutch agreement:

(1) An arrangement on economic questions where agreement is possible; (2) a Dutch declaration considering the violation of Dutch neutrality late in October, 1918, when German soldiers retreating from Belgium crossed Dutch territory; (3) a declaration in which Holland undertakes to ask for immediate admission to the League of Nations.

As a vehicle through which Belgian loans might be placed in the United States, and as an assistance to the Belgian Treasury in other matters, Premier Delacroix announced on Sept. 16 an agreement with J. P. Morgan & Co. and the Guaranty Trust Company of New York.

According to a report made to the Department of Commerce at Washington by Harry T. Collins, United States Trade Commissioner at Brussels, Belgian railroads were working with 60 per cent. of pre-war efficiency; but the figures he gave should not indicate equivalent traffic of either passenger or freight, as fares have increased from 40 to 50 per cent. and freight rates 40 per cent.

In anticipation of the Peace Treaty's going into effect, Holland hastened all transactions with Germany, the Batavia Petroleum Company exporting large quantities of oil fuel to Germany and receiving machinery. In the first week of October Dr. Erzberger, the German Minister of Finance, announced that Holland had made Germany a credit of 1,200,000,000 marks; advices from The Hague on Oct. 7 were that a Dutch forced loan of 450,000,000 guilders, or $180,000,000, might be expected soon.

The long-awaited Luxemburg plebiscite, in which women also had a vote, took place on Sept. 28. It resulted in a majority, in proportion of 3 to 1, in favor of the two principal questions: The retention of Grand Duchess Charlotte as ruler and the institution of an economic alliance with France instead of Belgium. Alternatives of the first were the selection of another ruler of the same family as Charlotte, substitution of another dynasty, or the establishment of a republic.

FRANCE

M. Clemenceau, assisted by his able lieutenants inside and outside the Ministry, continued his campaign for the ratification of the German Peace Treaty. He was particularly eloquent in the Chamber on Sept. 25, when, at the end of a long speech advocating the solidarity of the United States and associated nations in peace as it had been in war, he suddenly ended with:

After the elections I will retire with the great reward that comes from the satisfaction of having done one's duty and with the friendship of my dear pollux, of whom I shall think always.

The Chamber, which had begun its debate on the document on Aug. 26, ratified it on Oct. 2 by a vote of 372 to 53, 73 members abstaining from voting, and gave a unanimous vote for the American and British military agreements. Those abstaining from voting were made up principally of Socialists and Nationalists, the former deeming the treaty "imperialistic," and the latter because the Rhine boundary had not been secured.

On Oct. 7 Léon Bourgeois, Chairman of the Peace Commission of the Senate, and who was subsequently to be appointed the first Councilor to the League of Nations, introduced the documents in the Senate, which ratified the treaty by the vote of 217 on Oct. 11, only one Senator, M. Delahaye, abstaining from voting, and even he voted for the military agreements, making the vote a unanimous 218. On Oct. 13 President Poincaré attached his signature to the documents, thereby promulgating them.

The effect was instantaneous in all departments of State. Decrees were published putting interior affairs on a peace basis, ending the state of siege, lifting the censorship, transferring the jurisdiction of the police from the army to the prefectures, and ordering general demobilization.

Although the votes of both Chamber and Senate gave M. Clemenceau an approbation he had never before received, there were, besides, two special votes of confidence received from the Chamber—one during the debate on Sept. 30, in which he was sustained by 262 to 188, and one on Oct. 15, after the ratification, 324 to 132.

The latter was when the Chamber adopted the Government's policy on the chronological order of the elections, placing the elections for the Chamber first, on Nov. 16, to be followed respectively by the Senatorial and the municipal. The "Tiger" thus emerged victoriously from one of the most bitter and best organized assaults which a Government of the Third Republic has ever faced.

The strongest party in the war and emerging from it as such was the Radical Socialist, whose character as being neither radical nor socialist, but rational, was recently described in these columns. The Unified Socialists, who first tended toward Germany and defeatism, and then toward Bolshevism, and were never able to summon more than thirty votes, lost two prominent members, Jean Erlich of the Notre Dame constituency of Paris, and M. Nectoux, one of the Deputies for the Seine. M. Erlich's letter of resignation explained the defection of both. After declaring that he was still a Socialist, he accused his party of being pure Bolshevik, and then proceeded:

You will perhaps now understand my painful and indignant astonishment at finding on my return to France the Unified Socialist press plainly treating the Russian Bolsheviks as comrades and friends. In economic and social matters Bolshevism has resulted in a tremendous catastrophe and general ruin. The so-called methods of Bolshevik dictatorship leave far in the background the worst horrors of the Inquisition and Czarism.

* * * I refuse to follow it on this road. As a Socialist and a democrat I will have nothing to do with any dictatorship.
* * * I am convinced, moreover, that all Socialists who have done their duty during the war will agree with me, and that they will not permit the sabotage of a victory which has been won at the cost of so great sacrifice.

The coming election, which will be under the new law already described in CURRENT HISTORY, showed no signs in the political campaign of old Royalist propaganda, or of anti-Clerical, or, among the Clericals, of a return to the concordat propaganda. The incorporation of Alsace-Lorraine will add twenty-eight Deputies to the 602, and four Senators to the 300.

The termination of the military control of the railways marked the inauguration of an interesting experiment on Oct. 15—the collaboration of delegates from all the different classes of railway workers with heads of departments and the Board of Directors in the management of the roads.

In accordance with a bill passed in August providing for the extension of the commercial attaché service, the Minister of Commerce began to appoint commercial agents to the principal countries. These agents were placed under the control of the diplomatic representative and in a position similar to that occupied by military and naval attachés, while over them were the commercial attachés proper, of whom there were only four, but whose number will be increased as the occasion demands.

ITALY

While the crowds in the streets were expressing their enthusiasm over the d'Annunzio coup at Fiume, the King and Signor Nitti, President of the Council and Minister of the Interior, were doing their best to maintain the proper relations between the Consulta and the Chancelleries of London, Paris, and Washington, and to prevent the populace, army, and political parties from committing some overt act which might prejudice those relations, if it did not, indeed, produce a revolution.

After Signor Tittoni, Foreign Minister and head of the Italian Peace Delegation, had outlined his policy in the Chamber of Deputies on the night of Sept. 27, and the Chamber in closing its session had given the Government a vote of confidence amounting to 208 to 140, the Minister, in communication with the associated Chancelleries, began to seek for a formula which should end the Fiume impasse. A measure which had greatly tended toward strengthening the vote of the Government was the calling of the Crown Council by the King on Sept. 25 at the Quirinal Palace—an extraordinary procedure which had not been resorted to since the days of the Resorgimento. The council consisted of the national, civil, political, and military leaders and ex-Premiers, supposed to represent every ramification of the body politic.

Then, with Parliament inoperative until the elections of Nov. 16 should provide a new Chamber to meet in December, and with a policy supposed to be based upon the advice received from the Crown Council, the Nitti Government began operations on its own responsibility, and on Oct. 6, as an expression of good-will toward the associated Chancelleries and the Peace Conference, the King issued a decree approving the German and Austrian treaties, thus practically ratifying those documents and leaving to the new Parliament the sole duty of acting on the decree. This decree, which per se re-established peace between Italy and the Teutons, contained two articles, the first authorizing the Government to execute the treaties fully and the second requiring that the decree be presented to Parliament for conversion into law. Only once has Parliament declined to ratify such a decree. That was in 1860, when the Chamber rejected the treaty of Villafranca, which had been negotiated by France and Austria behind the back of Cavour.

The foregoing measures restored the tranquillity of the crowds in the principal cities, and the Deputies, almost in a body, left Rome to consult the local Prefects and to prepare their constituencies for the coming election. In this election for the first time an organized Catholic party will take part, voting for Catholic candidates. The decree of Pius IX. in 1870, strictly enforced by his successor, Leo XIII., prohibiting Catholics from being either electors or the elected, was modified under Pius X. so that Catholics were allowed to vote for non-Catholic candidates who pledged themselves to refrain from legislation condemned by the Vatican. Last January Pope Benedict XV. removed the entire inhibition, and a political party was formed under the name of the Partito Popolare Italiani, or the Italian Popular Party.

Like the Socialist Party, this new organization depends upon recruits from the masses—the former among the workers of the towns and the latter among the peasants. Each of these parties has a well-defined program, with common aspirations on certain points which Signor Nitti has attempted to consolidate. Aside from these two parties, which hold the balance of suffrage, if not of legislation, there are the factions of the various political leaders calling themselves Democrats, Liberals, Conservatives, or Radicals, but differing in the main as they support or oppose the present Government. Then there is the Republican Party, which, like the Socialists and the Catholics, also has a well-defined national program. It preserves the traditions of Garibaldi, Mazzini, and Minghetti, and its best known member is the former Minister Barzilai. In the recently dissolved Chamber, however, it had only sixteen members out of a total of 513.

Owing to the political crisis few comprehensive measures were taken to mitigate the economic. A scheme for a forced loan touching everybody who possessed capital exceeding $4,000 calculated at par was prepared by a special commission of financiers, bankers, and Senators, but its execution was indefinitely postponed on account of opposition, not from the people but from certain big financial interests. The nation's war debt was officially announced to be $20,000,000,000, which was over 200 times the pre-war public debt.

Both grain and coal were being sold by the Government at below their real cost. The slow recovery of Italian industries for export, partly due to labor troubles and partly to the shutting off of certain foreign markets which had learned to subsist without Italian commodities during the war, kept up the adverse rate of exchange, which continued to show a depreciation of 93 per cent. in the case of the dollar as compared with the rates before the war, and 60 per cent. in the case of the pound sterling. The price of bread rose from 75 to 85 centimes per kilo.

On the other hand, the bill passed in August for the immediate electrification of the railways throughout Italy was rapidly put into execution. The conversion of Italy's water energy—harnessing the white horse, as it is called—will give the country over 5,000,000 electrical horse power, an energy equal to working all the railways and all the industries of the peninsula.

The attempt to attract foreign capital was continued by the principal banking companies extending their institutions to North and South America. The Banca Italiana Disconto established the Banca Italo Caucasica Disconto with a capital of 40,000,000 lire with its main office in Rome and projected agencies for the Near East.

Indeed, Italy began to look toward the East more than toward the West—to secure the coal output of the Heraclea region in Asia Minor, which formerly netted 1,150,000 tons annually to the German concessionaires, and the oil from the Caucasus.

On Oct. 10 and 13 a rising of peasants was reported in Rome from Caltanissetta, the central province of Sicily. Four thousand people were involved and thirty deaths were recorded before the troops managed to secure order. The uprising was an attempt to gain possession of the historic sulphur mines near Riesi and was otherwise due to the objection of the populace to having their district policed by the military from the Italian peninsula.

LATIN AMERICA

The Brazilian Director of Immigration has sent to the representatives of those Governments likely to be most affected a well-printed copy of the immigration laws now in operation. Transportation within the country is offered free to points of destination; also complete provision for the immigrant for a limited period after his or her arrival there. According to the report made on the subject by J. E. Philippi, the American Commercial Attaché at Rio de Janeiro, issued at Washington Oct. 16:

The amount of land assigned to each settler is 25 hectares (about 62 acres), and is sold at the price of 8 to 30 milreis per hectare. There are farms with houses and without houses, these being sold for the cost of improvements. The Immigration Service will provide temporary quarters for those settlers who wish to erect a dwelling for their own account. Amortization on the debt of the colony must be begun at the end of the third year, and in annual payments thereafter for a period of from five to eight years. After the land is paid for, the legal title will be transferred to the immigrant. The Government will refund to the immigrants located in the Federal colonies the amount of their passage from the country of emigration to Brazil, by crediting it to their account.

On the same day the report was issued 406 German veterans arrived at Rio on board the Dutch liner Hollandia, the majority of them, however, bound for Argentina. On Sept. 23 formal negotiations were opened by Germany for a loan of $100,000,000 from Argentina in order to facilitate, it was said, the purchase of raw materials from Argentina. To encourage German emigration to Paraguay the Land and Colonial Office, on Oct. 8, offered eleven acres each to agricultural immigrants.

President Augusto Leguia was proclaimed Constitutional President at Lima, Peru, on Oct. 12 for a period of five years. His inauguration was under the new Constitution, already described in these columns.

In the third week in September a Cabinet crisis was caused in Chile by a Radical convention at Concepcion demanding that members of its party withdraw from the coalition. So, on Sept 23, a new Ministry was formed, whose personnel showed it to be made up of members of the Liberal Party reunited with Liberal Democrats and Nationalists. The slate is as follows:

Minister of the Interior—ENRIQUE BERMUDEZ, Minister of War in the recent Cabinet.

Minister of Foreign Affairs—LUIS BARROS-BORGOVO.

Minister of Finance—JULES PHILIPPI.

Minister of Justice—JULES PRADO-AMOR.

Minister of War—ANIBAL RODRIGUEZ, a former holder of this portfolio.

Minister of Industries—MALQUIAS CONCHA, who had previously occupied this post and was Minister of Public Works and Railways in the recent Ministry.

SCANDINAVIA

The great war interrupted the international conference at Copenhagen which was to have decided the national status of the Spitzbergen archipelago in the Arctic Ocean north of Scandinavia. Over these islands, which had been discovered by the Dutch navigator Barents in 1596 and claimed by the British on account of Hudson's subsequent visits, British sovereignty practically ceased in 1670. During the war it was revived, and since the armistice period the London press has been extensively advertising the resources of the islands said to be under the jurisdiction of British companies. On Sept. 25 the Spitzbergen Commission handed in a report, which was approved by the Council of Five at Paris, giving the sovereignty to Norway.

On Oct. 10 the German authorities began the evacuation of the first and second zones in Schleswig, in accordance with the Peace Treaty conditions, and the International Commission began to prepare arrangements for the plebiscitum to decide whether the regions involved shall remain German or become Danish. The treaty, it will be recalled, divided the neck of land between Denmark and Holstein into three zones, with the intention that each zone, the pure Danish, the mixed, and the German-speaking, should decide its own nationality. At the request of Denmark it was ultimately decided that no plebiscitum should be held in the third or German zone.

TURKEY AND THE NEAR EAST

The situation in Asiatic Turkey was measurably complicated for the Peace Conference by the following events: The Turkish National movement under Mustapha Kemal, resulting in the advance of the Nationalist troops to within fifty-seven miles of Constantinople and the deflection to their side of the Persian Province of Azerbaidjan; the landing of more Greek and Italian troops at, respectively, Smyrna and Adalia, and finally, in the first week in October, the fall of the pro-Entente Ministry of Damad Ferid Pasha, and the inauguration of what turned out to be a Nationalist Cabinet under the Grand Vizier, General Ali Riza Pasha, which at once began to work to hold elections for a new Parliament based on the general program of maintaining the integrity of the Empire in both Europe and Asia. The Cabinet, which contained several names proscribed by the Interallied Commission, was as follows:

Minister of Foreign Affairs—MUSTAPHA RECHID PASHA.

Minister of War—DJEMAL PASHA.

Minister of the Interior—DAMAD SHERIF PASHA.

Minister of Justice—MUSTAPHA BEY.

Minister of Public Works—HAMED ABOUK PASHA.

Minister of Agriculture—HADI PASHA.

Minister of Instruction—SAID BEY.

Colonel Haskell, High Commissioner in Armenia, on his arrival at Privau, made the following statement to the Armenian Parliament, later to be elaborated by his full report to the Peace Conference:

The most important question at the present time is to decide upon the nature of the support which the Allies can offer to the Armenian people, who have suffered so terribly during the war. Military support is only for the defense of the frontiers of Armenia. These forces will in every case protect the frontiers as they are at present fixed.

After careful study of the present position, I have arrived at the conclusion that military assistance is indispensable for Armenia, and that the British troops should not evacuate Transcaucasia until they are relieved by other allied forces.

It is proved that Azerbaidjan has violated the frontiers which were assigned to it by the British Government.

This compels me to return immediately to Tiflis and to Baku to warn the Government of Azerbaidjan that if prompt measures are not taken to remedy this state of things, and if they do not soon conclude the military operations they have begun, grave consequences will ensue. If my communications are not valued at their real importance at Paris, I shall return there in person to obtain from the Peace Conference the dispatch of speedy help for Armenia.

As regards frontiers, the occupation of a few square kilometers by one State or another cannot have any decisive importance. At the present time the Armenian people must accept the co-operation which will be offered them, leaving the rest to the future, for once fundamental questions have been decided secondary matters will settle themselves.

On Sept. 17 an agreement was reached by Messrs. Lloyd George and Clemenceau in Paris which definitely disposed of the Syrian problem. The documents presented on the British side tended to establish the fact that there was no contradiction between the promises made by the British Government to the Sheereef of Mecca and the Anglo-French Agreement of 1916, in spite of the charges of the popular press of Paris. [The general lines of the new Anglo-French agreement are given on pages 239-241.]

THE UNITED KINGDOM

On Sept. 27 the great strike of the United Kingdom's railway employees began, directly involving over 600,000 workers and blocking traffic all over the island. Emergency measures carefully prepared in wartime were put in force by the Government in order to keep food moving to the centres of population. The strike lasted until Oct. 6, when the National Union of Railwaymen agreed to call it off, and the Government consented to a renewal of the negotiations, the continuance of the existing wage scale for another year instead of six months, as previously offered, and the establishment of a minimum wage of 51 shillings ($12.75) while the cost of living is 110 per cent. above the pre-war level. The following were the terms as officially stated:

First—Work shall be resumed immediately.

Second—Negotiations will be resumed on the understanding that they shall be completed before the end of the year.

Third—Wages will be stabilized at the present level until Sept. 30, 1920, and at any time after Aug. 1 they may be resumed in the light of circumstances then existing.

Fourth—No adult railwayman in Great Britain shall receive less than 51 shillings ($12.75) per week while the cost of living is 110 per cent. above pre-war level.

Fifth—The Railway Union agree that their men will work harmoniously with the men who returned to work or who remained at work during the strike. Nor shall there be any victimization of strikers.

Sixth—Arrears of wages will be paid on resumption of work.

The ultimatum of the Executive Committee of the N. U. R. was delivered on the very day that the powers of the Board of Trade over the railways were being transferred to the new Minister of Transportation. The last act of the board, however, was an attempt to meet the situation by the following offer, which the Minister of Transportation will try to negotiate:

1. The Government offer, as submitted by the Board of Trade, gives to the grades in question as a permanent wage an average advance of 100 per cent. on pre-war wages, even if the cost of living falls to pre-war level.

2. The pre-war wage, with an additional war wage of 33s., will be continued so long as the cost of living is 110 per cent. above pre-war prices.

3. The present wages were fixed at 33s. above pre-war wages in accordance with a sliding scale agreed upon in November last between the Board of Trade and the National Union of Railwaymen at the time when the cost of living was 125 per cent. above pre-war prices.

4. No reduction will take place until the cost of living has been brought down below 110 per cent. above pre-war prices and has remained so for at least three months.

5. No reduction in present wages can take place this year at all, as it was agreed in March that present wages should be stabilized until Dec. 31, and in accordance with the offer in Paragraph 4 any reduction is practically impossible before next April.

6. Should there be a reduction in the cost of living below 100 per cent., in accordance with Paragraph 4, any change in wages will be determined either by using the sliding scale agreed to by the railwaymen in November last, or by such other methods as may be agreed upon by the Government and the Railway Unions after discussion.

Poland's Many Problems

Young Republic's Struggles Against Bolshevism, German Militarism, and Adverse Industrial Conditions

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 15, 1919]

POLAND'S new army continued its successes against the Bolsheviki during September and October.

Authorized by Marshal Foch to occupy the Vilna-Dvinsk railway as far as Dukušty, a place about twenty-five miles south of Dvinsk, the Poles had subsequently advanced to the River Beresina, and, in order to use the Dvina to protect their left flank, had pushed forward almost as far as Dvinsk and occupied the railway some twenty miles beyond Dukušty. This advance brought the Polish troops into conflict with the Lithuanians, who held that the Poles had no right to be on the northern sector of the railway.

The Poles, however, developed undeterred their prearranged campaign against the Bolsheviki. News of the capture by assault of the fortresses of Borysov and Bobruisk, defending the passages of the Beresina, arrived on Sept. 3. The Poles crossed the river and continued their pursuit of the fleeing Bolsheviki until stopped by order of the High Command; then they withdrew behind fortifications on the site of the old trenches erected by Napoleon in 1812. The Polish press, commenting on the motives of this sudden halt, mentioned the occupation of Courland by the army of General von der Goltz and the concentration of Lithuania of the volunteer forces under Prince Lieven. This mysterious army corps was very near the demarkation line between Poland and Lithuania, which passes within ten kilometers of the principal railway line and the City of Vilna.

In the direction of the Dvina, however, the Poles cleared the whole lake region south of Dvinsk (Dunaberg) of Bolshevik bands. Polish official reports of Sept. 16 indicated that heavy fighting was in progress on the Lithuanian front, with Bolshevik reinforcements attacking strongly in the neighborhood of Koplau, east of Dvinsk. Two days later the Poles had driven the Bolsheviki to the northern bank of the Dvina as far as Disna, and had advanced northward approximately 100 miles from Borysov, which is on the east bank of the Beresina, fifty miles northeast of Minsk.

On the eastern front, the Poles had succeeded in cutting railway communication between Kiev and Petrograd, and were making important progress toward the Dnieper, Mohilev, and Orsza. On Sept. 25 the Bolsheviki were abandoning in haste the region surrounding Vitebsk and Mohilev, taking Polish notables residing in these districts away with them as hostages.

HALTING THE POLISH ADVANCE

It was stated in Paris on Sept. 18 that the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference was considering action to urge Poland to halt decisively her invasion of Russian Bolshevik territory. The conference held that Poland's advance, which had penetrated to a depth of 200 miles, had gone far enough for purposes of self-defense, and that the Allies had no disposition to encourage Poland to wage a war of mere conquest of territory; the young republic's main need was for reconstruction, which could not be accomplished while a war of aggression was going on, and the financial aid required for this work could not be obtained until Poland ceased hostilities.

Polish statesmen in Paris, on the other hand, reported that with the approach of Winter Poland's Army of more than half a million men was in bad plight, and it was uncertain if her military problems could be resolved. Polish troops, it was declared, were successfully opposing Russian Bolshevism along an irregular front of more than 400 miles, extending from Dvinsk in the north to a point on the west bank of the Dnieper River, about fifty miles south of Gomel. The forces on this long front were without Winter clothing, and many of them lacked even shoes. Prime Minister Paderewski and other Polish leaders stated that though the Poles had willingly acceded to the request of the Peace Conference to push back the Bolsheviks and protect Europe against their inroads, they were now facing problems of the greatest difficulty. The Bolshevik Government at Moscow was constantly attempting to make peace with the Poles, and the army, in its destitute condition, was much tempted by these overtures, and by the possibility of returning home, especially in view of reported negotiations opened by Esthonia, Letvia, and Lithuania with the Soviet Government.

PADEREWSKI'S STATEMENT

The situation in Poland, especially in relation to Germany, was summed up by M. Paderewski, who appeared before the Supreme Council in Paris on Sept. 5, in an interview in which he said:

The Germans, defeated on the west, have now turned eastward, where they are waging a battle in the hope of achieving a victory they were unable to win on the other front. In Upper Silesia, East Prussia, Lithuania, along the Bolshevik front, near Minsk, along the Ukrainian front, the Polish armies are forced to face armed enemies.

Where these enemies were not Germans, said M. Paderewski, they were aided by Germans, who were pushing Bolshevism forward in every possible way to embarrass Poland. "Our new Government," he continued, "with limited supplies and little clothing for the army, finds the situation desperate." Germany, he intimated, intended to crush Poland, and might succeed, unless the latter country obtained speedy succor. Regarding the situation in Silesia, where the Germans had put down a Polish revolt with an iron hand, and whence vast numbers of Polish refugees had fled across the border, the Polish Premier said:

Until the German treaty is ratified we cannot get the foreign troops necessary to steady the situation. The Poles are eager to rush into Silesia to avenge the wrongs inflicted on our countrymen. It is difficult to restrain them, as they are daily stirred by blood-curdling stories told by refugees of German atrocities. In the Baltic States of Russia the Germans are fomenting disorder and lending the Bolsheviks assistance. On all sides we are forced to face the new war Germany is waging against the allied cause. She is determined to conquer Russia at any cost, and is making every effort to hamper us in our battle against disorder. There is a studied effort to ruin our reputation throughout the world and prevent our acquiring the international standing we merit. We are unable to defend ourselves against all these calumnies; we are too busy fighting the enemy with guns. We hope for a speedy ratification of the treaty and pray for the steady influence of allied troops in the harassed districts.

POLAND'S HOPE IN LEAGUE

On his return to Poland, M. Paderewski, on Sept. 18, issued a statement in which he dwelt upon the desperate nature of the situation with which Poland had to deal and on the necessity of her possessing the strong moral and material support that would be afforded her by the existence of the League of Nations. This statement was as follows:

From a Polish point of view, our one hope of future security as a State lies in the League of Nations. Upon it, and I fear upon it alone, depend the liberty of the Polish people and the successful development of democratic and liberal government in Poland. Standing, as we are, between Germany on one side and Russia on the other, we cannot hope to maintain our integrity during these years, while we build up the strength of our people, unless we have the protection of the League.

Poland at the present moment has 500,000 men under arms. Our people are short of food supplies, short of clothing, short of many of the necessities of life. We are compelled to make every sacrifice to sustain the army, and this, with our population needing its resources for the upbuilding of the nation, in order that we may protect ourselves from encroachment.

Today we are defending 1,500 miles of front against Bolshevik forces, and, in so doing, we stand as the front line in Europe against Bolshevik invasion from the east.

We are endeavoring to maintain this front line and at the same time to achieve an economic stability, to recuperate our people from the effects of repeated invasions of German and Russian armies. The task is a terrible one. The tax upon our strength will be too great unless we can have the assurance that there will be a body in the world to whom we can appeal for aid in the righting of our wrongs.

Poland has set up a democracy under the inspiration of the American people. Had it not been for American intervention in Europe we might possibly have had some semblance of independent Government under an autocratic overrule, but with American intervention and American help we have sought to establish not only the independence of the State, but also the internal liberty of our people, through the difficult road of democracy.

The pressure is upon us on all sides through military action and through Bolshevik propaganda and an intense propaganda from Germany. Unless we have a protective power in the world, under whose strength we can secure an opportunity for peaceful development and the solution of our internal problems, free from distracting and antagonistic influences, I fear for the safety of our democracy. . . .

The great power and the support which it may furnish need not be military, its moral and economic force is all that we ask, and that power is the League of Nations.

ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

The portions of Poland recently recovered from the Bolsheviki were visited by Herbert Hoover and found to be in a state of complete economic demoralization. The population consists in large majority of Ruthenian peasants and large Polish landholders, the peasants cultivating their own lands and in normal times hiring themselves to the great land owners. In addition there is the town population, consisting half of Poles and half of Jews. All alike are now suffering from the paralysis of business. Mr. Hoover said on Aug. 19:

As a result of seven invasions by different armies the country has largely been denuded of buildings. The estates of the larger landowners have been destroyed, and while the peasants are cultivating approximately enough foodstuffs for their own supplies, these regions, which in normal times export large quantities of food, mostly from the large estates, are four-fifths uncultivated.

In normal times the town populations exist by exchanging manufactured goods to the peasants and landowners for food. There has been virtually no import of manufactured goods for years, and the supplies of foodstuffs having vanished, the town populations are left entirely without support or employment. As there have been no manufactured goods to exchange, and as the currency no longer has any purchasing value in goods and the peasants do not care to exchange food-stuffs for it, there has been a total breakdown of the economic cycle.

In addition to the destruction and robbery which accompanied the repeated invasion of rival armies, these areas have been, of course, through a caldron of Bolshevik revolution and the intellectual classes either fled from the country or to a considerable extent were imprisoned. Some were executed. The Ruthenian peasants have been stirred up against the great landowners, which accounts for the destruction of the equipment of the large landed properties. It appears to us that it will require years for this region to recover, for animals must be provided, agricultural implements imported and the whole agricultural production restarted.

In an effort to solve the unemployment problem a contract has been made with France whereby Poland is sending 100,000 men to work in the devastated regions of France. As for the food crisis, the Polish Government, frankly alarmed by the perils of social unrest created by the prolongation of the miners' strike in Upper Silesia, had begun early in September to give more careful attention than ever to the problem, and had taken steps to limit consumption and to put into operation a more effective system of distribution.

Warsaw dispatches of Sept. 19 revealed the organization of a Polish Navy, to become operative with the ratification of the Peace Treaty. This organization was proceeding rapidly at the date mentioned. The fleet was to consist of four armored cruisers and twelve large torpedo boats. It was to have a personnel of 3,500, including 150 officers.

CONDITIONS IN UPPER SILESIA

It was officially announced in Warsaw on Sept. 5 that the Polish Government had decided to issue a "Black Book" dealing with atrocities committed in Upper Silesia by the Germans in suppressing the insurrection of the Polish portion of the population. A considerable staff was examining the facts. There were in hand already more than 1,500 cases of outrage and brutal treatment of Poles by German soldiers. No evidence other than first-hand testimony had been accepted. Much of the data was being supplied by a Polish bureau, which, under the protection of the Allied Commission, had begun activity at Katowitz; much evidence was also being gathered from the thousands of refugees who had crossed the Polish-German frontier. The Germans themselves officially admitted thirty-nine executions, but pleaded great provocation from Poland's arming of the Polish inhabitants, and from the irruptions of armed Polish bands. The whole trouble, according to the German authorities investigating the occurrences, was caused by the secret plottings of the Poles to secure the province for their own country. The Poles, on the other hand, charged that Berlin was strenuously colonizing Upper Silesia from all parts of Germany with a view to winning the plebiscite called for by the Peace Treaty. This popular vote was to be taken three weeks after the treaty came into force. It was provided that allied troops under Marshal Foch's orders should be on hand to see that the balloting was free and fair. At a meeting of the Supreme Council in Paris on Oct. 13 the United States was asked whether it would furnish its quota of troops for this work, but as Washington had not yet ratified the treaty it was unable to give an immediate answer. In order to avoid trouble the Polish Government meanwhile had withdrawn its troops a kilometer from the border of the disputed province.

The coal problem remained critical. The Germans, alarmed by the gravity of the situation, had begun to take energetic measures to secure a full resumption of work. By enforcing an order of State Commissary Hoersing that any idle workman was liable to arrest, by bringing pressure upon such strikers as remained in Upper Silesia, and by direct threats to the German portion of the mining population they had managed to get a majority of the Silesian mines into operation. Even so, the mines had only 50 per cent. of their usual quota, and the Polish miners who had returned to work, it was declared, were not endeavoring to attain maximum production. The Upper Silesian mines, in consequence, which normally produced 40,000,000 tons of coal in a year, but which before the strike were producing at the rate of only 20,000,000 tons a year, had been reduced in product to about 10,000,000 tons.

A PLEBISCITE FOR TESCHEN

Regarding the final disposition of the mining district of Teschen, situated in Middle Silesia, in the angle between Poland, Czechoslovakia, and German Austria, and claimed by all three countries, but especially the object of the rival claims of Czechoslovakia and Poland, the Czechoslovak and Polish delegates in Paris agreed on Sept. 11 to refer the ultimate decision to a plebiscite, which was taken to mean that the district would go to Poland, as the population was preponderantly Polish. On this fact and on Poland's vital dependence on Teschen for coal supplies the Polish claim was based. The Czechoslovak claim as presented to the Supreme Council on Sept. 4 was based economically on the absolute dependence of Czechoslovak industry on the Teschen coal mines, and politically on the necessity of the new republic's being independent of the political currents or crises of the neighboring country of Poland.

It was announced in Warsaw on Sept. 4 that a British commission to investigate the Jewish question in Poland had started on its way. Simultaneously it was stated that the commission sent by President Wilson to make a similar inquiry was winding up its work preparatory to leaving for Paris. This commission, composed of Mr. Morgenthau, General Jaden of the United States Army, and Homer Johnson of the American Liquidation Board in France, had traveled through a large section of Poland, and visited all such important Jewish centres as Cracow, Lemberg, Pinsk, and Posen. It was intimated by the commission that its report would be constructive rather than controversial in character, though many exaggerated stories of Jewish pogroms in Poland would be denied.

GERMAN PLOTTING

Evidence in support of the charge that the German authorities in Upper Silesia deliberately provoked outbreaks by the Poles and Spartacists in order to get an excuse for suppressing the activities of the former and driving them out of the district before the day of the plebiscite was furnished by the publication in the Leipziger Volkszeitung, a leading organ of the Independent Socialists, of a secret report made on April 24 to the German General Command at Breslau by Captain Gall, head German staff officer at Gleiwitz. This report read in part as follows:

The Poles are quiet. Nevertheless, there are indications that they, too, will start something in the near future. But they are carrying on their work cautiously and in secret, so that an open intervention from our side is hardly possible. Therefore, it is a question of bringing the Poles to a point where there will be a premature uprising on their part, and then our measures will be entirely sufficient to master the movement. We shall not fail to try everything to bring it to this point.

Captain Gall, according to the German papers, was the officer whose latest task was to help the Entente commission of investigation in Upper Silesia.

More light was shed on the character of the German propaganda by the publication in the Breslau Independent Socialist newspaper of a letter addressed to the "Free Association for the Protection of Upper Silesia" by William Burghard, an ex-army officer and present leader of the Majority Socialists in Cosel, generally known as one of the right-hand men of Otto Hoersing, High Commissioner for Upper Silesia. The important part of this letter read:

I have engaged ten men at an expense of sixteen marks each per day to carry on a quiet propaganda by traveling back and forth. I hope to obtain greater success that way than through holding meetings and distributing leaflets. This is aside from the fact that the latter would probably be forbidden during the expected occupation by American troops. Five of these men, whom I shall turn over to you, I shall want to use for a courier service to be established later. As I need more money for these men, as well as for the demonstration next Sunday, I ask you to send me 10,000 marks as soon as possible. An accounting for the last 5,000 marks received will reach you directly.

Events in Two New Slavic States

Jugoslavia's Boundary Dispute With Rumania in an Acute Stage—Czechoslovakia's New Cabinet

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 15, 1919]

THE Cabinet of the Kingdom of Jugoslavia under M. Stoyan Protitch, the veteran leader of the Old Radical Party, resigned in August, owing to the inability of the Premier to agree with the rest of his official family. A new Cabinet was formed on Aug. 16 by Liuba Davidovitch, who on Aug. 23 read a declaration of policy to the Provisional Chamber of Deputies at Belgrade. Referring to the Peace Treaty and the decisions of the Peace Conference regarding the new State of Jugoslavia, as well as to the coming reorganization of the Balkans, M. Davidovitch declared that the Government would defend its rights and interests wherever threatened. The Government, he said, would provide for the representation of all political groups. An electoral bill would insure the election of a Constituent Assembly. The country would be freed of the vast sums of Austrian crown notes with which it was flooded. The expropriation of large land owners would be pushed, and the question of indemnification would be considered. A committee would be appointed to draft a new constitutional law, and a national defense force would be created. Demobilization would be completed by Autumn. Labor legislation would include provision for an eight-hour day. [For further details of Cabinet changes in Serbia see Page 270.]

THE BANAT OF TEMESVAR

Besides political troubles, Jugoslavia also had the vexed questions of the Banat of Temesvar and of the Italian-Croat city of Fiume on her hands. A vehement protest against the attitude of the Rumanians in the Banat was made in Paris by Foreign Minister Trumbitch on Aug. 28. He said in part:

I want to emphasize the fact that the Jugoslavs are in no wise animated by a Jingo spirit in this matter. Since the termination of hostilities we have been and still are determined to abide by the decisions of the Peace Conference even should they be contrary to our desires. We have scrupulously observed the boundaries fixed by Paris, and when in the Banat the portion of territory we claimed was assigned to Rumania we promptly withdrew our forces behind the line of demarkation. We have done our utmost to restrain our soldiers from any aggressiveness in attitude, talk, or action that might lead to undesirable incidents, and have enjoined a spirit of moderation on the press and public at home.

The result seems to have been that the Rumanians have been merely emboldened. They have concentrated very large forces in the Banat and seem to be making evident preparation for an attempt to occupy the whole of it. They have withheld rolling stock, barges, and other material belonging to us, and the behavior of their troops in the Banat, where they almost encircle our forces, is frankly insulting. Bratiano lays claim to the Banat, and the Rumanians talk openly of seizing by arms what the conference refused them. * * * We want to live at peace with our neighbors and do not want war, but we shall not hesitate to fight if the Rumanians try to wrest from us our territory. * * *

Like the Italians, Bratiano bases his unjustified claims on an obsolete secret treaty. When Rumania entered the war in 1916 the Banat of Temesvar was assigned her by France, England, and Italy as part price of her collaboration. The Rumanian Premier had the audacity to advance this agreement as the basis of Rumania's right to the whole region.

He was promptly told that the separate peace treaty Rumania made with the victorious enemy at Bucharest nullified the former agreement and that the Banat would be divided according to the just principles of nationalities. But, like the Italian Ministers, Bratiano was compelled to pursue a policy that was ever more aggressive to maintain his own position. The national appetite has been whetted by the defeat and plunder of the Hungarians. Now, it would seem, it cannot be satisfied save by the Yugoslav part of the Banat. If that be so the Rumanians will find a very different enemy from the undisciplined rabble of Bela Kun.

The Rumanians at this time were said to have fifteen divisions concentrated on the L-shaped boundary line between their territory and that of the Yugoslavs in the Banat, so that they were in a position to menace the latter, whose forces, consisting of only three or four divisions, were on two sides of the L. To avoid conflict the Yugoslavs asked that French or allied troops should occupy the boundary line, but no such troops were available. The Yugoslavs then stopped their demobilization, and even called up some classes that had already been released.

The dramatic seizure of the City of Fiume by Gabriele d'Annunzio had intense repercussion in Yugoslavia. The clashes between the Italian and the Yugoslavs in the Fiume hinterland and on the Dalmatian coast are treated elsewhere in these pages. While Fiume was isolated and held by d'Annunzio's troops, the British and French troops having embarked to avoid complications, a new problem arose for the allied powers at Radkersburg, in Styria, some scores of miles inland from Fiume. Radkersburg, after long debate, had been awarded by the Peace Conference to Austria, but the Yugoslavs, who held it, refused to evacuate; they concentrated troops and barricaded the bridges across the Mur, as well as the roads leading into the city. Germans in Radkersburg were expelled. The supplying of food to Germans was suspended, and the sending of all food from the German hinterland was prevented. In view of this situation the population of Radkersburg sent an urgent appeal for the occupation of the city by Entente troops in order to enforce the provisions of the Austrian peace treaty.

PRIBICEVITCH'S STATEMENT

Colonel Milan Pribicevitch, who for more than a year lived in the United States as chief of the Serbian War Mission, but who, shortly after the signing of the armistice, retired from the army and went home to found and organize the Yugoslav Democratic Party, made an important statement of conditions among the Croats and Serbs. This statement, which was transmitted to the United States through a personal friend, was published on Oct. 12.

Colonel Pribicevitch especially deplored the reports of disorders in Yugoslavia, asserting that conditions were more nearly normal there than anywhere else in Europe. He emphasized the value of the agrarian reform for which the Democratic Party, of which he is a member, was fighting; it consists in giving to the peasant the ownership of the land which he cultivates, volunteers who fought for independence to receive it outright, and others to be allowed to buy it on easy terms of payment. He expected to see the political situation cleared up by the coming elections, looked for Fiume to be turned over to his country, and hoped for American help in the development of Yugoslav industry and in the organization of agriculture on a modern basis.

CONFLICTING ELEMENTS

With reference to reports he had read in the American papers of revolts and conflicts in Yugoslavia between the Croats and the Serbs, Colonel Pribicevitch asserted that they were absolutely without foundation. His statement continued, as follows:

Our fights are political, not against the State, but for social and cultural reforms, and such fights are a necessity and are not confined to Yugoslavia, but are taking place in the United States, Great Britain, and France.

It is true that we are passing through a political crisis, but it must be remembered that the State is newly born, that the Yugoslavs of Serbia and those of former Austria-Hungary have only now, after centuries of separation, been brought together, and that the whole nation has suffered severely during the war. We are seeking to construct and organize our life in a modern way.

Politically we have on the one side the radical Serbs and the radical Croats, who have not yet been able to adapt themselves to the changed circumstances and continue to think as in the old days. Opposed to these are the democratic elements of the Serbs and Croats who are really representative of the ideal of the new State. The Serb Radical Party is composed solely of Serbs, the Croat Radical Party solely of Croats, the Slovene

Clerical Party of Catholics. The Democratic Party embraces Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes of all religions of the country. The former parties differ from the Democratic Party in another respect, inasmuch as they are rather conservative in regard to social politics, whereas the Democratic Party is liberal.

Our idea is to build up a modern Jugoslavia, to reorganize our country life, to give the peasant the ownership of the land, to make him a happy and a useful citizen. We intend to give the volunteers who fought for the independence of the country, and the invalids, free grants of land. All other peasants will purchase the land, the payment for which will be extended over a long period. The large properties will be purchased from the owners by the State, so that the land will be purchased indirectly by the peasants from the landlords, the price being controlled by the State.

Apart from the interior situation, we are much occupied about the foreign situation of our State, especially as regards the Adriatic coast and the Italians in Fiume. Our State cannot exist without our entire Adriatic coast, where at present Fiume is the only modern port with a good railroad line connecting it with the interior of our country. There are only a few thousand Italians living in Dalmatia, namely, at Zara and several other coast towns. The rest of the population is Yugoslav. Even in Fiume the Italians are not in the majority. In our country we cannot understand how it is possible that this unjust and unhappy situation has not been settled and that we must fight for our rights, which must be obvious to the big democratic nations united at the Peace Conference in Paris.

I personally hope for American help in this direction, as also in the development of our industry, in the organization of our agriculture on a modern basis, in completing our railroad system, in organizing our shipbuilding, in developing our mineral resources, in converting our water-power into electric power, in improving our sawmills—in fact, in every branch of industry which would render our country prosperous and happy and enable us to do our duty to our friends in the west.

General Franchet d'Esperey, Commander in Chief of the allied army in the Near East, left Belgrade with his staff on Sept. 6. A dinner in his honor was given by the Serbian Government, at which Premier Davidovitch delivered an address in praise of the French Army and of the work accomplished by General d'Esperey in Central Europe.

On Sept. 24 King Peter arrived at Belgrade from Arandjelovatz, Serbia, to resume residence in the capital after an absence of five years. Since July 17 the aged sovereign had lived at Arandjelovatz, where he went after his exile in Greece. At the request of the King himself there were no public ceremonies in connection with his arrival.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA'S NEW CABINET

In Czechoslovakia the Kramarcz Cabinet was succeeded in July by a new Ministry made up largely of Social Democrats and Agrarian Socialists. Its composition is as follows:

VLASTIMIL TUSAR, President of the Council.

EDWARD BENES, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

ANTOINE HAMPT, Minister of Labor.

LEON VINTER, Minister of Public Welfare.

GUSTAVE HABERMANN, Minister of Public Instruction.

ANTOINE SVEKLA, Minister of the Interior.

M. STANEK, Post Office General.

CHARLES PRACEK, Minister of Agriculture.

M. HORACEK, Minister of Finance.

GEORGE STRIERNY, Minister of Railways.

GUSTAVE HEIDLER, Minister of Commerce.

M. KLOFAC, Minister of National Defense.

FRANCIS VESELY, Minister of Justice.

M. SROBAR, Minister of Public Health.

M. HOUDEK, Minister of Food.

The policy which this new Cabinet has pursued since its formation has been especially to maintain close relations with the great Western powers, the successful fulfillment of which object the name of Dr. Benes guaranteed. During September and October the Czech Republic continued quietly building up its free institutions without internal disorder.

The question of Teschen was debated by the Czechoslovak delegates in the Peace Conference in opposition to the claims of Poland, which they held to be untenable.

The Bohemians of Czechoslovakia, still incensed by the prospect of being separated from German Austria, on Sept. 3 sent a cablegram to Senators Lodge and Knox, asking them to defend the cause of self-determination of 3,500,000 Germans in Bohemia and the Silesian marches. This message was sent by the Government of the German Bohemians, which further asked that a hearing be insured for the Germans prior to the ratification of the Peace Treaty by the United States.

On the same date Czechoslovakia's side of her quarrel with the Magyars of Hungary was given to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate. The Czech spokesmen attacked the Hungarians for rejecting the Czechoslovak demand for the portions of Northern Hungary inhabited by Slovaks.

Three Founders of the Czech Republic

By LOUISE WEISS

Revue de Paris

[TRANSLATED AND EDITED FOR CURRENT HISTORY]

THE Czechoslovak Republic reunites the former Austro-Hungarian provinces of Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, and Slovakia. Its independence was acquired not only by the statesmen who remained at Prague and Vienna, but also by the emigrants who took refuge in the Entente countries. The work of the last-mentioned group is described in this article.

During the year 1915 three men met in Paris; the professor and deputy, Thomas Garrigue Masaryk, who had left his country at the time of the declaration of war; the political refugee, Edward Benès, and Second Lieutenant Milan Ratislav Stefanik, a Slovak, who had taken French citizenship. They were all friends. The two younger members of the group loved Masaryk as a father. They resolved to associate the fate of their country with that of the Entente and to revive the former State of Bohemia—an imposing program.

MASARYK

Masaryk in 1914 already bore a European reputation. Endowed with a keenly critical mind, with a sense of political realities, and an ardent love of truth and justice, he had from his hard and laborious youth (he had plied the trade of blacksmith) espoused the cause of the weak and persecuted. He had defended the Jews of Bohemia against criminal accusations brought against them without foundation. Subsequently, in 1909, at the Agram trial, he had intervened in the Reichsrat in favor of the Serbo-Croats. At the Friedjung trial a few months later he revealed the rascalities of Count Aehrenthal and Count Forbach. His main work, "Russia and Europe," his speeches, and his numerous writings on the international significance of the Czech problem established his authority in the Slavic world. His whole career designed him as one of those who would free his country from the imperial yoke.

He performed his task magnificently. In spite of his advanced years he traveled for four years through Europe, Asia, and America, always master of his actions, leaving on all those who approached him the strongest impression of a man of thought. In 1915 he was in Switzerland, in France, in England, in Italy. The years 1916 and 1917 found him in Russia and Siberia, where he witnessed the fall of the old régime and the development of the revolutionary movement; and where he started the Czechoslovaks on their epic march to Vladivostok. In 1918 he resided in America, in close contact with President Wilson, whom, as apostle and jurist, he won over to his ideas. President of the National Council of Czech countries, founded at Paris with Benès and Stefanik, he won the approval of all his compatriots (over two millions and a half in number) who had emigrated to the allied countries, and as the whole of Bohemia was behind him and as he could write and speak freely, he was the true director from abroad of the destinies of the Czech province before that province, having acquired its independence, chose him as its President.

Stefanik before the war had not concerned himself with politics. After en-cyclopedic studies at the University of Prague, in which science, law, and medicine had a large part, he traveled to Thibet, the Antillers, and Cape Horn, and then established himself in Paris as an attaché of the Observatory. His mathe-

cles, perhaps also of the thousands of Czechs who considered it impossible to overcome the ignorance and indifference of Western Europe in their regard. Stefanik, however, was resolved to remain in the French Army, and in the matical works, his researches in wireless telegraphy, his astronomical notes had begun to bring him to the notice of the scientific world when the European conflict broke out. In spite of his weak constitution, he enlisted and went to the front. Marshal Foch, then General, offered him an important post in the Meteorological Service of the army. He preferred to go on fighting. But the thought of his native country, impoverished and torn, tormented him. While staying in Paris he met Benès, who had just come from Bohemia, and who was convinced that Austria-Hungary would not survive the war; if she was victorious she would become the vassal of Germany; if defeated she would fall to pieces.

Between them they elaborated a plan which they submitted to Masaryk, and then set themselves to their task, despite the skepticism of competent French cir-sky-blue uniform he accomplished his national mission. Victim of the dramatic retreat from Serbia and just out of the hospital, he undertook his work of propaganda in the military and diplomatic circles of the large allied capitals. From the camps of Austrian prisoners he raised a Czech army in the service of the Entente. In Paris he won over the Quai d'Orsay to his views. In Italy he worked together with Generals Porro and Diaz, and with Messrs. Orlando and Sonnino.

In Russia and Rumania he won the regard of Generals Berthelot and Janin, and obtained from General Alexeiev the measures necessary for the creation of national legions. In America he inspired with new life the important Czech and Slovak Leagues of New York and Chicago. In March he was in Vladivostok as General in the French Army and War Minister of his Government. This weak and sickly man, whose haggard face is lighted up by clear, bright eyes, is a diplomat and a conqueror. His will is as strong and as swift as a sword. He judges men in full knowledge of their secret motives. His manner has something surprising in it, and yet also something genial. His charm, his mind, mathematically clear and subtle, his artistic tastes, have everywhere won for his country friends of superior worth, friends whose fidelity and patience have never been wearied by the extremes of his ardent and impulsive character.

A different personality is that of Benès. Son of a small peasant, Professor of Sociology in the University of Prague, his character is one of rare intellectual honesty and modesty combined; once his friendship is won it can never be shaken. He was the hard-working man of the war which the National Council, whose secretary he was, waged on Austria. All those who for four years came from London, Rome, New York, Moscow, and Paris itself to gain information at the seat of the council on the Czech countries, their situation, their resources, their claims, found him always at work, ready to repeat an explanation, to draw up documents, to praise the acts of Masaryk and Stefanik, to speak with love and respect of his country. As logical as his friend Stefanik is intuitive, as simple as the other is complex and mysterious, with a shade of austerity which brings him closer to Masaryk, he has fulfilled his rôle as administrator (Minister of Foreign Affairs of the new republic) with a courage and a competency which have compelled the admiration of the statesmen of the Entente, today his colleagues, notably Lord Robert Cecil, Minister Balfour, and Messrs. Pichon and Berthelot. Admitted to the Interallied Conference which preceded the signature of the armistice, on more than one point he won consent for his views, which he knew to be in harmony, despite the distance and the difficulty of communications, with those of Masaryk and Kramarcz.

Thus three exiles have resuscitated a State. The success of Masaryk, Stefanik, and Benès in the Entente countries was the origin of Austria's downfall.

The Dramatic Return of Edward Benès

Edward Benès, who four years ago left Austria-Hungary as a fugitive, returned to Prague on Sept. 24, 1919, as Foreign Minister of Czechoslovakia. Benès, who is only 31 years old, was a pupil of Masaryk and later Professor. There was a tremendous popular greeting prepared for the young man, who was one of the three founders of the republic, and the streets were lined with nearly half a million persons.

The dramatic moment of Benès's arrival was when he was greeted by Masaryk in the former reception room at the Wilson station at Prague. Waiting to greet Benès were President Masaryk, the new Prime Minister; Mr. Tusar and members of his Cabinet; T. Tomashek, President of the Assembly; officials of Prague, and representatives of the various foreign Governments, among whom was the American Minister, Richard Crane.

As the young Minister entered the room, Masaryk, who had been unable to conceal his impatience, moved toward him. Neither seemed able to speak. Before they were close enough to grasp each other's hands the strains of the Czech national air were heard. Every one stood rigid and tense with emotion. It was the first time in four years that Benès had heard it on his native soil, and as it finished tears streamed down his face.

Masaryk caught him in his arms and hid him in an embrace that was fatherly in its affection, and kissed Benès twice on each cheek. Silence was unbroken except by the audible weeping of the wives of officials. Everybody present was visibly affected. Three times the Prime Minister attempted to begin his formal speech before he was able to proceed, but Benès was too overcome to reply.

When the reception was concluded in the station, Benès was escorted to an automobile and sat by the side of Masaryk for a ride through the streets to the palace which is the Czechoslovak White House. More than a quarter of a million persons dined in the streets of Prague, and many thousands of girls and women were attired in the wonderful national costumes of Bohemia, Moravia, and Slovakia.

Prague has a population of 800,000. The crowd was admirable in its behavior.

Many of those keeping order were women, and the lines were absolutely straight. Not a single person moved out of line. While the crowd was enthusiastic, it was not noisy, the greetings being cries of "Nazda," meaning "Success to you," accompanied by waving of handkerchiefs. That evening at a dinner the American Minister, Mr. Crane, said: "No other new nation and few old ones have such a future as has Czechoslovakia."

Hungary, Rumania, and the Allies

Rumanians Linger in Budapest

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 15, 1919]

IT was announced from Paris on Sept. 17 that the Peace Treaty with Hungary had been completed and was ready for presentation, but there was no responsible Hungarian Government to receive it. Reports reaching Paris on the date mentioned stated that the Friedrich Cabinet, which continued functioning after the fall of Archduke Joseph, had resigned, and that a new Cabinet was being formed. It was stated semi-officially that any Hungarian Cabinet which appeared to be fairly representative would be recognized and declared competent to receive the treaty.

Reports of Sept. 16 that the Rumanian Army had begun to withdraw from Budapest were not confirmed. A week later, (Sept. 24,) the substance of the reply of the Rumanian Government to the allied note delivered by Sir George Russell Clerk, Special Envoy of the Peace Conference to Rumania, was published in Paris. In this answer, delivered through Premier Bratiano, Rumania offered to give the Allies all the satisfaction in her power in connection with her occupation of Hungarian territory. Rumania, the answer declared, was ready to evacuate Budapest, or to co-operate there with the Allies in maintaining order, and was prepared to deliver to the Allies a list of the war materials and rolling stock seized in Hungary. The reply, however, expressed the hope that as Rumania had recovered only what was due her from Hungary, the Allies would not dispossess her of these acquisitions. One point upon which she insisted, according to this version, was the lifting of the Hungarian blockade.

Together with the Rumanian reply to the allied note, Sir George Russell Clerk submitted a report covering the Rumanian situation in the light of his visit to Bucharest. This report was not given out for publication by the Peace Conference, but, it was intimated, it showed that Rumania was not fully complying with the orders of the conference. In the light of this report, the conference decided to send Rumania a new note, and in view of Rumania's complaint that she had not received several of the allied notes it was stated that this latest communication would be sent in duplicate to the representatives of England, France, Italy, and the United States at Bucharest, with a request to each that he deliver his copy to the Bucharest Government, thus insuring its receipt.

This note was moderate in tone and conciliatory in its review of the points on which differences existed. Reasons were given explaining why the clause relating to minorities—the main cause of Rumania's refusal to sign—had been inserted in the Austrian peace treaty; and the difficulties caused by Rumania's failure to become a signatory were pointed out. The note further said that the question of Rumanian requisition on Hungary would be submitted to a special commission, and declared that the Allies did not regard the Friedrich Government in Hungary as representing the will of the Hungarian Nation.

Regarding conditions in Budapest, Jules Sauerwein, the foreign editor of Le Matin, on Oct. 5 drew a deplorable picture of life in the Hungarian capital. Pillaged by the Rumanians, without coal, almost without food, with pumpkins and watermelons the only nourishment the great majority of the people could procure, the once haughty and prosperous Magyars bowed their heads in misery before Czechs, Croats, Poles, and Rumanians. In Budapest 900,000 persons were out of work. Scarcely any money was in circulation, except Communist paper, which was particularly worthless; while clothes and the common necessities of life were almost unprocurable at any price. M. Sauerwein said that Budapest, where life was comparatively comfortable during the war, had been reduced by Communism to a condition of wretchedness and desolation far surpassing that of the Austrian capital, which had shared the common defeat. He attributed this condition chiefly to the hostility of the peasants to the Bela Kun régime, in consequence of which they had refused to exchange food either for money or for goods, so that Budapest had been subjected virtually to a starvation blockade.

The arrival of 1,800 British soldiers, forming part of the international detachment to take over the police service at Budapest after the expected departure of the Rumanian forces there, was reported on Oct. 8, and 2,000 Italian soldiers were on their way.

Prince Carol's Renunciation of the Throne

Sequel to a Romantic Marriage

THE story of the morganatic marriage of Crown Prince Carol of Rumania, and of the Prince's final renunciation of the throne in preference to deserting his bride, was told in considerable detail by M. Mihail Mircea on Aug. 20, 1919, in the French newspaper, Excelsior. The writer stated that on Aug. 27, 1918, the Crown Prince and Mlle. Jeanne Lambrino, daughter of a well-known Rumanian General, left Bucharest secretly by motor car, and crossed the frontier to Odessa, where they were married in legal form. In the marriage certificate, of which the Excelsior printed a facsimile, the age of the Prince was given as 25, and that of the bride, described as single and of noble family, as 22.

Shortly after the marriage several officers and agents of the Rumanian Secret Service, who had been sent to Odessa in search of the Prince, discovered him in a restaurant, and insisted on his accompanying them back to Bucharest. On arrival in the capital he was sentenced, by the order of his father,

King Ferdinand, to six weeks' arrest for having, without notification, left the regiment of which he was Colonel. At the time the marriage took place Rumania was in the throes of complicated negotiations between her pro-German Premier, M. Marghiloman, and the Central Empires, and the question of Rumania's further attitude toward the Entente was by no means settled. The whole position was critical.

A meeting of the Crown Council was called for the purpose of considering the situation set up by the Prince's marriage. All the Ministers present, with the exception of M. Marghiloman, agreed that the marriage in no way affected the Prince's status as heir to the throne. M. Marghiloman alone urged that he should be replaced by his younger brother, Nicholas, then a boy of 15. Largely, it is understood, through the influence of the Queen, the views of the majority of the council prevailed, and the matter was allowed to remain where it was. Her Majesty, it was understood hoped that in time the Prince would be come more inclined to bow to the wishes of his family and consent that his marriage be annulled as a mere youthful escapade.

Both the Prince and his wife, however, proved unexpectedly firm, and eventually, on Dec. 17, by order of the Minister of Justice, proceedings were initiated with a view to annulling the marriage on the ground of informalities in connection with the publication of legal notices required under the code. A decree annulling the marriage was eventually issued by the court, but it was ignored by the Prince. Toward the end of July, 1919, with a view to bringing matters to a final settlement, the Rumanian War Minister, General Vaitoiano, accompanied by Colonel Boyle, an American officer, who has several times acted on behalf of Queen Marie in connection with the Crown Prince's marriage, called at Cotroceni Palace, where the Prince was living, and pleaded with him to accede to the wishes of his family.

PRINCE CAROL AND THE WOMAN FOR WHOM HE GAVE UP THE THRONE

Finally, as the Prince remained obdurate, General Vaitoiano gave him the alternative of accepting the annulment of his marriage or immediately resuming his command at the front. The Prince, it is alleged, replied: "I will remain a soldier, but I will keep my word." He asked for a delay of four days, however, to consider the matter; but before that period had expired the Prince, on Aug. 1, at 3 in the morning, wrote the following renunciation, addressed to his father:

Sire: In virtue of a natural right implicitly recognized by Article 83, Paragraph 2, of the Constitution, I declare that I renounce my status as Crown Prince of Rumania, both for myself and my heirs, together with all the advantages that are recognized as due to me as heir to the throne. I remain the devoted servant of my country, and in placing my sword at its service I beg your Majesty to give me a place among the soldiers who are at present at the front.

CAROL,

Prince of Rumania.

Bucharest, Aug. 1, 1919.

The Prince sent copies of this letter of renunciation to MM. Bratiano, Take Ionescu, Marghiloman, and General Averesco, the leaders of the four Rumanian political parties. A fifth copy was sent to Thomas Dragu, with a request that it be handed to the Executive Committee of the Socialist Party, and the sixth he sent to Nicolas Iorga, his former tutor. Later the same day the Crown Prince left Bucharest to rejoin his regiment at the front.

On Aug. 25 it was announced that the Rumanian Council of Ministers, after deliberation on the renunciation of throne rights by Prince Carol, had recognized the younger Prince, Nicholas, as heir to the Rumanian throne. Prince Nicholas, a student at Eton, left England at once to travel to Bucharest by the Orient Express.

Bessarabia's Charges Against Rumania

Appeal of Peace Delegates

THE Bessarabian delegates to the Peace Conference at Paris transmitted to President Wilson on Sept. 23, 1919, the following noteworthy appeal for relief from the tyrannous methods employed by Rumania in the effort to obtain permanent possession of Bessarabia, formerly a Russian province:

The Bessarabian delegates to the Peace Conference implore you to exercise your great influence to compel the Rumanian Government to cease the hideous reign of terror now prevailing in Bessarabia, owing to the unjustifiable and atrocious conduct of the Rumanian authorities there.

Freedom of the press has ceased to exist in Bessarabia, and all real expression of opinion is rendered impossible. Therefore we are compelled to make a direct appeal to you.

The Rumanian troops were authorized by the Central Powers in January, 1918, to enter Bessarabia, ostensibly for the purpose of restoring order. The Rumanian Government subsequently pleaded that there was great danger from Bolshevism in Bessarabia. This reason was entirely unfounded, as there never was such danger owing to the free and prosperous conditions prevailing. Nevertheless, the Entente also was induced to allow the Rumanians to enter the country.

The Rumanian Government, without the least foundation in fact, interpreted this as equivalent to permission to annex Bessarabia and has acted ever since as supreme master of the country. Since January, 1918, the Rumanian Government has followed a policy of ruthless imperialism in Bessarabia and has made every effort to Rumanianize it in spite of the fact that the whole civilization and sympathies of the country are Russian and anti-Rumanian.

The worst features of Magyar persecutions from which the Rumanians in Transylvania suffered before their liberation are being thrown into the shade by the atrocities today perpetrated in Bessarabia by the Bucharest Government. The situation there throws a startling light on the reasons why Rumania refused to sign the clauses in the Peace Treaty designed for the protection of minorities. The whole of the autonomous rights enjoyed by Bessarabia under Russian suzerainty have been swept away. Local zemstvos and other organisms which were purely Russian in character and had stood the test of centuries have either been suppressed or fatally modified. Rumanian gendarmes and other officials have replaced the old autonomous organisms and are practicing the bribery and extortion for which they are notorious in Eastern Europe.

The old Bessarabian courts have been abolished and replaced by Rumanian tribunals, which the Bessarabians refuse to recognize, as Rumanian officials now admit. Out of 250 Bessarabian Judges and Magistrates over 240 have been dismissed because they refused to take the oath of allegiance to the King of Rumania, and Rumanians have been put in their places. Bessarabian landowners have been given formal notice that unless they take the oath to the Rumanian King within a fortnight their estates will be confiscated.

The use of the Russian language, which is universally spoken in Bessarabia, has been prohibited in the schools and replaced by Rumanian, which the pupils refuse to learn. Hundreds of schoolmasters and priests have been flogged, imprisoned, or deported—sometimes all three—while many others have been shot down in cold blood.

Foodstuffs sent to Bessarabia from America and elsewhere for the relief of the population have been appropriated by the Rumanian authorities for their own people, and an absurdly small quantity has been allotted Bessarabia. A large number of people starved to death in Kishineff as the result of this barbarous policy of Rumania.

We have now received from absolutely reliable sources in Bessarabia the information that Rumanian police there are employing methods of physical torture in vogue in the Middle Ages. We are in possession of evidence that Bessarabians belonging to the intellectual classes who are suspected of Russophile tendencies are being put to actual torture by Rumanian executioners. The methods adopted include tearing out fingernails and crushing finger-ends in door-hinges. Others are being flogged with India-rubber rods. Others have had their heads and feet tied together and their hands bound behind their backs and have been left in this condition a whole day, or until they have consented to give information concerning men and women who have become obnoxious to the Rumanian authorities.

Full confirmation of many atrocities of this kind has been given us by a British officer just returned from Rumania. Furthermore, officers belonging to the French military mission who have been in South Bessarabia since February, 1919, have sent reports to their Government in which they mention a quantity of facts, testifying to Rumanian misrule and atrocities in Bessarabia and confirming our statements.

Now that the Rumanian elections are approaching, the Rumanian Government is nominating throughout Bessarabia candidates for the Rumanian Parliament and using every possible coercive method to make Bessarabians promise to vote for them. A decree has been promulgated ordering every Bessarabian to participate in the Rumanian Parliamentary elections, which are entirely alien to them, under penalty of a fine of $200.

We protest against these atrocious and unheard-of methods, and appeal most earnestly to you for aid. Rumania has no shadow of right to impose her will on a single Bessarabian. The Peace Conference has so far refused every appeal made by Rumania for permission to annex our country. We beg that our people be allowed to determine their own future by a plebiscite taken under control of the great powers and guaranteed against interference by Rumanian agents. We are content to stand or fall by this test alone.

In the immediate present we beg and pray you to intervene and save our helpless people from the intolerable persecution and abominable atrocities from which they are hourly suffering through the direct agency of Rumanian imperialism and greed, operating in defiance of all laws of civilization and studiously concealed from the eyes of every other nation.

A. N. DRUPENSKY, former President of the Bessarabian Provincial Zemstvo.

A. C. SCHMIDT, former Mayor of Kishinev, and Bessarabian delegate to the Peace Conference in Paris.

The Killing of Hostages by Munich Reds

The Munich Radicals who murdered innocent hostages during the Communist régime in the Bavarian capital were placed on trial in Berlin, and six of them, being convicted and sentenced on Sept. 19, 1919, were executed at 4 o'clock the same afternoon. Those sentenced to pay the death penalty were Fritz Seidl and five of his followers—Josef Seidl, Schicklhofer, Widl, Purzel, and Fehmer. Seven others were sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude. The brutal nature of their crimes under the so-called Soviet Republic was revealed in the court proceedings of Sept. 10, as summarized by a London Times correspondent:

The testimony showed that the last hostage shot was the Prince of Thurn and Taxis, who declared that he had been expelled by the reigning family in Regensburg in 1912 because of his revolutionary views. Two Red Guards who accompanied him when he made his last appeal to their chiefs said: "He seems innocent, and we do not shoot innocent persons," but Haussmann exclaimed, "Oh, don't make so much talk about it! He is one of the 'big heads'—one of the upper ten," whereupon the Prince was again dragged to the courtyard and put against the wall.

A waiter named Debutt, who first professed not to have taken part in the proceedings, was accused by one of the prisoners, who said that he had been in the courtyard. After a long pause he confessed this was true and gave details of the shooting, and admitted having taken pocketbooks and valuables from the hostages. He was arrested and removed from the court in custody on suspicion of being concerned in the murders.

Another witness named Zak described how Haussmann said: "I can show no mercy. I have Seidl's strictest order to shoot the people." Haussmann stormed into the gymnasium and fetched a number of soldiers out, who placed various people against the wall. Every time three hostages had been shot he motioned with his hand to Schicklhofer to proceed.

When the Countess Hella von Westarp was brought forward, Schicklhofer said: "She must be shot. We can have no mercy. She must die. Besides, the 'swells' have not treated our heroes out there any differently." This witness saw eight hostages shot. The soldiers in the courtyard showed great joy at the shooting of the hostages and made coarse remarks as each victim sank down.

Professor Berger was forced forward by a blow from a fist in the neck. A bullet splashed his brains against the wall, whereupon one soldier cried, amid general laughter: "There's baked brains today." One of those shot down moved a little, whereupon a soldier went to him and split his skull with a rifle butt, saying: "It is all the same whether he dies this way or that."

A small Saxon soldier, who obviously found Countess Westarp too long in writing her farewell letter, caught hold of her, dragged her to the wall, and fired with others on her. "As she sank down I heard a cry: 'Take care, Mark, that you have settled her.'" The witness described, to the horror of those present, how one of the accused treated the Countess's dead body. The corpses were buried late at night by Seidl's orders.

Closing In on Soviet Russia

While Denikin and Mamontov Threaten Moscow, the Forces of Yudenitch Advance Upon Petrograd

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 18, 1919]

DEVELOPMENTS in Russia during September and October pointed to the ultimate downfall of the Lenin-Trotsky régime. On every side the anti-Bolshevist armies were closing in upon the Soviet Government, and British warships riding in the Gulf of Finland were preventing the passage of all food supplies. The most sensational advance was that of General Yudenitch, which began about Oct. 10, and by Oct. 18 had entered the suburbs of Petrograd. The phenomenal successes of Denikin, meanwhile, had continued in the south; Voronezh and Kursk were captured. Tambov and Kozlov in the rear of the Bolshevik lines were taken by the Cossack General, Mamontov, who was then about 175 miles from Moscow. Kolchak, aided by these victories, carried out a successful offensive with his three Siberian armies in September.

Soviet Russia showed alarm over the menace of Denikin's successes, and Moscow was placed in a state of siege. The burning of hidden fires of revolt against the Soviet régime was revealed by the discovery of a widespread plot, sixty-seven participators in which, including many learned and prominent men, were executed, and by a bomb explosion at the Kremlin, in which thirteen Bolshevik commissaries, including the notorious public executioner, Jacob Peters, were killed. Russian securities on the Paris Bourse rose constantly in value, owing to a belief that the Soviet régime was destined, at no distant period, to be overthrown from within.

THE NORTHERN FRONT

The evacuation of the Archangel front by the British was proceeding on Sept. 16 as smoothly as could be expected, in view of the formidable difficulties attending the operation, including a shortage of shipping and river boats. The difficulties had been increased also by the fact that, in addition to the soldiers, thousands of civilians were being removed. Small raids against the Bolsheviks were being continued for the purpose of screening the movements of the troops.

The Russian forces meanwhile carried out a successful offensive in the railway sector. Russian volunteer troops had reoccupied Onega, taken by the Bolsheviks in one of their northern raids. With this recapture communication had been re-established between the Allies on the Archangel and Murmansk coast fronts. On Oct. 13, after the withdrawal of the British troops, positions on the Emptsa River were taken by the Russian troops. Interviewed regarding the situation, a representative of the North Russian Government said:

The Russian Army is now demonstrating determination, despite the demands placed upon it by the withdrawal of British troops. Our forces, which they considered incapable of holding the front and doomed to disorganization, are scoring a series of successes such as have not been seen during the last year.

ON THE PETROGRAD FRONT

On the Petrograd front the food blockade by the British squadron, in conjunction with the French, continued. The United States, however, had declined to join the blockade, though it refused clearance to vessels bound for Soviet Russia. The effect of the British and French blockade was to prevent the shipment of supplies to Soviet Russia from Holland, Denmark, and Sweden. Ships of those nationalities bound for Russia had been turned back by the British squadron in the latter half of September.

On Oct. 1 a Copenhagen dispatch stated that General Belakovitch, whose forces were co-operating with those of Yudenitch, had broken the Bolshevik lines at Bulata, and that whole divisions of the Bolsheviki had surrendered.

THE YUDENITCH OFFENSIVE

The frequently reported intention of General Yudenitch, in command of Finnish and Russian forces, to advance on Petrograd was fulfilled with a swift and successful offensive begun shortly before Oct. 10 on a front of 100 miles. Two days later a detachment of this North Russian Army had captured Yamburg, about seventy-five miles southwest of Petrograd. On Oct. 14 Yudenitch was approaching Gatschina, thirty-five miles south of Petrograd, and the White Scouts in advance of General Rodzianko's army had reached Kikerino, eighteen miles west of Gatschina. General Rodzianko reported the capture of the Bolshevik armored train named Lenin, which was abandoned so hurriedly that the Bolsheviki had no time to blow it up. The Bolsheviki were falling back in disorder on Petrograd. Over 2,000 prisoners and many guns were captured. British tanks manned by English officers were co-operating effectively.

Pskov was retaken from the Bolsheviki on Oct. 15. Reports of the continuous successes of Yudenitch followed. On Oct. 15 M. Margulies, the Minister of Commerce of the North Russian Government, arrived at Helsingfors to negotiate with the Finnish Government for the transportation of Finnish merchandise for Petrograd when it should fall. Reports from Swedish and Russian sources on Oct. 18 declared that Kronstadt had fallen, and that the cavalry of General Yudenitch were in the suburbs of Petrograd. The occupation of Kronstadt by the anti-Bolshevik forces was reported officially by the General Staff of the Finnish Army at Viborg on Sunday, Oct. 10.

THE BALTIC REPUBLICS

Regarding the Baltic republics, it became apparent in September that the Letts and Lithuanians, alarmed by the departure of the allied forces, had begun to consider seriously the situation in which this departure would leave them in relation to the Bolsheviki. On Sept. 16 it was reported that an important conference had been in session at Riga, considering the formation of a Baltic federation. This idea had crystallized to the extent that an agreement had been reached for a common currency and customs union for Letvia, Esthonia, and Lithuania. The seat of deliberations had been transferred to Reval, the seat of the new Northwestern Government, where it was to be joined by representatives of Finland and of the Northwestern Government. It was also stated that peace would be discussed in close touch with Entente representatives, the Baltic States favoring peace with Soviet Russia on the basis of Soviet recognition of the three Baltic republics in the absence of effective assistance from the Entente.

On Sept. 19 the Lithuanian delegation at Paris denied that Lithuania had agreed to share in peace negotiations with the Soviet republic. The Lettish Foreign Minister on Oct. 9 issued a statement indicating that the project was progressing and that the peace offer made by the Bolshevik authorities was to be examined by a special commission at Riga on Oct. 16. The successful offensive of General Yudenitch and the capture of Petrograd brought the peace negotiations to a sudden close.

[For the unexpected assault on Riga by combined German and Russian forces see the article that follows this one.]

THE SOUTHERN FRONT

The successes of General Denikin in South Russia continued. On Sept. 8 Denikin's authority extended not only over the Cossack region, but over a wide stretch of territory between the Volga and the Dnieper. He commanded the Black Sea coast between Georgia and Bessarabia, and had under his control such important cities as Kharkov, Kiev and Odessa. His staff occupied the quiet town of Taganrog, while his political council had made its quarters in the busy city of Rostov.

Important military operations along the eastern half of the front were described by Harold Williams on Sept. 10. Dramatic victories had been won by Denikin in an offensive begun the week before. Trotzky and his skilled military advisers had conceived a daring plan of campaign, which had recoiled upon their own heads. With a heavy concentration of Soviet forces, including several strong divisions from the Siberian front, they had aimed at catching, as in a pair of pincers, Denikin's centre, held by the Don Army. On the one hand they counted on driving a wedge between the Don army and the volunteer army west of Kharkov, and forcing a way through the Donetsk basin to the Sea of Azov, while on the eastern flank they hoped to overrun General Wrangel's small Caucasian army and to force a way through Tsaritsin down the Volga to the Caspian.

The drive on the western flank brought the Reds to the important junction of Kupiansk, southeast of Kharkov. Here the Bolsheviks were caught in the wedge-shaped salient they themselves had created. General Shkuko attacked them with his Kuban cavalry in the rear, and thousands surrendered or deserted; the rest fled northward in disorder. General Mamontov, the Cossack leader, who in August had broken through the Soviet army by an impetuous raid, reappeared after days of absence, and announced the capture of Tambov and Kozlov, in the rear of the Bolshevik armies. Mamontov, with 13,000 men, had captured large stores and munitions, freed and sent home 20,000 Bolshevik conscripts, and taken into his army thousands of volunteers.

On hearing the news that the Bolsheviks were pressing hard on Denikin's forces on the Don front, Mamontov turned, and at the time in question had reached a point within striking distance of Voronezh, the most important base in the immediate rear of the Bolshevik lines. The situation of General Wrangel at Tsaritsin, on the contrary, was precarious, but this General had inflicted a smashing defeat on the Bolshevik forces when they attempted to enter the city. In this and other battles over 9,000 prisoners were captured.

On Oct. 13 a wireless from General Denikin stated that the Bolshevik offensive had been beaten back with severe losses to the attackers.

CLOSING IN TOWARD MOSCOW

General Denikin's capture of Voronezh and Grafskia, with 15,000 prisoners, was admitted on Oct. 8 by a Moscow wireless message. Denikin's cavalry was advancing on Usman, forty miles north of Voronezh. Meanwhile the activities of General Mamontov behind the Bolshevik rear caused the Soviet Government considerable alarm. The State Department at Washington on Sept. 22 received the report of a great uprising in European Russia in the region of Tambov and Kozlov; Mamontov himself had swept to about 150 miles westward of Tambov and so threatened the enemy lines of communication that his operations had caused a precipitate retreat of a portion of the Soviet forces and opened the way for the rapid advance to Kursk of other troops of Denikin's army that had been based on Kharkov.

The capture of Kursk by Denikin was subsequently admitted by a Moscow wireless. The steady advance of Denikin, and especially the activities of General Mamontov behind the Bolshevik front, disquieted the Soviet Government to such an extent that on Sept. 19 Moscow was placed in a state of siege, and the serious nature of the military situation confronting the Government by the menacing approach toward Moscow was depicted in a proclamation calling upon the people to do their utmost to bring about Denikin's and Mamontov's defeat. Tambov, captured by Mamontov, is 250 miles southeast of Moscow; Kursk 290 miles to the southwest. Mamontov's operations west of Tambov would bring him within 175 miles of Moscow. Both General Mamontov and his Cossack colleague, General Shkuko, were reported on Sept. 30 to be suffering from shell shock, caused by the explosion of shells in a Bolshevik bombardment of their headquarters on the Don.

Further victories were announced by General Denikin on Oct. 13 in the direction of Kiev, Tchernigov, and Orel.

Enormous quantities of booty and large numbers of prisoners were captured in the occupation of Tchernigov, on the left wing of General Denikin's army north of Kiev. Two hundred hostages who had been condemned to be shot by the Bolsheviks were rescued. One of the most important victories won by General Denikin at this time was the capture of Orel, a strategic centre 238 miles south of Moscow, together with thousands of prisoners and large quantities of material. General Denikin's communiqué reported this capture as follows:

Orel was entered after many days of fierce fighting in which several Red divisions were defeated. The townspeople welcomed the troops, falling on their knees and calling out, "Christ is risen!" East of Orel our troops debouched on the line Prechrazhenskoe-Turemeff.

IN WESTERN UKRAINIA

About the middle of September matters in Western Ukraina were in a state of considerable confusion. The volunteer army was entering into a sphere of international relations with Middle and Eastern Europe. The Bolsheviks were departing. Their forces ejected from Kiev were retreating hastily to the northeast to avoid being cut off by the Poles, who were advancing on Gomel. Another force was retiring northward from Odessa, trying to find its way through the tangle of friendly, neutral, and openly hostile bands and regiments that occupied the various areas between the Lower Dnieper and Dniester Basins.

The anti-Bolshevik volunteer army held Kiev and a strip of country immediately to the west. Its nearest neighbors on the west were Galician Ukrainians under an Austrian General named Krause, who withdrew to Russia after having been defeated by the Poles in Galicia and joined the forces of Petlura.

The relations between the volunteer army and the Ukrainians were those of armed neutrality. So far as the Ukrainian movement was concerned, Denikin had pledged himself to the principle of regional autonomy and to permitting the cultivation of the Ukrainian or Little Russian language and literature. As against this the Germans had promoted the movement with which Petlura was identified, and which aimed at establishing an independent Ukrainian State in Russia. Denikin had resolutely set his face against this movement "in the name of united and undivided Russia." In consequence of this attitude the feeling of the Ukrainians, who have long been determined on autonomous independence, has been one of hostility to the personality of General Denikin and to the movement led by him; the Ukrainian Information Bureaus in Paris, London, and New York have constantly attacked him. The Ukrainian Bureau in London on Oct. 8, after referring to the causes of conflict between Denikin and the Ukrainian General, Petlura, stated that all efforts to avert a break between them had failed and that General Petlura had declared war upon the Russian anti-Bolshevist commander in the south. On Oct. 8 violent fighting between the Russian volunteer army and the Ukrainians was reported. These conflicts were continuing on Oct. 11.

On the Dniester the volunteer army was in contact with the Rumanians and virtually in contact with the Poles, who were regarded as allies in the struggle against the Bolsheviks. A Polish military and economic mission had just arrived with the object of establishing a satisfactory modus vivendi in connection with boundary and other matters in dispute. Similar arrangements with Rumania were also in the making.

Regarding Denikin's attitude toward Poland and Finland, an important announcement was made at Helsingfors on Oct. 9 by General Krasnov, Denikin's representative, to the effect that General Denikin had unconditionally recognized the independence of these two countries. Krasnov stated that the crushing of the Soviet régime was certain, and declared that it would be most unwise for the Baltic States to conclude peace with the Bolsheviks at that time. He also alluded to the large quantities of war material supplied to Denikin, on which the latter's uninterrupted successes were based. It was announced in Paris on Oct. 8 that General Mangin, whose recall from command of the Eighth Army had just been published, was to proceed to South Russia and join General Denikin, in company with Baron Basil Maklakov, Russian Ambassador to Paris, to co-ordinate the policy of the former's anti-Bolshevist Government.

THE SIBERIAN FRONT

The phenomenal successes of General Denikin in South Russia, compelling the Soviet Government to withdraw forces from the Siberian front, were reflected in the Ural region at the beginning of September by Admiral Kolchak's action in starting a wide offensive with his three western armies. This triple campaign came to a climax about Sept. 24. At the beginning of September General Sakharov held the Bolshevik forces back along the Kurgan-Ishim highway, while in the north, at Tobolsk and east of Irtysh, the Red emissaries were vainly trying to stir the peasants to attack the Kolchak armies from the rear. The position of the Omsk forces in the south was less favorable. The Reds had constituted a new force in Samara, composed of the First and Fourth Armies, under the designation of the Turkestan front. Orders had been sent to all the Bolshevik authorities to prepare for the transit of troops and material from the lower Volga to Central Asia.

By Sept. 11 General Sakharov's army was winning continuous successes in the direction of Kurgan, (about 200 miles southwest of Tobolsk,) having captured five staffs, 2,000 prisoners, 19 cannon, 40 machine guns and a large amount of other booty. Cossacks co-operating had driven the Bolsheviks to the northwest. The Second Siberian Army, under General Lokvitsky, was also advancing and forcing its way past the flank and in the rear of the Bolshevik forces on the Ishim-Tiumen railway. Hard fighting was in progress.

From the beginning to the end of September the Siberian troops had pushed forward an average distance of seventy-five miles along the whole front in the face of serious resistance and counterattacks, and 15,000 prisoners, 100 machine guns, and 21 heavy cannon had been captured. Further developments were reported on Oct. 1. All three of Admiral Kolchak's armies had advanced another 15 miles, making an average gain of 90 miles since the offensive began.

A wireless message from the Kolchak Government dated Oct. 13 announced a general retreat by the Bolsheviks along the entire line. They were deporting whole populations between the ages of 16 and 50, as well as driving away the cattle as they departed.

PLOT AGAINST KOLCHAK

That there were forces in Siberia seeking the overthrow of the Kolchak régime was plain on Sept. 15, when it was announced from Vladivostok that Ivan Yakushev, President of the first Siberian Duma, which Admiral Kolchak dissolved in the Fall of 1918, had signed and issued secretly a proclamation calling for the overthrow of the Kolchak Government and the calling of a popular convention to establish an All-Siberian Constituent Assembly. The proclamation accused Kolchak and his coadjutors of both military and political incapacity, and enumerated a list of reform measures to be passed by the proposed new Assembly, including local self-government, landcession to peasants, freedom of workmen's unions, and abolition of the alleged "reactionary" régime in the army.

The Omsk Government was also faced with diplomatic difficulties involving Americans. At Iman, Siberia, on Sept. 5, Cossack troops commanded by General Kalmykov had arrested an American officer and an enlisted man on the pretext of lack of proper identification papers, and had flogged the latter. General Graves, the American commander, demanded an apology from General Rozanov, the Russian commander in that province. The strained situation was relieved on Oct. 1 when the Russian Ambassador at Washington, Boris Bakmetev, informed the State Department that General Rozanov had formally tendered the desired apology and promised to call for the punishment of the offending troops.

It appeared from Omsk advices of Sept. 23 that General Graves, in retaliation for scurrilous articles published in a Vladivostok newspaper, as well as for the hostile acts of Cossack chiefs against Americans in the Far East zone, had held up shipments of 14,000 rifles which had arrived from America consigned to the All-Russian Government at Omsk. The Omsk Government protested to the Washington Government. On Oct. 2 the State Department ordered that the delivery of these rifles be made, and announced that efforts were being exerted to persuade the Omsk Government to suppress the newspaper which had published the attack, or at least to compel a less hostile attitude toward the American forces. The trend of the attack in question was that the United States was fostering disunion in Russia, desiring not to see a united Russia, but a number of disunited and autonomous powers to facilitate its own materialistic ends.

On Sept. 18 Admiral Kolchak issued a decree calling a Zemstvo congress to consider the solution of the many problems confronting the Government, and to put in motion the machinery for legal administrative measures. At this time the Omsk treasury had a gold reserve, largely in the shape of ingots and coin, including some gold plate, weighing 1,440,000 pounds. An official inspection of this vast deposit was arranged by the Minister of Finance for foreign correspondents, for the purpose of confirming statements made by the Government that sufficient funds existed to finance the extensive undertakings projected.

IN SOVIET RUSSIA

Previously described conditions of epidemic and demoralization continued in Petrograd. Deaths from cholera and dysentery had risen from 200 to 300 a day, sanitary conditions were intolerable, and many hospitals had closed owing to scarcity of food and medicine. Carts jogging along with many coffins, containing the bodies of the dead, were a common sight. The State Bank had been looted of more than 2,000,000 rubles. Officers were deserting from the Bolshevik army, and Trotzky, the Soviet Minister of War, had ordered the punishment of their families. Moscow was declared in a state of siege, due to the advance of Mamontov and Denikin. All youths of 15 and 17 years had been called to the colors. A Soviet Government appeal, the text of which reached London on Sept. 22, admitted the loss of important cities in the south, and called on the workmen and peasants to "conquer the coal and the factories, which will give us the indispensable." It added: "Defeat Denikin and again the factory chimneys will smoke and the locomotives and trains of wheat will circulate." The Council of People's Commissaries in Moscow had ordered Admiral Kolchak and his Ministers outlawed.

At about this time Leon Trotzky, in a speech delivered in Petrograd, announced the determination of the Soviet Government to defeat its enemies one by one. Peace had been offered the Balkan States, he declared, because they were insignificant. Denikin, like Kolchak, would be defeated and driven back, and then would come the turn of Poland and Rumania. If Finland tried to intervene in Russian affairs, war would be waged on her also. The contest was placed by Trotzky and his Government on the ground of a worldwide conspiracy against the world's proletariat, and a Moscow wireless charged that Germany and Great Britain had concluded a secret compact to secure this end. Paris advices reported that the Soviet Government was endeavoring to recruit soldiers for the Red Army from Austria and Germany; in the former country these efforts had been unsuccessful, but many Germans had crossed the frontier, including deserting soldiers, and joined the Soviet forces.

A wireless dispatch of Sept. 23 reported the discovery of a widespread anti-Bolshevik plot in Soviet Russia, which led to the arrest and execution of sixty-seven men, including some of distinguished rank and attainments. The plot originated in Moscow. Among those executed were the former Duma member, N. N. Scheptin, and Professor Astrov, both influential adherents of the "Cadet" Party; Professor Volkov, Prince Obolensky, and Generals Kuznetsov and Machov. Others arrested were Prince Andrenikov, Baron Stroberg, and M. Roza-nov, a widely known Menshevik leader. Travelers returning from Moscow at that time stated that the episode had brought a renewal of the Red terror, and that all persons coming under the slightest suspicion were immediately arrested. The Bolshevik official organ, the Izvestia, commented on the affair as follows:

At the time when Denikin's hordes had entered the heart of Soviet Russia spies prepared a rebellion at Moscow. The so-called National Centre Party intended to seize the reins of power, but the plot was discovered and members of the party were arrested at Moscow and Petrograd.

In addition to members of technical and military clubs, among the prisoners were Generals, Princes, teachers, and officers who had given Denikin and Judenitch information regarding the movements of the Red Army. The conspirators also possessed arms. Sixty-seven of them were executed, among these being several well-known scientists.

BOMBS IN THE KREMLIN

An event even more sensational occurred in Moscow on Sept. 25, when thirteen Bolshevik commissaries were killed by a bomb thrown during a meeting of the Moscow Soviet in the Kremlin. Advices to the State Department indicated that this was the second bomb attack that had occurred. As a result of this second attack the Bolshevik authorities had appointed an extraordinary commission to handle the situation, and had placed the city under martial law. Among the victims was the notorious Jacob Peters, who had been called the "Chief Executioner of the Russian Revolution." An English criminal, a rag-picker implicated and arrested in connection with the killing of three policemen, this man had become the most sinister figure of the Bolshevik Red Terror, a man whose power over life and death was absolute, who was depicted in the early days of the Bolshevik ascendancy as signing death warrants without even looking at them, and who mocked the relatives of his victims when they came to inquire about the fate of those executed. The orgy of slaughter in which he indulged with Zinoviev, President of the Petrograd Soviet, and Shatov, formerly a New York anarchist, head of the Extraordinary Commission against the Counter-Revolution, appalled Lenin, who vainly protested, and whose power in internal affairs waned in consequence.

A Soviet wireless dispatch of Oct. 5 intercepted at Omsk declared that the situation had never been so serious and that the anti-Bolshevik forces converging from all sides on Moscow had never approached so near. The dispatch stated that anti-Bolshevik armies were moving toward the heart of the Soviet Government from all directions, that Bolshevik organizations were disintegrating, and that there were only 9,000 members of the party left in Moscow. Danish advices of Oct. 13 stated that the Bolsheviks were calling a council of their leaders to discuss the situation. At this time the Central Committee of the Moscow Soviet had resolved to declare martial law and to create a special committee, with the fullest authority, to fight the Counter-Revolutionary League, which still had ramifications in various parts of the country.

The Swedish Foreign Department on Oct. 10 confirmed the reports disseminated shortly before of the sacking of the Swedish Legation in Petrograd and the Consular offices in Petrograd and Moscow by the Bolshevik authorities, declaring that valuables and private deposits aggregating 12,000,000 rubles had been confiscated.

AMERICAN EMBASSY SACKED

A detailed account of the sacking of the American Embassy in Petrograd last July was published in London for the first time on Oct. 2. According to this account, Commissary Karolov took possession of the embassy in the morning of July 10. Every cupboard and press was searched, doors were burst open, and a fruitless search for provisions, valuables, and firearms was conducted. In a second search a week later Soviet soldiers stripped the place of practically everything. When the soldiers had finished, the crowd burst in and looted what was left. Members of the Red Army then took up their quarters in the embassy, which they turned into a species of inn.

On Oct. 16 the text of a note from the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference inviting Germany to participate in a combined blockade of Soviet Russia was published by the Berlin Tageblatt. This note indicated that Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Finland, Spain, Switzerland, Mexico, Chile, Argentina, Colombia, and Venezuela had also been invited to initiate measures to prevent their nationals from engaging in any trade with Bolshevik Russia. The preamble to the note declared that the open enmity of the Bolsheviks was directed against all Governments and that programs of international evolution, circulated by them, constituted a grave danger to the national security of all the powers. Every increase in the capacity of the Bolsheviks for resistance increased this danger, the preamble added, and it was desirable that all nations wishing peace and the re-establishment of social order should unite to resist Bolshevik government. For this reason, it was further declared, the allied and associated Governments, after raising the blockade of Germany, had refused permission to their nationals to resume commercial relations with Bolshevik Russia. The measures to be taken were thus enumerated:

First.—Refusal of permission to sail to every ship bound for a Russian Bolshevik port and the closing of all ports to ships from Bolshevik Russia.

Second.—Similar regulations to be adopted with regard to all goods destined for Russia by any other route.

Third.—Passports will be refused to all persons to or from Bolshevik Russia.

Isolated exceptions may be made by agreement of the allied and associated powers.

Fourth.—Measures will be taken to hinder the banks from granting credit to commercial undertakings in Bolshevik Russia.

Fifth.—Every Government will refuse its nationals any facilities of intercourse with Bolshevik Russia, whether by post or wireless telegraphy.

Marshal Foch added the following instruction:

Inform the German Government that the British and French men-of-war in the Gulf of Finland will continue to blockade Bolshevik ports and detain from the moment they come in sight ships bound for Bolshevik ports.

The German Government was requested to take measures in conformity with those enumerated.

The decision to authorize the inter-allied Generalissimo to make this request of Germany was reached as early as Aug. 19; the concrete plan of a formal note to this effect to Germany and the neutral nations was determined on Sept. 30. Secretary Polk, head of the American delegation, helped draw up the note to the neutrals, the text of which was different from that forwarded to Berlin only in the phrasing of the preamble. The invitation had not been formally considered by the German Government on Oct. 13, but a statement had been issued indicating that the Cabinet's answer would be of a temporizing nature.

German Troops in the Baltic States

Ultimatum to Von der Goltz

[PERIOD ENDED OCT. 18, 1919.—SEE MAP ON PAGE 301]

THE gravest problem with which the Peace Conference had to deal in the Baltic region was the continued refusal of the German troops under General von der Goltz to withdraw from Courland and adjoining provinces. The Berlin Government professed to be unable to compel the return of these forces, which were suspected of lending their aid to Junker designs for gaining a permanent foothold in the Baltic region.

A letter from an American Army officer made public by the American Relief Administration toward the end of September stated that there were 100,000 German troops in Latvia, and that von der Goltz was receiving more troops than he sent home. The whole City of Mitau, only twenty-five miles from the Lett capital, was occupied by them. Acts of violence committed by them on the Letts were described. Promises of land and money were contained in German official communications. The allied officers were ignored or insulted. Machine guns were posted everywhere, and the whole region was under the military rule of the German invaders.

On Sept. 15 it was reported from Polish sources that 200 Polish leaders had been seized by the Germans at Kovno, Lithuania.

On the same date the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference decided to send Germany another note. After hearing General Foch, the council decided that there was no merit in the German Government's assertion that it was not responsible for the acts of von der Goltz, and that it must compel his withdrawal. In its communications with the conference the German Government professed inability to control these troops in the Baltic Provinces, and blamed von der Goltz and the German Barons for the continued presence of the German forces in the forbidden territory.

ULTIMATUM OF ALLIES

The Supreme Council on Sept. 28 dispatched a note to the German Government which was equivalent to an ultimatum. The text of this note, made public by the Washington Government on Sept. 30, was as follows:

According to the terms of Article 12 of the armistice of Nov. 11, 1918, Germany subscribed to the following engagement:

"All German troops at present in any territory which before the war belonged to Austria-Hungary, Rumania, or Turkey shall withdraw within the frontiers of Germany as they existed Aug. 1, 1914, and all German troops at present in territories which before the war formed part of Russia must likewise return to within the frontiers of Germany, above defined, as soon as the Allies shall think the moment suitable, having regard to the internal situation in these territories."

Under date of Aug. 27 Marshal Foch, Commander in Chief of the allied and associated armies, made known the time had come for Germany to evacuate the said territories, and summoned the German Government to proceed thereto immediately.

By its note of Sept. 3 the German Government endeavored to evade the engagement above referred to by alleging pretexts which the allied and associated powers were unable to consider.

The allied and associated Governments particularly refuse to admit that the German Government can, in order to avoid responsibility upon it, shield itself behind alleged inability to enforce obedience to its orders by troops in the Baltic regions.

They therefore request the German Government to proceed without delay to the evacuation of all German troops, staffs, and services included now in the Baltic Provinces. The German Government will immediately take the necessary steps to withdraw within aforesaid boundaries all German officers and soldiers who have enlisted since the demobilization in Russian corps organized in said Baltic Provinces and will withhold authorization for and strictly forbid enlistment in said corps.

Evacuation must be started immediately and must continue without interruption. The allied and associated Governments hereby notify that, unless they are satisfied that their demands are being effectively executed, they will not entertain any of the applications put forward by the German Government for supplies of foodstuffs and raw materials. They have consequently given instructions not to proceed with the examination of any of these applications.

Furthermore, the allied and associated Governments will refuse all financial facilities which the German Government is enjoying at the present time, or which it is seeking from the allied and associated Governments or their nationals.

In the event of non-compliance on the part of the German Government the allied and associated powers will take such measures as they shall judge necessary to enforce the aforesaid terms of the armistice.

GERMAN OFFICIAL ATTITUDE

In Berlin on Oct. 3 it was said that though Noske and other members of the Government had believed that von der Goltz entertained no counter-revolutionary ideas, but merely sought to do his best for the Fatherland, the situation had begun to be serious. Von der Goltz himself had remained absolutely silent regarding his intentions, merely acknowledging Noske's urgent summons to return immediately with his troops unless he wished to forfeit his own and all his officers' pensions, and expose Germany to "vengeful" measures by the Entente.

Though the Government feared von der Goltz's unruly troops, they feared even more the threatened blockade, and had already cut off supplies to the Baltic army. They had also dissolved what in the Prussian War Office was known as the Department for the White Russian Army, opened by anti-Bolshevist Russian nationalists in Berlin and headed in the Baltic by a Russian, Colonel Avalov-Bermond. Though von der Goltz had received the German Government's order to evacuate, he had not moved; and on Oct. 1 Colonel Avalov-Bermond had been ordered to report immediately at General Headquarters in Mitau to receive instructions concerning his new command; this order was signed, "Von der Goltz, Commanding General, Main Headquarters, Mitau." Rumors of a contemplated coup, by which von der Goltz would proclaim himself dictator of the whole Baltic region, were rife among German military officers who had recently returned from this district.

Official notice was given at Paris on Oct. 5 that Germany had delivered to General Dupont, commander of the Inter-allied Mission at Berlin, a memorandum stating that it had recalled General von der Goltz, and on Sept. 25 had stopped pay, supplies, and munitions to the German troops in the Baltic Provinces and in Lithuania, and asserting that it was doing everything possible to bring about the withdrawal of the German soldiers in accordance with the demands of the Supreme Council. General von Eberhard had been appointed in place of General von der Goltz to take charge of the evacuation. The memorandum insisted that with these measures Germany had exhausted its means of coercion, and requested the appointment of an allied commission to visit the Baltic Provinces and verify this fact.

GERMAN EXCUSES CONSIDERED

On Oct. 7 the Supreme Council discussed the German Government's memorandum reply and decided to send another note. The paragraph of the German reply referring to the stoppage of pay was taken as evidence that the German authorities had long continued the pay of soldiers who, by their own admission, were "rebellious." On the same date Herr Bauer, the German Chancellor, in a speech before the National Assembly, said that decisive measures for the evacuation of the Baltic Provinces had been taken, and that news of this had been communicated to the Entente three days before the ultimatum had been received. He said:

I protest before the whole world against this ultimatum. It is not thus that we have imagined the dawn of the new era provided for by the League of Nations.

GERMAN ASSAULT ON RIGA

On Oct. 8 the nominally Russian army under the pro-German Colonel, Avalov-Bermond, opened a bombardment on Riga. The Letts offered heroic resistance on a ten-mile front, but on Oct. 10, under furious attacks by the troops of General von der Goltz, with tanks and airplanes, the Lettish army gave way and Bermond's advance guard entered Riga. Bermond then proclaimed Courland and Mitau as belonging to the Russian General Government, and assumed the title of Governor General. Official explanation of his action was given by him in a note handed to the Entente representatives on Oct. 8. The text of this note as published was as follows:

In order to combat Bolshevism, restore order, and secure the safety of my base of action, I have, as head of the Russian army in the western provinces, concluded an agreement with the commanders of the German Army Corps occupying the country, under which I guarantee the gradual withdrawal of their troops and the safety of their transportation to Germany.

In order to help remedy the chaotic state of the administration of the provinces occupied by my troops, I appointed a central committee charged to draft and organize a temporary administration and also to prepare foundations for liberal administrative measures on a democratic basis in accordance with the wishes of the population.

The present Lettish Government began to send a number of Lettish troops against the boundaries of my military base, which violated the neutral zone. This evoked a number of minor collisions where my troops were replacing German posts.

I had given my posts orders, despite the continued provocation, not to let themselves become involved with the Letts and Estonians. The latter interpreted my action as weakness and attacked my positions.

I was compelled to take measures for my military safety and occupy a new line, making it possible to march against and effectively combat Bolshevism and the enemies of my country. I hope that the powers allied with my country will support my endeavors in accordance with treaties and grant me all facilities to take requisite measures.

The Lettish Government, while continuing fighting on the western flank of the city, dispatched an energetic protest to the Peace Conference. The Supreme Council, perturbed by these new Baltic developments, drew up a note to the German Government which included a protest against the attack by German troops on Riga. The note threw full responsibility on the German Government for its failure to oust von der Goltz from the Baltic Provinces, and for the unexpected assault upon the Letts, and reiterated its intention of applying the economic blockade. The note also announced the creation of an interallied commission to control the evacuation insisted upon in the region affected.

Demands that German ships on the Baltic be recalled to their home ports and that all others be forbidden to leave in view of the attack on Riga were received by Germany from the Entente Powers on Oct. 11. Six German merchant ships were seized by the British shortly afterward and taken to Reval.

RECALL OF VON DER GOLTZ

General von der Goltz finally transferred his command in the Baltic region on Oct. 12 to General von Eberhard, who had been appointed to succeed him. The semi-official Berlin statement announcing this change also declared that on the previous day the Government had ordered a complete stoppage of all provisions to the insubordinate troops and of all passenger traffic from Germany toward the Baltic States.

Meanwhile allied cruisers were aiding in the defense of Riga against German attacks, which had been going on continuously for five days. On Oct. 14 the commander of the British naval forces, acting on his own initiative, sent word to Colonel Avalov-Bermondts that he must withdraw from the suburbs of Riga by noon of Oct. 15 or the British warships would bombard his positions. A British-French squadron of more than twenty vessels had arrived before Riga by Oct. 16. The Letts had received 6,000 Estonian reinforcements, and had succeeded in crossing the Dvina both above and below Riga. Premier Ulmanis had been slightly wounded. The Lettish Foreign Minister had been sent to Warsaw to seek aid of the Polish Army. Thus the matter stood when the present article went to press.

On Oct. 8 John Alleyne Gade left the United States to become Commissioner of the United States to the Baltic Provinces of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania. Before departure Mr. Gade stated that his appointment meant that this country would sympathetically follow events in these regions, and particularly would do its share toward forcing Generals von der Goltz and Eberhard and their considerable armies to leave Latvia and Lithuania. Mr. Gade proposed to go direct to Paris before proceeding to the Baltic to learn the exact status at the time of his arrival of the disbanding of the German forces, and to study and advise regarding the question of the food blockade in case of refusal to demobilize.

GERMAN RIGHTS IN LATVIA

Though the Lettish Government in Riga denied the existence of a treaty between Germany and Latvia providing for the conferring of Lettish citizenship and homestead rights upon certain members of the German army in Courland, Vorwärts, the leading organ of the Majority Socialists in Germany, published on Sept. 5 the following text of such an agreement:

Riga, Dec. 29, 1918.

Treaty between the Plenipotentiaries of the German Nation and the Provisional Lettish Government.

1. The Provisional Lettish Government declares its readiness to grant, upon request, full citizenship in the Lettish State to all members of foreign armies who have been active at least four weeks in the Association of Volunteer Formations in the struggle to free the territory of the Lettish State from the Bolsheviks.

2. The German Baltic citizens of the Lettish State receive the right to join the National German Volunteer Associations. On the other hand, for the duration of the campaign, there will be no objections to the use of German officers and non-commissioned officers as instructors in the Association of the German-Lettish Companies of the Landwehr.

3. The right conceded to the German Balts in the treaty of Dec. 7 to organize seven national companies and two batteries in the Association of the Landwehr is expressly guaranteed by the Provisional Government, even if Paragraph 2 of the present arrangements should lead to the temporary dissolution of the German-Balto associations. In case the number of the Lettish companies of the Landwehr is increased, there is to be a corresponding increase in the number of the German companies.

4. The lists of enrollment and discharge of volunteers made necessary for the carrying out of Paragraph 1 will be sent to the Provisional Government at least once a week. On the basis of these lists the contracting parties will determine which German citizens have earned the right to citizenship according to Paragraph 1.

(Signed)

AUGUST WINNIG,

German Envoy in Riga.

K. ULMANIS, Premier.

FR. PAEGEL,

J. SANLITS.

In its introduction to the treaty Vorwärts said that according to its terms the "German Courland warriors have earned Lettish citizenship and therewith (damit) the right of settlement (Siedlung)," implying that full Lettish citizenship included the right to the land claimed by Von der Goltz's recalcitrant troops.

Massacres of Jews in the Ukraine

Petlura's Troops Accused

THE Zionist Organization of America, with headquarters in New York, made public on Oct. 10, 1919, the substance of authentic reports describing massacres of more than 30,000 Jews in the Ukraine. The reports in question were made by two Ukrainian journalists who had escaped to London—Dr. A. Korálnik and Meir Grossman, a member of the Jewish National Assembly in the Ukraine—and their accuracy is vouched for by the Jewish National Secretariat and the Zionist Organization of America. The witnesses declare that the murders were the work both of Petlura's troops and of the Bolshevik Reds, as well as of General Gregoriev, many of whose officers are ex-members of the Czar's notorious Black Hundred. The Zionist Organization's summary is in part as follows:

Attached to the report is a list of thirty-eight towns in Southern Russia where these massacres occurred. Five thousand and five hundred were killed at Proskurov. Two thousand were killed in Elizabethgrad. There the mob threw bombs into the cellars where whole families had taken refuge.

In Zabakritch the butchery lasted two days. The Jews had locked themselves in their houses. The bandits entered and in grim silence struck the Jews down one after another. At Tcherkassi 800 were killed. At Litire 400. The whole population of Bobri, an agricultural colony, was exterminated, except one old woman and five children. The Jewish communities of Koublitsh, Alexandrovna, Medjibage and Radomysl were wiped out. At Hahidievka all the men, 300 in number, were killed. The town of Novi-Mishevide was set afire and 200 killed. Four hundred were killed at Freschtine and 500 at Harssine.

The report sets forth that at the present moment the Ukraine is divided into the following regions of power:

1. Bolsheviks hold the provinces of Kiev, Tchernigov, parts of Podolia, Volhynia and Ekaterinoslav.

2. Denikin holds Kharkov, Kherson, Poltava, the Crimea, and parts of the Province of Ekaterinoslav.

3. Between both regions Petlura, the so-called Ukrainian Directorate, occupies parts of the Provinces of Podolia and Volhynia.

4. In the whole of the Ukraine region there are large robber bands of various dimensions.

The whole period from the end of November, 1918, is filled with a series of pogroms. They were committed partly by the troops, partly by the civilian population, especially by the lower middle-classes, and also by the peasants and workmen. The principal culprits were the troops of Petlura and Grigoriev, whose officers in many cases belong to the Black Hundred, as well as countless bands. The Bolshevik troops have also committed many pogroms, but their military commanders took rigorous measures against them and had many hundreds of soldiers shot who had taken part in the excesses. But the military authorities had to yield in the end to the anti-semitic feeling to the extent of refraining from sending the Jewish commission to the front.

Three main periods of the pogroms can be distinguished. The first period was during the victorious campaigns of Petliura against the Hetman, November, 1918, to January, 1919, which includes particularly the terrible pogroms of Zhitomir and Ovrutch. The second period was from February to April, 1919, when the Petliura troops were on the retreat before the Bolsheviks, and countless bands arose. Particularly disastrous was the two days' massacre at Proskurov, February 14 and 15, of which Colonel Simosenki was the organizer. It has been absolutely established and registered that 1,700 Jews were murdered on this occasion. In many cases entire families were completely wiped out.

When the Central Relief Committee learned of the pogroms, it sent a commissioner with 100,000 rubles to Proskurov to assist the survivors, but the commissioner often did not know to whom he should give the money, as there were no survivors at all.

At Filtschtn, near Proskurov, 400 Jews were killed. An especially terrible affair was the holding up of a steamer on the Dnieper, in the vicinity of Menachikorie, near Kiev, when 103 Jews were seized on board and drowned. Over sixty corpses were recovered.

The worst period has been raging since April of this year. The troops of Grigoriev upon capturing Tscherkassi put to death 800 persons there. Equally terrible were the excesses at Elizabethgrad, where about 2,000 were killed. At Trostientetz there was a Bolshevik garrison, and when the peasants rose against the Bolshevik authority the Christian section of the garrison went over to their side and disarmed their Jewish comrades. Thereupon, all the Jewish inhabitants of the little town—down to those who were 12 years of age—were locked into a communal building and kept in prison there for two days, and after prolonged deliberations were murdered. More than 400 persons were then slain.

The Jewish National Secretariat has drawn up an exact record of all the pogroms from the end of November, 1918, down to May 28, 1919. Pogroms and bloody excesses are recorded to have taken place in 127 places. With regard to another forty or fifty places it cannot be stated definitely what dimensions the excesses assumed, as the Secretariat is unable to get into communication with them. The total number of Jews who are said to have been killed in these pogroms is from 30,000 to 35,000. A long list of names of those murdered is in the hands of the National Secretariat.

The figure given is quite reliable, and probably even falls short of the actual truth.

The Jews tried to organize in self-defense, but this was not permitted by the Bolsheviks, who urged the Jews to join the Red army, if they wished to defend Jewish lives. The pogroms were everywhere marked by the same horrible features, a bestial murder lust and an incredible passion for destruction.

Under the Bolshevik régime nothing has been left of national autonomy, and the numerous Jewish institutions, not only the communities and the local autonomous bodies, but also purely charitable organizations, have been dissolved. The Pogrom Committee was not tolerated, although it contained Socialist members.

But the Bolsheviks did all in their power to suppress the pogroms and to support the survivors. No collections of any kind were permitted, not even for pogrom victims. The Jewish parties have been completely disbanded. All the Jewish newspapers have been suppressed with the exception of the Communist Flag. Schools where Hebrew is the medium of instruction are prohibited, but the Yiddish language is encouraged.

The Zionist organization is described and treated by the Bolsheviks as counter-revolutionary, but it has hitherto been impossible to suppress it. As political activity is now out of the question, all energy is concentrated upon Palestine work. The registration of would-be emigrants has been taken in hand, and more than seventy Achuzoth and numerous co-operative migration companies have been formed. The Zionist central office at Kiev is still in existence. The eagerness to emigrate is exceedingly great, and it is only with the utmost difficulty that those anxious to leave the country can be withheld from a precipitate exodus. The Jewish National Secretariat, elected by the National Assembly, continues its activity, although under prohibition, and it has endeavored to preserve the communal institutions.

Creating the Russian Communist Army

Official Account of Methods Adopted, Including Conscriptioin of Peasants and Forced Service of Officers

By LEON TROTZKY

[BOLSHEVIST MINISTER OF WAR]

This article, translated from the official Soviet organ, the Pravda, of Feb. 25, 1919, is a description of the methods used in creating the Red Army of Russia, which fought on all the Bolshevist fronts during the Spring and Summer. Not the least interesting portion of the document is Trotsky's explanation of why the Communist Government has adopted the military methods of "imperialist" and "bourgeois" nations.

THE old program of Social Democracy demanded, among other things, a national militia, this militia to be based on the military training of all citizens capable of bearing arms, but not to be concentrated in barracks. This program was a challenge, raised during the period of the Second Internationale, against the standing armies of imperialism with their barrack-room service, their prolonged military education, and their officer caste. * * * The "peaceful" development of capitalism and the policy adopted by the proletariat of pursuing its class war by means of the most legal methods available * * * had this result, that Social Democracy's task was most naturally conceived to be that of introducing an even larger measure of democracy into the organization of the capitalist State and the capitalist army. This struggle had undoubtedly great educative influence, but the experience of the last war has shown that its results were even less than those of the struggle for democratizing the parliamentary institutions of bourgeois society. * * * As soon as bourgeois interests came to be fundamentally threatened by the condition of international and interstate relations, the bourgeois militarism of France, England, America, and Switzerland * * * displayed in an identical form the most demoralized and ruthless spirit of class rule.

But once class war becomes open civil war * * * the solution of a national militia becomes as meaningless as the solution of democratic parliamentarianism. * * * The dissolution of the Constituent Assembly served to frustrate the efforts of the landlord and of the capitalist to restore his power; on the same principle Generals Krasnov and Kolchak are using the solution of the national army to serve their own purposes. It requires the provincial stupidity of a Kautsky to go on talking, after all the experiences of the Russian revolution, about the claims of formal democracy to organize the power of the State and the army, at a time when the German National Assembly is fleeing from Berlin to Weimar and putting itself under the protection of the White Guard, while General Hoffman [on the Polish frontier] is forming his units from among the sons of the Junkers and of the bourgeois exploiting classes. Meanwhile, the Spartacists arm the revolutionary workers. The present phase of the proletarian revolution can only be the phase of open civil war by the proletariat against any and every bourgeois authority and bourgeois army. * * *

MILITIA ON CLASS BASIS

Although we have now outgrown, among the other discarded ideas of the previous period, the so-called popular idea of a militia * * * we do not in principle repudiate the idea of a militia as such. We are reforming political democracy on a class basis, and changing it into a democracy of Soviets; in the same way we are putting the militia on to a class basis, and changing it into a militia of the Soviets. Consequently, our next task will be to create an army of workers and small peasants, to give it compulsory military training without forcing it into barracks, and, in doing this, to maintain as far as possible conditions which shall be in harmony with the working conditions of the laboring population.

Yet the actual progress of our Red Army might appear to contradict this program. At first we formed an army of volunteers; then we introduced compulsory military training for all workers and peasants who were not employers of the labor of others, and simultaneously made a beginning of conscribing a number of years of the laboring classes. These may have been contradictory actions, but they were no casual errors; they were the result of circumstances, and simply unavoidable and transitory steps in creating an army under the conditions forced on us by the imperialist war and the bourgeois (February) revolution.

The ruinous breakdown of the old army, and of its whole system of organization, meant that no fighting forces could be formed except from volunteers. * * * It was not until the great masses of the old army had been absorbed into the towns and villages, and new local military institutions set up, such as local, district, and central recruiting and commissariat agencies, that a beginning could be made of proceeding from volunteer corps to conscription.

There was a time when the method of free corps was the only possible method for the proletariat. This was a consequence of previous oppression exercised by the State. In just the same way the proletariat had once been forced to use secret meetings and subterranean printing presses in order to organize itself. But when the proletariat conquered political power it was in a position to make use of the State apparatus in order to proceed systematically to the formation of a centralized army, a uniform organization, and those uniform institutions through which alone the greatest results may be obtained at the cost of the smallest sacrifices. * * *

CONSCRIPTION OF PEASANTS

It is in theory incontrovertible that we shall get the best army by the use of universal conscription of the workers and of the working peasants, if such conscription is so arranged as to fit into the day's work. A universal rehabilitation of industry, and an increased output in the total amount of agricultural labor and agricultural products, would give an improved basis for the army. Units, battalions, regiments, brigades, divisions, would have to correspond with workshops, whole factories, villages, districts, circuits, provinces. Such an army would be unsurpassed; its organization would proceed side by side with the economic restoration of the whole country and the training of an officer class. Such an army is our goal, and we know today that sooner or later we shall have it.

But the instant and direct opposition of our class enemies, at home and abroad, prevented us from forming such a workers' and peasants' militia on the "organic" methods described. It would have needed several years, or at least a great many months. Circumstances had originally forced us to create volunteer corps immediately after the October revolution. In the same way during the succeeding period—i. e., during the Summer of last year, when the iron ring with which the imperialists in all countries wanted to throttle us was being drawn ever more tightly round Russia—we were forced to hurry on our military institutions. We began by mobilizing several years all over Russia, and by hurrying on their training and drafting in the barracks. Our aim was to turn the barracks into a military school, where not only military training might be acquired, but political education and political discipline also. Our present active army, in service or in training, presents the transitional type we have described. In its social formation it is a class army; yet it is no militia, but a regular "standing" army with the corresponding methods of training. We can assert with complete satisfaction that this type of army, created under the most unfavorable circumstances, has already proved itself able to get the better of its enemies.

UNIVERSAL TRAINING

Simultaneously with our use of barrack units and field units—these last are only formed in the zone of operations—we are everywhere carrying on the military training of workers and peasants. We view the first steps of this universal training in the light of a rough preparation and an acquirement of certain methods which every fighter must master. This will make further training easier when the soldier is drafted into our regular units. It has already been proved that, in spite of its restricted operation, universal military training has been of the utmost use in reconstituting the army. * * *

Thus the militia army on a class basis does not mean an army casually created, partly improvised, and mostly untrained, whose equipment is the result of accident and whose commanding officers are without the necessary technical knowledge. On the contrary, universal training is designed to equip the individual soldier, as also the whole unit, with greater familiarity in all methods of manoeuvring, shooting, and military practices. The militia army must be absolutely up to date as regards scientific knowledge, equipment, and organization.

INCULCATING COMMUNISM

Our Commissaries for Military Affairs are not only to be the direct representatives of the Soviet Government; they are destined, above all, to inspire the army with the spirit of our party, with its sense of discipline, its firmness, its courage in fighting for the realization of ideas once conceived. Our party may reflect with the most complete satisfaction on the heroic behavior of the Commissaries it has dispatched; together with the best elements of the staff, they have created an effective army within the shortest possible time. * * *

Our commanding officers will, however, only be able to obtain complete results if they can reckon on the support of organizations of communist soldiers in each unit. Our best guarantee, therefore, for impregnating the armies with the ideas and discipline of communism will be the rapid and overwhelming growth of such communist organizations. Considering the significance which these communist organizations play in the army, it ought to be the aim of our commanding officers and of our riper comrades in the army to prevent these organizations from admitting unworthy elements. * * *

Nothing will raise the reputation of the communist organizations more than that each soldier should clearly understand that membership of a communist organization can give the soldier no special privileges, but can only impose on him the duty of being an example of self-sacrifice and courage.

The question of command is a very difficult practical question; but in principle there can be no dispute about it. * * *

Even if it were possible to create an entirely new command in the course of several years by means of systematic work, there would yet be no fundamental reason to forego the help of members of the old command, nor does it matter whether these are convinced supporters of the Soviet Government or have been obliged by the force of circumstances to offer their services. To demand that the proletarian army be officered by proletarians only, is, stated thus, mere rhetoric. The revolutionary character of an army is determined, in the first place, by the character of the Soviet Government which creates it, supplies it with an aim, and uses it as an instrument. * * *

EDUCATING NEW OFFICERS

One of our most important tasks in building up our army is to educate a new body of officers, to be formed principally of workers and class-conscious peasants. The increase in the number of courses of instruction and in the number of students attending them proves clearly that the military authorities are alive to their duties. Besides the highest war academy, (of the General Staff,) five schools of the middle type are being formed, which are designed to be an intermediate stage between the academy and the courses of instruction. * * *

The opposition directed by bourgeois democracy (Social Revolutionaries and Mensheviks) against the Soviet Army, which is condemned as a new growth of "militarism" and as the menace of a coming Bonapartism, serves merely to disclose the utter political crudeness or artificiality of these parties. Bonapartism can only appear as the expression of certain quite definite social conditions. It was the political rule of the class of the smaller bourgeoisie which created the conditions indispensable to the rise of Bonapartism. But if that class of the peasantry which may be called the exploiting class is one of the fundamental props of any phase of Bonapartism, then the social composition of our army is the very best guarantee against all Bonapartist tendencies, for the simple reason that this exploiting class of the peasantry is not present in it. Those parodies on Bonapartism of which we have had experience in connection with Generals Krasnov and Kolchak in no way had their origin in the organization of the Red Army, but, on the contrary, arose in direct opposition to it. Skoropadski, the Ukraine Bonaparte "by grace of William II," created his army on a principle directly opposed to our own; he formed his regiments exclusively from the exploiting peasants. * * *

Seeing that our army is only the instrument of a definite method of government, the only satisfactory guarantee against Bonapartism and all other phases of counter-revolution will be found in this government itself. The counter-revolution will never be able to arise out of the government of the proletarian dictatorship; it can only be introduced as the consequence of a direct and bloody victory over this government. But it is just the purpose of the Red Army, of its development and its internal unity, to make such a victory impossible. * * *

"CLASS RULE ONLY TEMPORARY"

The aim of the communist organization is the abolition of all class war by means of the dispersion of all classes. Class militia and class army can, therefore, be no final phenomena. In proportion as social and economic life becomes more highly organized, the work of the Soviet Class State will concentrate more and more on directing production and distribution, and on tasks of culture and administration. Thus will the State lose its class character and raise its own nature by transforming itself into an instrument for economic and cultural life of a self-governing kind. Then, too, will the army lose its class character, and will become a citizen army in the true sense of that term; for in society thus socialized parasitic exploiting elements will no longer exist. The disposition of this army will be directly controlled by the most powerful groups of workers in the socialized republic; its equipment will be guaranteed by the enormous development of socialized processes of production. This army, which will now be nothing less than the trained, armed, socialized, and organized nation, will be the mightiest army which the world has ever seen. Its goal will not be limited to defending the socialized community against the attack of such countries as still remain imperialistic; it will also hasten to support the proletariat of such countries in their own struggle against imperialism.

[Authentic information at the end of August, 1919, indicated that there were then in existence fifteen Bolshevik armies, disposed over four fronts and totaling 485,000 men. On the North Russian front, around Archangel and Murmansk, were two armies totaling 39,000 men. On the West Russian front, from the Gulf of Finland to the Black Sea, were three armies with a total of 167,000 men. The South Russian front, from the Black Sea to Astrakhan, had six armies totaling 146,000 men. The eastern front, from Astrakhan to the North Urals, had five armies comprising 133,000 men. In addition to this total of 485,000 it was estimated that there were approximately 727,000 soldiers in the interior who were still in training or were employed in putting down revolts.]

Converting Soldiers to Bolshevism

Notes of a Russian Prisoner Revealing Lenin's Methods and the Disillusionment of Converts

By PIOTR KRUGLOV

Piotr Kruglov, a Russian prisoner of war in Germany, who escaped and was interned in Denmark, has described in La Renaissance Politique the modus operandi of the agents of Lenin in their efforts to "Bolshevize" 600 prisoners of that kind in the Danish internment camps. His simple narrative, the essential portions of which are here translated for CURRENT HISTORY, is significant as an indication of the mental processes through which the masses in Russia also have passed or are passing in presence of the unfulfilled promises of the Lenin-Trotsky régime.

TOWARD the end of June, 1918, the colony of Russian soldiers at Ribé was in a state of great excitement over the prospect of returning to Russia. Our existence was not so bad; we could eat, walk about, and meditate at our leisure, but life without work begins to pall, and meditation increases desires. Our only wish was to return to our country.

My arrival at Ribé coincided with the moment when every one was striving to find a means of leaving for Russia. The colony was divided into two factions. One of these, presided over by a soldier named Ivan, was called the "Menshevik" Party, and its leaders argued in favor of going to the Murnian Coast to fight with gun in hand against the Bolsheviks, friends of the Germans, whom we so detested. The other party, grouped around a soldier named Nikolai, called itself "Independent." Neither of these two parties knew anything of the underlying principles of Bolshevism or Menshevism.

Despite the efforts of these two political parties, the desire of departure remained unfulfilled. Several soldiers sent requests to the American Consul, asking permission to go to America or to England to look for work. Nikolai and I were among these candidates. We sent a collective request, but we received no reply.

After long discussions we questioned General Potocky, the Military Attaché of the former Russian Legation at Copenhagen, to find out the date of our departure. At the same time we sent a similar request to the Bolshevik representative, Garin. General Potocky answered soon, but his response was negative. Garin made no answer at all. Then we decided to send two delegates to Garin. Nikolai and a soldier named Troitzkov were appointed. The delegates returned two days later. They bore a great number of promises from Garin, and the sum of 70 öres to be given to each soldier. Garin promised also to come in person, and invited us to form a "soviet" of four members.

NIKOLAI CONVERTED

Nikolai was delighted with his visit to Garin. He told us triumphantly how Garin had shaken hands with him and called him "comrade." He had gone to him an "Independent" and returned a Bolshevik. It was, above all, the word "comrade" that charmed him. "Just think!" he said, "the representative of Russia himself called me comrade! But, to tell the truth," he added, "the representative is not very presentable. Quite small and thin, but yet a representative. And he called me comrade! I understood at once that this was something new, and I immediately became a partisan of this 'socialism' and 'Bolshevism.'"

Thus Nikolai told us his impressions. The most important news he bore was that Garin, in the month of June, was said to have repatriated a part of the 1,000 Russian soldiers in the Horseröd

Camp: "There!" we said. "Garin knows the way, and he can send us back to Russia." This news caused us all great joy, and even Ivan and his partisans made no further opposition. The two leaders, Ivan and Nikolai, shook hands with great ceremony.

Nikolai's companion, Troitskov, it is true, showed a certain uneasiness. When he spoke of Garin and his staff he said: "I received the impression that there was not a single Russian there; nothing but Jews. Garin is a Jew, and his wife. * * * You can guess it only by hearing her talk. But what can we do? There's no other way. In captivity we have suffered greatly through the Jews. Very little hope can be based on Jews. But all Jews are not traitors; there are good people among them," he added, trying to encourage his hearers.

GARIN AND HIS PROMISES

The election of the "Soviet" began. They elected Nikolai, Troitzkov, Doulaiev, and myself, but I refused to participate and was replaced by Miagkov. Then we waited for Garin. He arrived only on the evening of the 14th, in an automobile, with two companions. He told us a lot of fine things about the new régime of the Soviets in Russia, and made a lot of promises, of which the most important was that they would begin to send us home within two weeks, every week two detachments of twenty-five men each, or perhaps all together, if "Germany guaranteed that the ship would be neither stopped nor sunk." He gave money to Nikolai to be distributed to the soldiers at the rate of 5 crowns apiece, and then departed, amid loud "hurrahs" for Soviet Russia, for her representative, Garin, and for the hospitality of little Denmark. * * *

The majority were convinced by Garin, but there were pessimists who said: "Who knows? Perhaps he will betray us to the Germans." Others said that Garin was powerless because the Danish Government had not recognized him, but an official telegram announcing that Garin was accepted as representative of Russia dispelled this doubt. "If the Danish Government recognizes him,"

I said to the others, "it also recognizes the Government of Soviet Russia, and if the Soviet Government is recognized by the Danish Government we have no right to doubt its reality. The Bolsheviks, then, are not a band of brigands, as they think in Germany and here in Denmark, but a real Government of the people, because a foreign Government could not recognize a band of brigands. And if the Bolshevik Government is a real National Government, we ought to make an honest attempt to do our duty and to have faith in its representative without discussing the question of whether he is a Jew or a Russian." So I spoke to my comrades, and I would speak in the same way today if I had not learned the horrible falseness of my words.

AWAITING REPATRIATION

On Aug. 26 we left Ribé and arrived in the evening of the same day at Helsingör. Seven kilometers distant from Helsingör was the camp of Horseröd, to which we had been assigned. We had believed we would be sent back to Russia two or three days after our arrival, but we soon discovered that we were not to leave so quickly. At the Horseröd Camp we experienced a whole series of disagreeable surprises. First, at the dock we were met by an armed patrol of considerable numbers who escorted us to the camp. Even in Germany we had never had such an escort as this. Secondly, the camp was surrounded with barbed wire, and we were not allowed to go beyond its confines. Thirdly, the food was worse than at Ribé. And, fourthly, we were given forced labor to do. An epidemic of Spanish influenza, too, was raging there.

We were all furious with the Ribé authorities and with General Potocky, for we thought he had denounced us as brigands and all these new trials were due to him. We became more and more angry with the "old régime" and more and more favorable to Bolshevism. We telephoned to Garin, and he came on Aug. 29. Alas, Garin said that we would leave only at the end of September, on the ground that Germany, as he alleged, had guaranteed that the vessel would be neither stopped nor sunk, but that the Russian Government had but little faith in this promise, and desired this guarantee to be confirmed by the Danish Government.

"It will be safer, won't it, comrades?" said Garin. "And meanwhile we will begin to look after you a little. You must clean yourselves, dress up, and shave. I will have workshops built for you, a school, an office. We will begin to get your passports ready."—As for the camp regulations, he said that some day he would attend with Comrade Vorovsky (a Bolshevik representative in Sweden) the meeting of the committee at the Danish Ministry, and would do his best to have them relaxed. * * * The promises he had made were to have been realized by Sept. 2, but the middle of September came and we had neither workshops, nor an office to draw up passports, nor permission to leave the camp.

HOPE DEFERRED

"He is lying," some said. "He will not have us sent home. None of his promises has been kept. He talks a lot, but does nothing." On Sept. 13 Garin arrived again. "I am prevented from working freely here," he said, to explain his slowness. "The Russian Government has instructed me to protest and address a note to the Danish Government threatening reprisals against Danish subjects residing in Russia, but I hope, comrades, that we shall not be forced to adopt such measures." Two days later Garin's son took charge of the barracks. Next day his father again appeared. He announced that the date of departure had been fixed for Oct. 2, and everything must be ready by that date. The vessel, he asserted, had been chartered for the sum of 25,000 crowns, and for every day of delay after Oct. 2 there would be a penalty of 1,000 crowns. "Try to be ready, comrades," he said; "tomorrow the office will begin to prepare your passports."

He also imparted to us strange news, which gave a shock to our newly acquired Bolshevik ideas of equality and fraternity. We had been led to believe that Bolshevism signified such universal justice that chimney sweeper and Prime Minister alike enjoyed not only political but social equality, that is to say, that they ate the same food, wore the same clothing, and, in short, possessed the same resources of life. But no; even among ourselves, still unavailable to serve Russia and the Russian Government, there existed distinctions differentiated by a different rate of pay.

BOLSHIEVISM NOT EQUALITY

We were divided into four categories: simple soldiers, with a pay of 9 crowns a month; Corporals at 11 crowns; non-commissioned officers at 15 crowns, and Sergeants at 23 crowns. We were amazed. If conditions were such, where was the newness of the new régime? For this new régime ought to differ not only from the Romanov regime, but also from that of the democratic republic of Kerensky. Some said that we should protest to Garin. The Sergeants were filled with confusion, and some even proposed to refuse the increase of pay, but the others reasoned thus: if the situation is such here, then in Russia there is no equality either, and every one must think only of himself and not of others. And the spirit of egotism held so long in check by the lofty ideas of fraternity and equality reappeared again with brutal force. Every one began to do business in the barracks and to dupe his comrades. They sold, bought, and exchanged watches, shoes, underclothing, hats, suits, cigarettes, apples, &c. It was a regular epidemic. The shouting in the barracks was like that at a fair. It had been instinctively understood that Bolshevik "equality" was nothing but a phrase.

I was ashamed to meet those who had asked me previously what communism and Bolshevism were, and to whom I had explained my theories. I discovered that I had lied horribly when I had identified theoretical socialism with Bolshevik reality. "It isn't fraternity; it's rot," the soldiers said upon all sides. "I don't care a rap," replied others, "if only they send us back to Russia, so that we can see our people again." * * *

Garin's son refused to eat with the others—with the "people"—and had his food brought to him from the officers' kitchen; the office clerk spent all his time in serving him. Every one was dissatisfied over this, and we decided to ask Garin himself why such inequality was tolerated. The reply of the Government representative was laconic: "It is not my fault; I have received instructions from Russia." From Russia! If such practices are the order of the day in Russia, where then is the difference between the old régime and the Provisional Government? The Bolsheviks have not abolished the Czar's throne, but the Government of the democratic republic. Why have they done this? The disillusion was general.

DISILLUSIONMENT OF FACTS

Garin began to bring us the Bolshevik Russian newspapers. They were eagerly seized upon. Most of the prisoners could not understand the polemical articles of the Bolsheviks against their political adversaries, and the picture they gave of Bolshevik actions and projects; they limited themselves, therefore, to reading current events and dispatches. But even this chronicle of current events and these dispatches sufficed to disillusion every man who still possessed his mental balance. Every page gave details of the revolts of the peasants against the Bolsheviks, of the punitive expeditions against the peasants who had revolted, &c. The terror inspired by the fierce bands of the Red Guard reigned everywhere. There were revolts of peasants in the Governments of Volodga, Novgorod, Yaroslav, and elsewhere. In the Government of Perm, when the Siberian troops were approaching, revolts took place not only among the peasants of the villages, but even among the factory workmen. But all these movements were pitilessly put down, for the population had been disarmed by the foreseeing Bolsheviks, and the peasants did not possess an organization like that of the Red Guard.

And we read that the peasants were forced to work the land beyond their strength, but the product of this toil, namely, bread, was confiscated at the point of the bayonet and the peasants were beaten with the butts of the guns.

The last cow, the last horse, the last grain of rye was taken by the Red Guard. The Bolshevik press and articles of propaganda repeated unblushingly that the task which they proposed was to destroy every thing and every one opposed to Bolshevism. And as, with the exception of the Red Guard and of the proletariat, which is not large, all were opposed to the Bolsheviks, everything was destroyed, and all were terrorized.

"RURAL PROLETARIAT"

To obtain partisans in the villages the Bolsheviks had tried to divide the rural population into two camps; they had organized in the villages Committees of the Rural Proletariat, and had given them complete power. The idea is absurd. A rural proletariat does not exist. According to the Russian rural communal system, the land belonging to a village is divided up among all the members of the commune, and every ten or fifteen years this division is renewed. If the village owns but little land, all its inhabitants are poor, and if the village owns much arable land its inhabitants are relatively well off. But of course the material level of all the members of a commune is not always the same. Generally it is those who possess inferior intelligence or who are victims of alcohol who are poorer than others. And those were the elements which, backed up by the bayonets of the Red Guard, were made the despots of the village.

And we read that the school teachers belonging to the Union of School Teachers of all Russia had also opposed the domination of the Bolsheviks, and were suffering greatly from economic pressure. While the soldiers of the Red Guard received complete support and 150 rubles monthly, the school teachers received only 80 rubles to pay all their living expenses; which, in view of the enormous cost of living, appeared to be impossible.

As for education in general, we read lying articles which contained promises to send all the proletariat to the universities; and yet at the same time admitted that the majority of primary schools had been closed because of the lack of books, paper, pencils, pens, &c., or else as the result of reprisals by the Red Guard against the school faculty. And we read of a complete devastation of the universities and colleges, of incessant reprisals against the teachers. These, it appeared, were the preparatory labors on which obligatory popular education was to be based. These Pugatchevs of the twentieth century, it was clear, wished to annihilate all those who did not agree with the ideas of the "class."

ENEMIES OF CIVILIZATION

I thought, as I read these things: Are not these the Huns of the future, of whom the Russian philosopher Soloviev spoke? If they really get the power of the world into their hands, scholars and poets, as that philosopher said, "will have to hide the eternal light of science in deserts and catacombs." But that is impossible. Europe will not follow their example. It would mean political and intellectual death, because agricultural Asia, with its population of 500,000,000, would not follow that example, and would come to crush Europe, deprived of its main source of power—intelligence. Siberia is only the first bastion of Asiatic opposition.

[Garin's promises continued, and were repeatedly broken. Garin came in person to announce departure on a Russian steamer. A few days afterward an organized system of Bolshevik propaganda was established at the camp. A clerk named Pavlov, a former teacher, opened a series of lectures on political subjects. At one of these lectures Pavlov spoke with the greatest reservations of political conditions in Bolshevik Russia, when the door opened, and Nikolai, who had become an ardent Bolshevik, entered. The narrator continues:]

Pavlov paused and began to talk quite differently. He praised Bolshevism and the Soviet Government, and calumniated the Constituent Assembly. He was afraid of Nikolai, who reported everything to Garin. Nikolai, on his part, added some very stupid observations lauding the glory of Bolshevism. Sapitza and I began to protest against these panegyrics, and little by little the discussion became very animated. I cited the newspaper articles showing the nightmarish life of Russia and the exploitation of the peasants. I pointed out Garin and his family as a good example of Bolshevik mentality, and the difference between their words and their deeds. Some protested, but the majority agreed with Sapitza and myself. This was the last lecture.

SAPITZA'S INTERVIEW

[It was finally decided that the "Soviet" should frankly inform Garin's son of the general feeling of dissatisfaction. Sapitza undertook this mission; the other members of the "Soviet" having refused through fear of the consequences. The conversation between Sapitza and Garin, as he told it himself, was as follows:]

"On Oct. 10 I went to Garin and told him that I wished to speak to him without witnesses. 'As you please; willingly.' I asked him then, 'How are official persons appointed in Russia at the present time? Who appoints them?' He replied, 'The people.' 'Who appointed you?' 'I was appointed by three people.' But three people are not the people. Then I said: 'You, Alexis, are young and strong; you can do everything for yourself; be reasonable, and refuse the services of the man who waits on you. Do not allow a soldier who has been imprisoned for four years to shine your shoes and make your bed by compulsion.' Garin answered, 'But he receives money for his work.' I was very much surprised by this reply. 'But,' I said, 'the old régime consists of the fact that one pays and another works for him. What ideas, then, do you and your father defend? Your father says that we must economize the money of the people, and we approved of this, but in reality the money of the people is beginning to produce a new bourgeoisie. You may kill a man, but you cannot kill a bourgeois, because the bourgeois has taken his place in the heart of the slayer. You must first kill the bourgeois in your own heart, instead of shedding the blood of others with bayonets and red flags.' Garin made no reply."

On Oct. 11 Garin senior arrived. He entered the office very much excited, and said: "What's the matter here? I am distrusted here? I have been elected by 170,000,000 people, and here 600 low rascals make me the object of their suspicions?" Then he spoke to the whole camp, told a lot of fine stories, and finally declared that if the boat did not arrive by Oct. 20 we would leave on the 22d on the Danish vessel which had been already chartered for 25,000 crowns. (Again!) Now no one believed a word of what Garin said. We began to use the expression "Garin says" as a symbol of falsehood. Those who had money began to escape, and made their way to Stockholm.

On Oct. 22 no boat had arrived. The Bolshevik newspapers furthermore bore frightful news from Russia. The Bolsheviks had decided to mobilize at all cost an army of 3,000,000 men, and every man in Russia was sure that he would have to serve in the Red Army. There were but few of us disposed to do any more fighting, whether with Bolsheviks or against them, and the majority wished to remain in Denmark and look for work. I, personally, was averse to serving in the Red Army. I preferred to be shot. And so the most reasonable thing I could do was to escape from this madhouse. On Oct. 24 Garin published an order saying that in the name of the Government of the Soviets he ordered that all discussions about departure should cease. All those disobeying were threatened with death. New promises followed. Not desiring to wait further, Sapitzka and I left the camp forever.

Five Months in Moscow Prisons

By LUDOVIC NAUDEAU

CORRESPONDENT OF THE PARIS TEMPS.

[CONCLUSION]

M. Naudeau had been arrested by the Soviet Government in Moscow for anti-Soviet utterances in his French paper, the Journal de Russie, and transferred to three separate prisons, each of which represented a descending scale in respect to food and treatment. Thrust, at a moment when he expected liberation, into a solitary cell at Butirky Prison, M. Naudeau almost gave way to despair. The monotony of his melancholy thoughts was broken by an interview with Captain Sadoul of the French Military Mission, who was said to be a kind of intermediary between the French inhabitants of Moscow and the Soviet authorities. Sadoul, at the instance of the Bolshevik Commissary Peters, sought vainly to persuade M. Naudeau to declare his acceptance of the Soviet principles, and to renounce his former advocacy of allied intervention. The narrative of the author's fourth month of captivity proceeds:

ONE November morning we suddenly heard a great hubbub in all the corridors and on all floors; many doors were opened, and immediately closed again and bolted; everything indicated that a considerable number of prisoners had been brought at the same time and shut up in cells near mine. These new-comers were Russians, and Russians who seemed to intimidate our jailers, for unceasingly they shouted and cried to each other from one cell to another, and no jailer dared to bid them be silent, or to close the wicket window in their door.

I soon learned that these howlers belonged to a band of about fifteen sailors who up to this time had been members of the special guard of the Extraordinary Commission. The reader may easily divine what ruffians they were. The men who become the Mamelukes of Djerjinsky and Peters are by temperament gunmen, killers, torturers; they belong to the most barbarous elements of the army and navy. We never knew exactly what kind of insubordination these men had committed. Some of the jailers assured us that their exactions and ferocity had finally filled even the commission with alarm. We were told also that they had refused to go to Petrograd to embark on Bolshevik ships and fight against the British cruisers which made frequent raids into the Gulf of Finland.

CAPTURED BY DECEPTION

At all events, Djerjinsky, Peters, and their henchmen judged it necessary to get rid of these radicals. But it was not easy to take them openly; they were always armed to the teeth, and it was known that they would resist to the last. So a trap was laid for them with all that cunning which is characteristic of the Bolshevik leaders, and which permits them, a mere handful of men, to tyrannize over all Russia. The sailors were notified one morning that they should go to Butirky, where they were to put to death a certain number of counter-revolutionaries who had been so bold as to revolt. So the whole pack started off joyously after their quarry. They were received cordially at the prison, ushered into one courtyard, then into another, and finally into a third, where they were told that the execution would soon take place.

The officials withdrew ostensibly to bring the men condemned to death, and the sailors did not notice that as they departed they padlocked the gates rapidly behind them. But what was going on at several windows looking down upon the courtyard? The bewildered sailors saw the muzzles of machine guns gleaming there. Groups of soldiers crowded into other windows: "Down with your arms or you are all dead men!" they cried to the scoundrels. The former janissaries of the commission knew from experience that at the least sign of resistance the machine guns would mow them down. Crestfallen, they threw down rifles and revolvers. When these weapons had been taken possession of the scoundrels were seized, and permitted themselves to be placed in cells.

But the jailers, despite all, feared to give offense to these individuals whom some sudden change might not only liberate but bring back again into power. The latter divined this feeling, and though they were reduced to a level with all the other prisoners they proved their independence by holding converse uninterruptedly. From one cell to another their unceasing cries resounded. Through my wicket, slightly ajar, I saw them go walking on several occasions. Some of them were men of bestial physiognomy, low-browed, of fierce and yet vaguely uneasy glance; nothing, in short, distinguished them from the majority of the madmen whom social disorders inevitably bring forth. * * * Among these uncouth individuals, for whom an excuse could have been found in the wretchedness of their birth; the jailers, with evidences of considerable surprise, pointed out a young man dressed as a sailor, but whom they knew to be a naval officer. He had, of course, received some education, and even spoke several languages, and yet he seemed to be quite at ease among these malefactors, and responded to their jesting heartily. * * *

OTHER FELLOW-PRISONERS

Thus the human beings who surrounded me in this prison were so varied that they formed in some wise a symbolic representation of the Russian world swept by the gigantic tidal wave of revolution. I was living near a band of murderers who only the day before were executing the orders of the commission. But also quite near me there lived a former minister, an ex-orderly of General Kornilov, a university professor, numerous Church dignitaries, and Mr. Lvov, Marshal of Moscow nobility and own brother of that Prince Lvov who was President of the council from the middle of March to the middle of May, 1917. Mr. Lvov sometimes came and rapped at my wicket, according to the signal known to the initiate, and then he would narrate to me the story of his misfortunes. "They have taken everything from me," he said to me once in cautious tones; "they have taken my factories, my ships, my machines, my horses. And today those who were my workmen tell me that until I pay them an indemnity of 2,000,000 rubles I shall not be released from prison. Where do they think I can get 2,000,000 rubles?" * * *

While we were suffering, however, things were happening. The prisoners began to perceive that the amnesty decree was not a scrap of paper, for hundreds of captives were being released each week. Every evening the jailers called out names, and the cry, "Na svobodeu!" (released) resounded joyously, and we saw prisoners laden with big packs hastening down the corridors.

[A member of the Extraordinary Commission, one Skripniak, "who looked like an undertaker in some sub-prefecture," came personally to examine the prisoners; he also entered the cell of M. Naudeau, followed by several Soviet officers, but, on learning that he was a journalist, immediately withdrew with manifestations of disgust and hostility. At about this time M. Naudeau was summoned to the prison office, where a young Police Judge told him he was imprisoned, not because of his Moscow publication, but because he was a correspondent of a large newspaper published in Paris. He refused to take testimony thereupon and withdrew. On Nov. 28 M. Naudeau received a second visit from Captain Sadoul, who again urged him to revoke his former pronouncements in favor of allied intervention, which was the ground on which he had been arrested. This he again obstinately refused to do, alleging that he had taken a vow to write nothing until he was placed in liberty. Soon after this he was relieved of his state of "strict solitude" and given the company of a British officer captured at Archangel. With this officer he was talking one day when he was summoned quite suddenly to pack all his things quickly. His jailers brought him by automobile to the headquarters of the Extraordinary Commission, which had been his first place of captivity after his arrest. The narrative of M. Naudeau continues as follows:]

TERMS OF LIBERATION

A soldier bearing a gun led me down corridors, up stairways, through a kitchen. * * * I entered a room incumbered with an indescribable mass of papers heaped up on tables and chairs. Two or three individuals were talking there together, and there was another seated in a corner who seemed to be waiting, for as soon as I appeared he called me. He was a blonde young man, with long, curly hair, and clearly shaven face; he spoke French very fluently, but with the special accent characteristic of those whose mother tongue is Russian. I had no difficulty in recognizing in him one of the stars of the commission, an adventurer of French origin, though born in Russia, and whose name was La Farre, Count de la Farre. Not once did this representative of the high spheres of Bolshevism raise his eyes on me. * * *

"Listen," he said to me in French, "let us not investigate this case; this isn't necessary now. You had lately an interview with Sadoul, did you not? Well, I am charged to tell you this: you are to be placed provisionally in liberty for three weeks as a maximum. If, at the expiration of these three weeks, beginning from the present time, you have not yet given us the satisfaction we demand, you will be again arrested. You will have three weeks, then, to come quietly to a decision. You will sign a statement pledging your word of honor that you will not attempt to take flight from Moscow during this period, that you will live in the French Refuge, and that you will conform to what Sadoul told you in the interview which you had with him. Do you accept?"

I hesitated for a second. Should I refuse the respite offered me? Since I was to have twenty-one days in which to come to a decision, I should have been extremely Quixotic to drape myself any longer in the mantle of my dignity. Four months and a half of imprisonment had given me the firm conviction that with such people as the Bolsheviks, accustomed to employ blackmailing and murder in support of their propaganda, it would have been childish of me to stand on scruple. Such was the point of view of many respectable Russians with whom I had come in contact in my prison. To deceive people of this kind, one signs, when one has to, any and all documents whatsoever, and without incurring the slightest responsibility.

"But," I objected nevertheless, "how do I know that if I yield and hand you the statement which you demand, I shall not be again arrested on some pretext?"

"No," replied de la Farre magnanimously, "the political conditions which brought about your imprisonment have changed, and I can guarantee you that if you come to an agreement with me you will not be troubled again."

What could I do? I signed, then, with the most Jesuitical of mental reservations, and some instants later I was free and in the street. I wondered if I was not dreaming as I walked along as naturally as possible, astonished to perceive that I was able to readapt myself immediately to life. I arrived a half hour later at the French Refuge, where several of my compatriots who had seen me many times before did not recognize me.

[Acting on the advice of his compatriots in Moscow, and his conscience somewhat relieved by the publication of an announcement by Stephen Pichon, Minister of Foreign Affairs, before the French Chamber, that France did not intend to intervene, M. Naudeau drew up his article disclaiming his former views of the necessity of allied intervention in Russia, and presented it to Captain Sadoul, who assured him that his liberation was thereby made permanent. On Feb. 4, the day before his departure from Moscow with the French group of which he was a part, the members of which were to be exchanged at the Finnish frontier against a certain number of Russian prisoners, the Soviet official journal, Izvestia, published a garbled summary of the article which M. Naudeau had given to Sadoul. This deliberately distorted version was signed by Neurine, M. Naudeau's first public accuser. The narrative of the released correspondent concludes as follows:]

As for me, it will, perhaps, be considered singular, and it surprises even me, that I find myself able to say that I issue from this sombre adventure without hatred or desire for vengeance. It has made me suffer, but it also compelled me to explore abysses which can be explored only by those who are swallowed up by them. After all, the Bolsheviks might have killed me, without danger to themselves, and yet I am alive; they might have kept me permanently in prison, and yet I am in France. It is true that they blackmailed me, but I laugh at this and at them, for the only thing which is important for me is to be able to speak freely to the public of my own country. So everything is for the best in the best of worlds. * * * When I see with what a harvest of sensations and sentiments they have made me rich, I wonder, after the casting up of all accounts, if it is not I who am the debtor of the sombre monomaniacs of Moscow?

How King Constantine Was Deposed

Parts Played by France and Britain

AN interesting chapter of secret history regarding the diplomatic forces that compelled King Constantine to abdicate the throne of Greece was made public in the September issue of the Grande Revue by M. Marcel Laurent, director of a Paris news agency. When M. Ribot came into power in 1917, M. Laurent states, he began to take the situation in Greece into serious consideration. The Ministers of the Entente, who had been obliged to leave Athens in consequence of the events of the previous December, had returned to that capital, but other diplomatists, duly accredited by the Entente, were living at Saloniki, where M. Venizelos had established his Provisional Government. In view of the undisguised hostility of the King, M. Ribot decided that definite steps ought to be taken to relieve both the Entente and Greece herself of an implacable enemy. He first brought up the subject at his interview with Mr. Lloyd George and Baron Sonnino at St. Jean de Maurienne, on April 19, 1917.

In principle, says M. Laurent, Mr. Lloyd George was not opposed to this "purification," but he at the same time recognized that it would involve serious difficulties. Sonnino, on the other hand, feared the repercussion which might result from the overturning of a neighboring throne. The Consulta agreed that Constantine should be put aside, if it were absolutely necessary, but only on condition that the Greek dynasty was respected.

The settlement of the Greek difficulty, the writer points out, had become all the more urgent from the fact that "the British Government had outlined an Eastern program which in no way agreed with ours." Far from increasing their forces in the Balkan Peninsula, the British were anxious to reduce them, and in May, 1917, they announced their intention to reduce their effectives progressively to a number that was strictly indispensable for the security of Saloniki. The French Ministry, on the other hand, vigorously resisted this view, and urged that merely to occupy Saloniki as an intrenched camp had no value as a strategic factor. When Mr. Lloyd George and Lord Robert Cecil arrived in Paris at the beginning of May, their object was to arrange with the French Government for the partial retreat of the Saloniki troops. M. Ribot, however, brought up the whole Balkan problem, and had little difficulty in convincing the British statesmen that the situation was not very flattering for the Allies.

Lord Robert Cecil eventually suggested that a High Commissioner should be sent to Athens as the representative of the Allies as a body, and, as the allied Commander in Chief at Saloniki was French, he proposed that the suggested emissary of the Entente should be British. M. Ribot pointed out the awkwardness of having a High Commissioner of a different nationality from the Commander in Chief, owing to the impossibility of separating diplomacy from the conduct of the war, and Lord Robert gave way, with the result that M. Jonnart was appointed as High Commissioner.

The question of the abdication of Constantine was reserved for settlement in London later in the month, together with other subjects then in suspense. On May 25 M. Ribot, accompanied by the Ministers of War and the Navy, and by General Foch and M. Jonnart, crossed to London for a conference with the British Ministers. General Foch expressed his views on Saloniki, and stated plainly that the best means to satisfy the British Admiralty (who were anxious as to the effect submarine warfare would have on communications with Saloniki) would be not to reduce the army of occupation there and expose it to the danger of capitulation, but to secure the railway from Athens to Saloniki and establish at Athens a Government on which the Allies could depend. This again brought up the question of the abdication of the King. Mr. Lloyd George and his colleagues rallied to the views of the French Cabinet, and Lord Robert Cecil handed M. Ribot a note which left no doubt as to the community of views between the two Cabinets.

Then came the question as to how the abdication should be brought about. The British Ministers favored the Thessaly operation, to be followed by a demand for the King's abdication, and by a naval demonstration if he refused. The French, basing themselves on General Foch's advice, urged a landing at the Piraeus, which would insure the King's abdication without necessitating force. Finally a compromise was agreed on. General Sarraill was to hold his troops ready to land on the Isthmus of Corinath at a moment's notice, but was to debark them only if the King resisted.

On his return to Athens an unexpected incident occurred in connection with the personality of General Sarraill. In official circles in the allied capitals his detractors predominated. Mr. Lloyd George often confessed himself uneasy; Sonnino declared himself hostile to the tactics of a commander whom the French Government defended to their utmost. An express messenger was sent to M. Ribot from an allied country asking for the immediate recall of General Sarraill, adding that his maintenance in command was regarded everywhere as impossible. M. Ribot replied that his Government had given the opinion of their allies very serious consideration, but found it impossible to relieve General Sarraill of his command, as such a measure, coming on the eye of important events in Greece, could only provoke difficulties. M. Ribot undertook that when the matter in hand was settled he would not fail to consider the request that was made. The sender of this message from "an allied country," M. Laurent subsequently states, was Mr. Lloyd George.

The French Government had received no direct news from M. Jonnart in regard to the accomplishment of his mission, when, on June 9, the British Cabinet forwarded a note of protest. It had become known at the Foreign Office that the High Commissioner in Greece had brought troops from Saloniki and had announced his intention of debarking them at the Piraeus and of giving Constantine twenty-four hours in which to abdicate. The British Cabinet saw in this operation an infraction of the stipulations of the Convention of London, and it asked for explanations. On the following day the Quai d'Orsay received a second protest, couched in terms not less categorical than the preceding one. It declared that the British Foreign Office did not share the optimism of the French War Minister, who had stated that the Royalist faction at Athens would vanish at the mere sight of our troops. The French Cabinet lost none of its sangfroid. It carefully avoided disavowing M. Jonnart.

The article goes on to relate how M. Jonnart, after delaying for forty-eight hours the landing of the troops, decided, without waiting for the fresh instructions asked for, to bring the issue to an abrupt decision. He appealed to the patriotism of the Greek Premier, M. Zaimis, pointing out that if matters were allowed to proceed peacefully the protecting powers would raise the blockade, safeguard the lives and property of all Greeks, without distinction, and prevent reprisals of any kind. On the other hand, if difficulties were raised, force would be used. At the same time, the High Commissioner handed the Premier a note relative to the abdication of the King.

M. Zaimis was familiar with steps of the kind contemplated, as his father had assisted, as Prime Minister, at the abdication of King Otho. He loyally followed his family traditions. The next day, before the period laid down had expired, he sent to M. Jonnart a letter announcing that the King was prepared to leave the country, together with the Crown Prince.

The sequel followed promptly. King Constantine abdicated on June 12, 1917, and was at once succeeded by his second son, Prince Alexander, as King of the Hellenes. The Allies did not think it worth while to intern the fallen King, and allowed him to take refuge in Switzerland, where he still remains.

International Rule Not a Success in Tangier

THE state of war existing between the Spanish Government and the tribesmen of the Wad Ras district, near the international zone around Tangier, has been emphasized frequently by heavy Spanish casualties. A gloomy picture of the condition of the international zone itself was drawn by the Morocco correspondent of The London Times on Sept. 1. According to this account all beneficent or charitable work had been prevented by the many international jealousies prevailing at Tangier. Justice for the natives was a farce. There were no hospitals or medical staff. A serious shortage of water existed. Work was scarce, prices high; the existence of the poor Moslems amid surroundings of dirt and squalor was pitiable. This article concluded as follows:

If there still lingers among those who are charged with the negotiations for the future of Tangier any intention or any desire to endow this place with a permanent status of internationalization, let them be warned in time. Let them come for themselves and see what international administration has accomplished. It has taught the people to poison themselves with foul drinks; it invites them to lose their scanty earnings in low gambling hells; it tempts them—to our shame be it said—with the dregs of European prostitution, and eventually it leaves them to die untended and uncared for. It has allowed them to have all that is bad—for no social legislation is possible where the jealousies of a dozen European Governments have to be contended with—and it has deprived them of all they have a right to have—a semblance of justice, cleanliness, water, a little aid in their sickness, and some sympathy in their sufferings. They ask so little. They get nothing.

Zionist Difficulties in Palestine

[BY A LONDON TIMES CORRESPONDENT]

Writing from Jerusalem at the beginning of September, 1919, the author of this article—a trained British observer of developments in the Middle East—summarized the status of the Zionist project as follows:

ZIONISM is the burning issue here. On all sides it is laden with such deep passions that one is conscious of responsibility in touching it. Mr. Balfour has pledged us to provide in Palestine a nation's home for the Jews, a pledge which we intend to keep. But Palestine, as at present administered by us, contains approximately 500,000 Mussulmans, 60,000 Christians, and 60,000 Jews. Although a great deal of it is as barren as the Wilderness of the Temptation, it is all owned by somebody. The old formula of "the land without a people for the people without a land" presents difficulties at once. But these difficulties, which I hope to show are not insoluble, are as nothing compared to the trouble that has arisen from the belief that we are pledged also to secure for the Jews a privileged political position in Palestine. Language of this kind was undoubtedly used, and as in the crisis of the war no one had time for reflection on the sober realities of the situation, Jews all over the world naturally gave vent to outbursts of joy, and of gratitude to Great Britain for something which, without being in any way precisely defined, was understood to mean that the Jews were to be masters in their new home.

Now all this was at the time entirely pardonable ignorance, but ignorance it was. The results have been simply deplorable, and it is essential that we should all of us, Jews and Gentiles, get to grips with the situation, and use no more vague language or harbor vague ideas. Otherwise there will be bloodshed in Palestine, and the position of the small Jewish minority, which is already morally distressing, will become intolerable. The 500,000 Mussulmans and the 60,000 Christians have all been excited to a high pitch by this political talk. They have made common cause, and in some cases they have entered into covenants to sell no land to Jews. The Christians say they would prefer to go back under a Mussulman majority rather than be ruled by a Jewish minority, and Mussulmans and Christians alike insist on the fact that if there were to be government by a small majority, it could only rest on British bayonets.

All this passion and heat is engendered about a sheer illusion. For naturally there could never now be any question of the British arms being used to impose upon the vast majority of the inhabitants the temporal power of a local minority, reinforced, perhaps, by immigrants from all over Europe and America, but chiefly from the distressed Jewries of Poland and Rumania.

The majority is, it should be said, largely autochthonous. For the Palestine Mussulmans, though commonly called Arabs, and the Palestine Christians, though commonly called Syrians, are probably largely the same stock, ethnically akin to those Phœnician and other "lone Tyrian traders" who founded Marseilles, and were the first to set their sails into the golden west of the vast Atlantic through the Gibraltar gate, and exploit the tin mines of Cornwall. Certain it is that the descendants of these merchant adventurers, who

On the beach undid their corded bales, are far more intelligent and vivacious than either Turks or Arabs elsewhere in the Ottoman Empire.

The vital fact which should be known is that not only is the establishment of such a forcible ascendancy unthinkable on our part, but it is not even suggested by any responsible Zionist, in Jerusalem, at any rate. These are fully alive both to the inherent injustice of such a course and to its danger to their co-religionists. Possibly there are some hotheads living abroad who, since their own interests are not involved, will clamor for large political privileges; but I have been impressed by the moderation of the Zionist program as put forward here. It cannot be too widely known, for if it be understood, the basis of the present unrest, a basis largely of misunderstanding, should disappear. How, then, do the sober Zionists conceive the future?

They assume that the British will be offered and will accept from the Peace Conference a mandate for the direction of affairs in Palestine. What the territorial limits of Palestine will be is yet unknown. * * *

Although Jews of high principle and ability, who have already attained distinction in the West, could be found for the heads of all administrative departments, they could not make themselves acceptable to the majority of the inhabitants or carry the necessary authority. But the Zionists do expect that an opportunity will be given to such men, more especially in the less acrimoniously political and more technical posts, such, for instance, as public works or postal administration. Clearly, also, a Jewish official on the High Commissioner's Council will be required to look after the interests of Jewish education.

It is in this matter of education that we touch one of the questions considered vital by the most responsible Zionists, whose present aims are cultural and economic rather than political.

Orthodox Jews all over the world have maintained schools wherein the children of the Ghetto have learned Hebrew. It was not a spoken language. The language of the home among the Sephardim, the long-robed stately Jews of the Levant, is the Spanish patois which descends from the Spanish which the Jews brought with them when expelled from Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella.

The humble Jews of the Ashkenazim, the mean-clad, uneasy men who swarm in Poland and the Ukraine and fill the Jewries of Western Europe and America, talk Yiddish—a salad of German, Slav, Hebrew, and any local language—in their homes. Hebrew, then, though well known to orthodox Jews throughout the world, remained unspoken, and the modern movement for its revival has had but a small measure of success. But there is one great exception to this rule—namely, Jerusalem. Here Jews from all over the world, from Samarkand to Mogador, and from California to Petrograd, have found in Hebrew a common tongue, and here it is freely spoken as nowhere else. The movement is opposed only by the Jewish schools maintained here and throughout the East by L'Alliance Universelle, which stands firmly for French culture and the French language. The Zionists ask for official recognition of Hebrew in equality with Arabic in Government use. At present this is accorded, but it is expensive and involves the maintenance of a large establishment of Jewish clerks and translators in Government offices. There is no other objection to it, and probably the Zionist Council will agree that the financial burden of a sentimental privilege for a very small minority should not be entirely borne out of taxation.

In Jerusalem the Jews are in a majority. Elsewhere they are greatly in the minority, but there are villages and small districts that are almost purely Jewish. The Zionists ask that these should be allowed local autonomy somewhat equivalent to that of an English borough, with power of levying their own rates. There should be no insuperable difficulty in meeting such a demand.

The outline that I have given contains all that the Zionists who wish to safeguard the Jews now living in Palestine ask in their political program. They regard those who live abroad and ask for more as agents provocateurs, who will be the cause of their ruin.

But there remains the problem of providing a national home for the Jews. How is this to be done? The land is already owned. As things are now, the country can support but few more people. There are hundreds of thousands of poor Jews in the ghettos of Poland, the Ukraine, and Rumania who would swarm into Palestine if the gates were open. Already there are more refugees here than the Zionists can support, and the burden is falling to an increasing extent on the British authorities. How can these poor city starvelings, children of persecution who have failed in life's battle, make desirable immigrants for a country with a future? If they are to be helped, will they not rely on help, like those fearful products of philanthropic societies in other parts of the world? Will not the children of Zion be the "remittance men" of the Zionist Council, and incapable of standing alone? Will they till the soil, or will they seek to get a mortgage on the land of the fellacheen, and watch the Arabs work for them? And how, save by the employment of a large force, are we to protect these immigrants, when they arrive, from the Arab and Christian fury which is now raging against them in advance, owing to the way in which the question has been represented, or misrepresented?

These questions I have put and I find the Zionists here awake to dangers which it is imperative should be realized abroad. The Zionist reply in effect is this:

Immigration will have to be most carefully controlled, and selected immigrants allowed in only as labor is required or land becomes available. It is true that the Jew has not been known as an agriculturist. But in European countries he has until modern times been jealously kept off the land. In America, where agriculture has always been a business like any other, the Jew in spite of this inherited disability has made good and there are some 60,000 Jewish agriculturists. Here in Palestine in the earlier of the modern Jewish colonies it must be admitted that the Jews have not shown a disposition to work themselves; they employ Arabs. But the sons and grandsons of the colonists of the '70s and '80's take a much greater interest in the soil, and themselves work the land more and more. Moreover, the later colonies have been very much better in this respect from their foundation. But we consider it vital that Jews should not shipwreck Zionism by acquiring land privately, or by incurring odium as small moneylenders.

Our desire is that a Jewish National Council should acquire land that is for sale, more especially uncultivated lands and the properties of the former Turkish Government. We believe that by scientific irrigation, the use of water power, and the development of transport Palestine could maintain four times its present population on a higher standard of living. We propose that a Jewish National Council should finance these great public works. They will require immigration of labor, and that labor we can supply. In this way, with the development of land and the enrichment of the country by public works, we propose that Palestine shall in a natural economic manner gradually provide a national home for the Jews. We must resist all pressure to go in for large schemes of immediate immigration, and we must make sure of a sound economic basis.

Herein, it seems to me, lies wisdom. Let the Zionists make known the moderation of their demands from the house-tops. And let the Christian and Mussulman fanatics, who are at present openly vowing to cut the throats of the Jews, listen and understand. This is the only way of safety. For the Palestine situation is bad. The Moslems, who have it to their eternal credit that, while Christendom acted very differently, they have always shown toleration to the Jews, are in danger of spoiling their record, because now for the first time they believe they are threatened with a Jewish domination.

With Allenby in Palestine

By LOWELL THOMAS

American War Correspondent and Lecturer

[BY ARRANGEMENT WITH THE LONDON CHRONICLE]

ALTHOUGH it took Field Marshal Lord Allenby just one year to do what the Crusaders were unable to accomplish in 100 years, nevertheless, while carrying out the most brilliantly executed campaign in the annals of military history, he by no means spent all of his time fighting Turks. One expects a great military leader to be conversant with military tactics and the history of war, but it is a bit extraordinary to find the leader of a great army a bookman and naturalist. But Lord Allenby probably knows as much as any man living about the flowers and wild animals and birds of the Holy Land. He stationed a Yorkshire Sergeant at a watering place which migratory birds frequented, and whenever a new species arrived the Commander in Chief would forget the cares of his campaign and slip off to the pond to see the bird for himself. He is the type of man whom John Burroughs would make a boon companion.

While with his forces in Palestine I discovered that Allenby was exceptionally popular with the men in the ranks. But I was told everywhere that his Generals got shaky in the knees when in his presence, because if anything went wrong you could hear the deliverer of Jerusalem all the way from Dan to Beersheba.

Since the Boer war, when he first made his reputation as a great cavalry leader, he has been known to his men as "Bull" Allenby, and the rank and file of the Tommies and Anzacs seldom go far wrong in their measure of a man. A thousand years from now historians, I believe, will rank Allenby with Thothmes III., Rameses I., Joshua, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander the Great, Titus, Richard Coeur de Lion, Saladin, and the other mighty conquerors who have led their hosts across the Plains of Sharon and Armageddon. And I believe they will write his name at the head of the list.

Allenby succeeded where even Napoleon failed. His was a campaign such as all military men have dreamed of, but few have realized. But though essentially a man of war who prefers to wear a uniform made of the same cloth as that worn by his privates, to eat the same food, and to roar like a lion, Allenby has another side to his nature. He reads both Greek and Latin fluently, and he carried with him on his campaign such books as George Adam Smith's Geography of the Holy Land, a Bible dictionary, and, of course, a copy of the Holy Scriptures.

Just after the capture of Jericho, Allenby and the Duke of Connaught took a run down to the edge of the Dead Sea. When they arrived the soldiers were enjoying their noonday siesta, and there were some motor boats lying out a bit too far, being knocked about by the waves. The Commander in Chief angrily ordered them to be pulled in. Both he and the Duke lent a hand. The temperature was about 110 degrees. Both were wringing wet with perspiration, and hardly as comfortable as the soldiers helping them, who were wearing absolutely no clothing. When the job was done Allenby remarked quietly to one of the boys that it was a pity they couldn't have taken a cinema of his Royal Highness pulling on the rope between two naked Australians.

An hour later, on their way back to Jericho, their car rounded a bend within gunshot of the Turks. Somewhere near the place that Joshua and the Israelites are supposed to have crossed the Jordan on dry land the Rolls-Royce sank up to its hubs in quicksand and salt.

Instead of allowing his men to do it, Allenby insisted on crawling through that slime, scooping out room to lie down under the car, and then, using his enormous hands as shovels, he scooped out the white mud around all four wheels so the machine could be pulled out by his staff Captain's car. When he crawled out the conqueror of the Holy Land was absolutely unrecognizable and covered with a mass of oozy slime.

If the occasional ripples which go through my audiences at the Covent Garden Royal Opera House are any barometer of what interests them, most people are far more interested in little stories about the human side of General Allenby than they are in how he turned the Turkish flank at Beersheba or how he captured Aleppo and cut the Bagdad railway.

Allenby, in addressing his troops on Aug. 4, 1918, said his confidence was "based on the justice of our cause and faith in the sustaining help of the Almighty." He had worked out the plans of attack down to the smallest detail, and when his cavalry were at Armageddon he was both confident and playful. There was an American child at headquarters that morning, and the great General took infinite delight in entertaining her.

When Allenby captured Jerusalem he had accomplished one of the most dramatic feats of all human history. The best that Richard Coeur de Lion could do was to reach the top of Nebi Samwil and get a view of the Holy City. Herr Wilhelm Hohenzollern, before his bubble burst, showed the world what a buffoon he was by entering Jerusalem on a white charger, dressed in white robes, and followed by his resplendent comic opera cavalry.

As every one knows, when Allenby the great deliverer entered the Holy City he merely walked in with three officers in front of him who occupy a far more prominent position in the official photographs than Allenby himself, whose face is almost hidden. When the Kaiser rode into Jerusalem he went to the German Cathedral and delivered an oration, as if he were the reincarnation of the Apostle Paul. When Allenby entered he stood modestly while another man read his very brief proclamation for him.

One day, while having lunch with the Duke of Connaught and Lord Allenby, I asked the Commander in Chief what his feelings were when he received the news that his men had taken Jerusalem, the City of David, "the city which, more than Athens, more than Rome, taught the nations civic justice, the city which gave her name to the ideal city which men are ever striving to build on earth, the city which gave her name to the City of God which shall one day descend from heaven—the New Jerusalem."

Allenby replied: "Oh, I guess I felt pretty much the same as you feel when you capture any town."

Lieut. Gen. Sir Philip Chetwode, who commanded the army corps which captured Jerusalem, one of Allenby's closest friends, his companion through the Boer war, and his second in command during the campaign in the Holy Land, described the deliverer of Palestine to me one day while we were seated in the Kaiser's palace on the Mount of Olives as "the straightest man who ever drew on a boot."

Colonel Lawrence and the Hedjaz

Romantic Career of the Young English Archaeologist Who Led 200,000 Arab Horsemen Against the Turks

ONE of the most romantic figures of the entire war was Thomas Lawrence, a young Oxford graduate who had specialized in archaeology. For seven years he had wandered about Syria and other Eastern countries, dressed in native costume and living with the various Bedouin tribes whom he encountered on his way. At the outbreak of the war with Germany he was engaged in excavation work among the ruined cities of Mesopotamia. He had lived in Arabia so long and had gained such a remarkable knowledge of the various tribes, their language, customs, and peculiarities, that when war was declared the British authorities called him to Cairo and appointed him to the map department of the British Office there, with the title of Lieutenant.

He was still employed in this capacity in 1916, doing the most valuable kind of work in connection with the laying out of maps of localities which he knew far more intimately than the official topographers, when the Shereef of Mecca, King Hussein of Arabia, who had been for years a virtual prisoner of the Turks at Constantinople, gave the word for his long-prepared revolt against the Turks, oppressors of Arabia for fully 500 years. This revolt proved formidable. When it began, the British authorities at Cairo decided that Thomas Lawrence was pre-eminently fitted to be sent to Arabia as British military representative.

His achievements from that time on placed him in the list of that small band of Englishmen whose romantic exploits in exotic countries have been written permanently into the pages of world history—the Raleighs, the Drakes, the Kitcheners, the Gordons, and such men as Sir Richard Burton, the first foreigner who ever penetrated within the forbidden walls of the holy city of Mecca.

The revolution that has resulted in the new Kingdom of the Hedjaz was chiefly due to the Arabo-Turkish Army. The Turkish principle of government had been to fill all the responsible official posts with Turks. Especially was this the case with the Young Turks. But they enforced military conscription among the Arab population to the best of their ability, for the Balkan war had made a wide chasm in the Turkish population of military age. The result was that the so-called Turkish Army in Arabia consisted very largely of Arabs, whose sympathies were wholly with their fatherland and against their oppressors. When the general rising occurred the Arab portion of the army deserted almost en masse. The Turkish Army, thus depleted, was forced to take refuge in various forts, and was gradually driven to surrender, except at Medina, where a considerable number of Turks collected and succeeded in holding out until the end of the war.

The Arab deserters, with their Western drill and modern weapons, formed the nucleus of the new army of the Hedjaz. With the addition of new recruits and supplies from the Allies an excellent force of regulars was formed. These were supplemented by swarms of irregulars — Bedouin horsemen and camelmen from the deserts. This was the army which was to co-operate with the British in the conquest of Syria. Its guiding spirits were Emir Faisal, third son of King Hussein—a man of strong patriotism, energy, tact, and ability to command—and Colonel Thomas Lawrence.

To Colonel Lawrence more than to any other man was due the efficient organization of the Hedjaz Army. He worked in perfect harmony with King Hussein and Prince Faisal, to whom he was second in command. For months his wild and reckless yet continually successful exploits at the head of his Bedouin force of 200,000 horsemen were spoken of in this and other countries of the East.

A small blonde young Englishman, with intensely blue eyes and a strong chin, he was adored by the fierce tribesmen whose every exploit with horse or camel he could equal, if not surpass. Fearless and resourceful, defeat to him meant simply accomplishing a given task in a different way. He wore on all occasions full Bedouin costume, and his achievements as military commander in the impetuous raids which he led against the Turks, and which drove them out of Arabia, were such that King Hussein conferred on him the title of Shereef, the first instance in history of a Westerner holding that much-prized religious rank, which entitled him to wear the agal, kuffia, and abba, distinctive of Arabic Princes of the blood. He also wore a curved golden sword which Prince Faisal himself presented to his English commander.

A DETACHMENT OF BEDOUIN VOLUNTEERS IN ARABIA MARCHING TO THE FRONT TO FIGHT UNDER PRINCE FAISAL

Despite his fame and the brilliant record of his achievements, Colonel Lawrence was an extremely silent and almost abnormally modest man. On more than one occasion he literally fled from the honors which the British Government wished to confer upon him. Blonde as a Viking, he walked about in the streets of Jerusalem or other cities, in full panoply of Arab royal costume, plunged in some inner dream. His leisure moments he spent in the study of archaeology. His influence over his native followers was amazing; he accomplished what had never been accomplished before—the welding of many different and often hostile tribes into one single patriotic unit. In none of his wild raids was he ever wounded, though he exposed himself in the most reckless fashion, leading cavalry charges in the style of Cromwell or Seydlitz.

It should not be forgotten, in this connection, that he had never had military training, and was noteworthy when wearing British uniform (after his capture of Akaba he had been made a Colonel) for his serene disregard of all matters of military etiquette. His power over his Arabic followers was due to his knowledge of their dialects, his understanding of their religion, his tact in settling disputes, and his inborn military ability.

The Germans and Turks alike soon discovered the presence of this young Englishman among their Arabic opponents in the desert, and, realizing the menace of his mysterious and amazing successes, put a price of $500,000 upon his head. Needless to say, this blood money was never paid; the Turks were driven out of Holy Arabia forever, and Germany saw the miraged vision of the Berlin-to-Bagdad route vanish into the arid wastes across which the Bedouin forces of Colonel Lawrence drove the disillusioned Turks.

The Young Turk Policy in Asia

New Light on the Causes Which Led Enver Pasha and His Followers to Bring Turkey to Ruin

By RENE PINON

[FRENCH AUTHORITY ON THE NEAR EAST]

At the very moment when the Turkish delegates at Paris were petitioning the Peace Conference for the preservation of the Sultan's empire, Turkish bands were attempting to complete the extermination of the Christians in that empire. More recently the fall of Damad Ferid Pasha's Cabinet and the rise of a new Ministry, with General Ali Riza Pasha as Grand Vizier and Djemel Pasha as Minister of War, have focused attention anew upon Turkish Governmental policy. The causes that produced the new outbreak of barbarity against the Armenians are illuminated in an article by M. Pinon in the Revue des Deux Mondes for September, the most interesting portions of which are here translated for CURRENT HISTORY.

THE Sick Man of Europe did not die of his chronic malady; he committed suicide by plunging into the great war. He was not at all compelled to take part in it, and as the price of his neutrality he might long have consolidated his position in Europe and Asia, and have obtained from the allied and associated powers a guarantee of his independence and territorial integrity. As a matter of fact, these advantages were offered by the French and British Ambassadors to the Young Turk Government; but the all-powerful triumvirate, Enver, Talaat, and Djemal, had fixed its determination long before, not only because it had allowed Germany to gain a dominating influence, but also because the war waged by Germany satisfied its passions and favored its ambitions.

To understand how the Young Turks could knowingly have committed this fatal mistake it is necessary to penetrate the psychology of that small clan which governed with absolute power the Ottoman Empire. Their psychology, however, did not differ from that of Abdul Hamid and the rest of his race, save in the hypocrisy of formulas and the more sustained and methodical brutality of execution. The "Red Sultan" and the Young Turks practiced the same policy of narrow nationalism, of unification and of inner "Turkification." When the revolution of July, 1908, broke out in the cry of freedom and the singing of the "Marseillaise" all Europe hoped that Turkey was about to reform of its own accord and become, with Europe's aid, a modern State in which each individual, without distinction of race or religion, would enjoy the same rights and be subject to the same duties as Turkish citizens. Before the revolution of 1908, as well as before the expedition of 1909, which dethroned Abdul Hamid, a preliminary agreement had been made between the Young Turks and the representatives of other nationalities, Armenians, Bulgarians of Macedonia, Syrians, &c. Turkey seemed to be evolving toward a federative form of government, which would have maintained the unity of the empire and allowed each nationality to develop according to its traditions and aspirations.

Vain hope! The massacres of Adana, in which more than 20,000 Armenians perished, were a first revelation of what was to be expected from the new Government. Dangerous ideologists, such as Dr. Nazim, declared that the State must be exclusively Turkish; the presence of non-Turkish elements had been the pretext of all European interventions; it was necessary, therefore, to "Turkify," if need be, by force, to implant Turkish colonists, to oblige all Ottoman subjects to become Turks. German agents, ambassadors, soldiers or merchants encouraged these tendencies, which harmonized with their doctrines of the rights of the State and with their interests; were they not the guardians, and did they not perceive that more and more they were becoming the masters of the whole Ottoman Empire?

ALIENATING THE ALBANIANS

The result of such a rash and iniquitous policy soon became apparent. In all Europe the Sultans had no more faithful subjects than the Albanians, but though they were mostly Mussulmans, they were attached to their local liberties and their special customs. They had contributed powerfully to the success of the revolution of July, 1908; in return the Young Turks conceived the idea of molesting them and destroying their social organization, thus losing the sole support which they still possessed in the western part of the Balkan Peninsula. At the same time they devised the scheme of implanting amid the Macedonian Slavs mehadjis (Mussulman colonists) emigrated from Bosnia-Herzegovina. The result of this was to make possible the union of the Balkan States, which had previously seemed impossible, and to provoke the War of 1912; Turkey lost thereby Macedonia, Crete, the Islands of the Archipelago, and would have lost Adrianople, had it not been for the mad haste of the Bulgarians in declaring a second war.

Such a catastrophe, far from serving as a lesson to the Young Turks, only exasperated them. They began to prepare a war of revenge against the Greeks, and plunged into the creation of naval armaments. German policy, which had already been crystallized by the intention to provoke war, could not fail to make use of such tendencies for its own ends. Baron Marschall and, after his death, his successor, Wangenheim, and with them all the Germans of Turkey, strove to stir up the grudges of the Young Turks and to fan the flame of their mad desires.

The Balkan union, ephemeral as it was, had made Germany anxious for the security of her communications with the Ottoman Empire and the Bagdad Railway; she had resolved to eliminate Russian influence completely from the Balkans and Armenia; that is to say, from the two points from which a Russian push could menace the Bagdad Railway, that backbone of Germanized Turkey. German publicists like Axel Schmidt, J. Hermann, and especially Paul Rohrbach, began a campaign of propaganda and depicted to the frightened Turks the descent of the Czar's Cossacks toward the Bosphorus and the Gulf of Alexandretta. There was no salvation for the Turks except in German protection. The coalition of Germanic ambitions and Turkish grievances was complete by the first months of 1914, and was expressed by the appointment of the German General, Liman von Sanders, as Inspector General of the Ottoman Army, then as commander of the 1st Army Corps at Constantinople; he was also accredited to the Turkish Government as the personal representative of the Kaiser.

It was difficult to conceal the truth longer. The Young Turk triumvirate had been clever enough to name the Egyptian Prince, Said Halim, Grand Vizier, but he was a mere figurehead, whose ambition and vanity placed him in their hands completely. They promised him the post of Khedive of Egypt after the expulsion of the English, and left to him the pompous appearance of power and the duty of entertaining foreign representatives, while they kept for themselves the exercise of all real power and all immediate benefits.

It was the same in the provinces, where no functionaries could use their authority except in so far as they were submissive to the instructions of the Young Turk committees which formed a network extending over all the empire. This secret organization constituted for the leaders of the Constantinople committee an instrument of domination; it was through this channel that Ta'at, Enver, Djemal and their accomplices carried out their will.

CHARACTER OF LEADERS

The Ambassador of the United States, Mr. Morgenthau, in the interesting Memoirs which he has published, draws a striking portrait of these three grave-diggers of the Ottoman Empire. He compares Talaat to an American "boss," a comparison which undoubtedly calumniate the "bosses," who, however unscrupulous they may be, do not have on their conscience hundreds of thousands of human lives. Talaat was a striking type of adventurer, an extraordinary combination of cunning and ferocity, subtlety and energy; a gambler's temperament, with impulses of brutal joviality and the simplicities of an ignorant child; perceptions of an intuitive man of the people and the cruel and cunning instincts of a wild beast. Enver, younger, more distinguished in appearance, more refined, colder and more calculating, more capable of persistence and tenacity, but at bottom without wide views, unless his own personal passions were in question, and offering as a substitute for genius a limitless ambition and vanity, yielded more entirely than Talaat to the directions of the Germans, whose methodical spirit he had admired as a military attaché to Berlin, and who fascinated him by the display of their strength and the ostentation of their omnipotence; in Wangenheim's hands he had become a precious and obedient instrument for the great events which William II. had entrusted specially to his Ambassador to prepare.

As long as peace continued, the Young Turks were obliged to observe appearances with all the powers, to hide their ambitions and their agreements. While Enver was ostensibly the friend of the Germans, Talaat feigned to court Russian sympathies, and in the Spring of 1914 had a political conversation with Czar Nicholas II. Djemal played the part of a friend of France: some few days before the war he was the recipient of the most flattering attentions in Paris, at Toulon, at Creusot, and on his return to Constantinople he was able to boast that he had pulled the wool over the eyes of the French most cleverly. Their decision to enter the war on the side of Germany was fixed from the beginning; they sought only to save appearances and to defer to the undeveloped embryo of public opinion which had survived so many tyrannies. The attack on the Russian coast by the Goeben and the Breslau under the Turkish flag was premeditated.

POLICY OF EXTERMINATION

After hostilities began, the Young Turks abandoned all restraint; their true nature was revealed, more evil and cruel than could ever have been imagined, and more naïve at the same time. They at once began to carry out their favorite plan. What they aimed at was to free the Ottoman Empire from all foreign guardianship, to extirpate all non-Turkish elements, and to restore to the name and the glory of the Osmanlis all their former lustre. They began by abolishing the "capitulations" without understanding that the destruction of a régime which humiliated their vanity might result from a far-reaching interior reform, but could not precede it. The Young Turks wished to have at their mercy all foreigners and non-Turkish elements; and they soon showed how they intended to treat them. Talaat said to Mr. Morgenthau: "We wish to prove by our actions that we are not a race of barbarians." But the fundamental nature of these primitives speedily came to the surface; the superficial varnish of civilization disappeared and was replaced by savage brutality.

The proclamation of the holy war, if it did not succeed in arousing the whole Mussulman world, at least excited Turkish fanaticism. A pamphlet was printed in Arabic on this occasion and distributed through all Islam; it summoned all the faithful to the holy war, to the extermination of all Christians, except the Germans. This pamphlet said:

The extermination of the wretches who oppress us is a holy task, whether it be accomplished secretly or openly, according to the word of the Koran: "Take them and kill them wherever you may find them; we give them up to you and grant you all power over them." He who kills even one of them will be rewarded by God. Let every Mussulman, in whatever part of the world he may dwell, swear solemnly that he will strike down at least three or four of the Christians who surround him, for they are the enemies of Allah and of the Faith. Let each one of you know that his reward will be doubled by the God who has created heaven and earth. He who obeys this order will be saved from the terrors of the last judgment and assured of resurrection and eternal life.

The pamphlet then gives details regarding the mode of organizing bands and the duty of assassination. Such a document bears the stamp of German manufacture, but it was disseminated by the Ottoman Government, and if it had scarcely been heard of outside Turkey, its ideas were put into practice by the Young Turk in the case of the Armenians, the Greeks, the Syrians, and even the Arabic Mussulmans.

USE OF GERMAN METHODS

The method of deportation applied to the Christian populations was not a Turkish invention. It was a method lauded by the Germans, who intended to apply it to Alsace-Lorraine, had they been the victors; but the Turks added to it their own special interpretation. Denouncing in a previous study the massacres and deportations which caused the death of approximately 800,000 Armenians in 1915, I added to the title "German Method" the words "Turkish Work"—a double signature. The Germans brought to this their spirit of organization, and it was due to their instructions that the massacres were systematically and regularly carried out. Since Abdul Hamid Turkey has progressed; it has introduced order into the assassination of its own subjects; the Young Turks have even boasted of surpassing their predecessors, and of their plan of a complete extirpation of the Armenian people. Talaat said to the Ambassador of the United States: "I have done more to solve the Armenian problem in three months than Abdul Hamid in thirty years."

Given over to their own inspiration, freed of all surveillance, filled with enthusiasm over the defeats of the Allies before the Dardanelles, assured of immunity by their certainty of German victory, the Turks plunged into the abyss, and a psychological phenomenon was visible in them which Mr. Morgenthau defined as reversion to primitive type, and described as follows:

Now that the chances of war favored the empire an entirely new type appeared to me. The timid and pusillanimous Ottoman, threading his way cautiously through the mazes of Western diplomacy and striving to profit by the diversity of opinion among the great powers, gave way to an arrogant, haughty, audacious, vain person who vaunted his rights, resolved to live his own life and manifested absolute contempt for all Christians.

That type of Turk, the true Turk, is very different from the descriptions of novelists; those who have seen him at work, torturer and assassin, thief and lecher, have retained a frightful impression. It is clearly proved from all the evidences that the Young Turk Government willed and organized the total extermination of the Armenians, that the Germans encouraged them in this, and that the Turkish people carried it out gayly, robbing and assassinating the victims, forcing the women and children to become Mussulmans, and choosing the prettiest from the sad caravans to take away with them for their harems. * * *

PAN-TURANIANISM

It is important to observe that Pan-Turanianism and Pan-Islamism are not synonymous; the two policies are not geographically identical, since the Arabs are not Turanians. Pan-Islamism has, above all, a religious basis; it is nothing else but the sentiment of the community of religious faith between the Mussulmans of various countries. When the Sultan, at the German bidding, proclaimed the holy war, his decree had but a feeble echo in non-Turkish Islam. The Arabs, with the aid of the Entente, claimed their independence and denied the Turkish Sultan the right of the Khalifate; they opposed to him the Grand Shereef of Mecca, descendant of the Prophet, whom the Entente has recognized as the King of Hedjaz.

After the Bolshevik revolution and the ruin of the military power of Russia, the chimerical conceptions of Pan-Turanianism seemed, nevertheless, to be fulfilled. The Black Sea became a Turco-German lake. The treaty of Brest-Litovsk with the Ukrainians and the treaty of Bucharest with the Rumanians revealed clearly the intentions of the Germans; they wished to organize a land and sea route starting from Odessa or Costanza and ending at Batum, whence it would radiate, on the one hand, toward Baku with the aid of the Tartars, and, by the Caspian, toward Turkestan and its large historic towns: Khiva, Bukhara, Samarkand; on the other hand, by way of Tauris and Teheran, toward Persia, Afghanistan, and India, where 66,000,000 Mussulmans were English subjects or under English protection.

Pan-Turanianism, thus conceived, transcended completely the powers of the Turks; they were but an instrument of the German policy of war. The various peoples of Turkish race were to become the pillars of the gigantic bridge which would connect Central German Europe with Central Asia and with China; thus would be established the supremacy of German commerce, and the influence and domination of Great Britain would be destroyed. In reality, under the disguise of Pan-Turanianism, it was Pan-Germanism whose domination and triumph were to be assured. The Young Turks, in their naïve pride, exulted joyously; they saw themselves back to the days of Soliman the Magnificent. "The Black Sea is a Mussulman and Ottoman sea," wrote the Ikdam on March 23, 1918. They flattered themselves that they had grown to greater stature through the support of Germany, whose pride and insolence they endured because they needed her, but of which they thought they could get rid when the proper moment had come. They should have remembered, since it was Bismarck who said it, that he who wishes to sup with the devil should provide himself with a long spoon.

AFTER THE TURKISH DEFEAT

Islam, in the main, was not the dupe of the Pan-Turanian, or Pan-Turkish propaganda, and behind the chimera of Pan-Turanianism is discerned the dangerous reality of Pan-Germanism. It knew, furthermore, that the great peoples who have carried forward Mussulman civilization are the Arabs, the Persians, the Berbers of North Africa, while the Turks have only been destroyers. All this effort, however, all this money spread right and left by the German agents, all this political preaching was not completely ineffectual; certain results, certain ebullitions continued even after the complete disaster of Turkey and Young Turk policy.

During the first months which followed the defeat and the armistice, the Turks, bewildered by the catastrophe, thought only of humiliating themselves before the conquerors and imploring their mercy; the Young Turk agents either disappeared, or kept silence. But the Entente delayed coming to Constantinople and manifesting its will. The Turks grew accustomed to the idea that once more, perhaps, the Ottoman Empire would be left unchanged. The Sultan still reigned in his capital, the Young Turk leaders, assassins of so many thousand men, torturers of women and children, were not punished; many Germans remained in Constantinople, and Russia had not been placed upon her feet. The Turks, therefore, thought they saw some fissures in the allied front, and strove to play the game which had been successful for so long a time, namely that of profiting by, and if need be, embittering the conflict of opinion between their enemies.

In the terms of the armistice the Allies had not taken the precaution to require the departure of the Turkish administrators and soldiers from all non-Turkish countries, that is, all the region east of Taurus, so that the Turkish officials who had massacred the Armenians, hung the Arabs, deported the Greeks, remained on the scene of their activities, and, when they had recovered from their first fright, began anew to oppress the population; with only more discretion, the massacres recommenced. To put a stop to the complaints of these peoples and to discredit them, the Young Turk Committees, evidently at the order of their leaders, Talaat, Enver, Djemal, whom the Allies have not yet been able to locate and arrest, began anew to terrorize and decimate them.

NEW TACTICS EMPLOYED

Their tactics consisted of depicting the interests of Islam as identical with those of Young Turkey. This is the manoeuvre by which Germans and Young Turks alike are trying to save their interests and to escape from their terrible responsibilities.

Recent events, whose coincidence is striking in its revelation of a unified plan and order, have occurred to prove that Young Turk propaganda had borne its fruits, and that in all Asiatic Islam a dangerous agitation has continued after the war. In Egypt, in the month of March, among that passive and sheep-like people, the fellahs and Arabs, a sudden disturbance developed rapidly into serious riots. The first troubles had a national character. The Nationalist Party, long organized, protested against the proclamation during the war of the English protectorate over Egypt; it demanded the independence of the country. * * * The first Nationalist troubles caused the deportation to Malta of four of the principal leaders of the movement. Such a measure only increased the dissatisfaction, and toward March 10 very numerous manifestations were organized. * * * In the towns the workmen cease work, bands of pillagers rush through the streets; Armenians and Greeks are particularly attacked.

The agitation lasted more than two months; the British Government, which had before the war barely 4,000 English troops, was obliged to send a force of 40,000 men in all haste. The attack against the Armenians, who in Cairo form but a numerically small and generally poor colony, is revealing; it is the signature of the Young Turk Committee. The agitators profited by local circumstances and motives of native discontent; they sought to stir up the young men of the university by invoking the interests of Islam; but their true design was to bring about a manifestation in favor of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire and the Young Turks; the incidents of Egypt are directly connected with the disorders in India, Syria, and Kurdistan.

MAKING TROUBLE IN INDIA

In the great Hindu peninsula the disorders began in the month of April; popular orators excited the Mussulmans to revolt and spoke of the riots in Egypt in their harangues; they also invoked the Bolshevik example in Russia. From April 10 to April 15 serious troubles broke out at Amritsar, Lahore, Bombay, Ahmedabad; the whole Punjab was in rebellion; at Calcutta on the 15th there were twelve casualties. The Mussulmans sought to draw the Hindus with them, but with indifferent success; the agitators spoke of the right of free determination, but it was perceived that Turkish agents were at the head of the movement, spreading false rumors among the ignorant masses. In the first days of May, order was gradually restored, but on May 9 a complication occurred; the Emir of Afghanistan, Amanullah Khan—successor of Emir Habidullah, assassinated, according to all probability, by Turko-German agents—demanded the complete independence of his country and dispatched armed bands across the Indian frontier. The British Government was obliged to summon troops, which took the offensive and compelled the Emir speedily to ask for peace.

At Aleppo at the end of February, at Adana on March 10, grave episodes occurred; Armenians were killed, and the French and English commanders were forced to intervene to restore public order. On the Persian frontier, among the Kurdish tribes, the Young Turk Committee organized armed bands to prevent the Armenians who had taken refuge in Persia from returning to their country; Haidar Bey, former vali of Van, directed the movement.

Thus everywhere the disorders have the same character and the same source; the Young Turk Committees of Constantinople and Berne direct the movement, obeying secret orders. The approach of inevitable justice maddens the guilty wretches; the idea that, despite their bloodthirsty zeal, there still remain Armenians who are preparing to return to their devastated homes and to create there, with the support of the Allies, a great independent State, excites the rage of the torturers. The longer the indecision of the Peace Conference and the inactivity of the Allies continue, the more the audacity of the Turks increases and the further they carry their intrigues.

Germany and the Armenian Massacres

Official Documents from Berlin

A COLLECTION of German official documents compiled by Dr. Johannes Lepsius, founder of the German Orient Mission and President of the German Armenian Society, was published in Berlin with the authority of the Wilhelmstrasse toward the end of August, 1919. It is entitled "Germany and Armenia: 1914-1918," and is a volume of over 500 pages, issued by the Potsdam Tempelverlag.

Dr. Lepsius asked leave last November, after the Berlin revolution, to consult the archives of the German Foreign Office for correspondence bearing upon Armenia, and Dr. Solf, then Foreign Secretary, informed him that if he would collate and publish the documents in question the Foreign Office would abandon its projected White Book upon Armenia in order to avoid duplication. The book that resulted from this arrangement is the first full and authentic account of the relations existing between Germany and Turkey. Basing his investigations on free and unlimited examination of all German official correspondence from Turkey, Dr. Lepsius, as editor, assumes complete responsibility for his exhaustively documented work.

Dr. Lepsius disclaims any desire to accuse or to exculpate any one. But his array of evidence shows that from the Imperial Chancellor in Berlin down to the lowest grade official in Anatolia, the whole of the German Foreign Service knew day by day what was happening in Armenia. Hindenburg and Ludendorff were as well aware of every detail as were the veteran von der Goltz and Liman von Sanders. The Main Committee of the Reichstag shared the guilty secret. Yet nothing effective was done to bring the Turks to their senses. At Constantinople the German Ambassador of the day confined himself to making academic representations at stated intervals. The Turks in return gave Germany to understand that it was her business to win the war, and not to meddle in Turkish internal affairs. The Germans, for their part, appreciated only too clearly the retort to which their own policy of deportation in France and Belgium ultimately exposed them.

Dr. Lepsius's labors also afford the German public its first comprehensive view of what he describes as "perhaps the greatest persecution of Christians of all time."

The drama opened in Constantinople with an Oriental St. Bartholomew's Night on April 25, 1915, when 600 Armenian notables were arrested, deported, and done to death. In Armenia itself a so-called "rising" at Van furnished the pretext for the wholesale massacres and deportations that continued until the end of the year. And from December, 1915, began the period of systematic conversion to Islam. In this proceeding German diplomacy was prepared to acquiesce, on the ground that "in the East creed and nationality are synonymous." But even the German diplomats had to acknowledge that the Decree of Aug. 1, 1916, determining the political and religious rights of the Armenians, was designed to terminate the very existence of the Armenian Nation.

Dr. Lepsius estimates that before the war 1,845,450 Armenians had their homes in the Ottoman dominions. During the war the Turks deported nearly 1,400,000 persons, and of these no fewer than 1,000,000 perished, not including some 50,000 to 100,000 Armenians of the Caucasus who are also "missing." No other nation, Dr. Lepsius observes, even among those that took direct part in the war, can show such a record of loss. The value of Armenian property confiscated by the Turks is estimated at 1,000,000,000 marks (nominally $250,000,000).

Dr. Lepsius couples the ferocious greed of the Young Turks with the trumped-up raison d'état of the Nationalist Constantinople Committee as the mainspring of the policy of extermination. Talaat, Halil and Enver are exhibited as its most conspicuous exponents.

The Young Turks remained willfully blind to the inevitable loss of economic, and indeed of military, efficiency that followed from the persecution of the Armenians.

But there is nobody here now [wrote Count Paul Wolff-Metternich, then Ambassador, to Herr von Bethmann Hollweg in 1916] strong enough to tame the many-headed hydra of the committee, with its chauvinism and fanaticism. The committee insists that the last remnants of the Armenians shall be devoured, and the Government has to submit. But there is now little left for the hungry wolves of the committee to extort from these wretched creatures. * * * To "Turkify" means to expel or to kill everything that is not Turkish—it means to destroy and forcibly to annex other people's property. Herein for the moment, and in the childish repetition of French Liberal phrases, consists the vaunted new birth of Turkey.

Prince Hohenlohe on one occasion, and Count Wolff-Metternich on another, urged von Bethmann Hollweg to consider the expediency of publicly dissociating Germany from the Armenian horrors by means of articles in the German press. This ingenuous proposal evoked no response from the Wilhelmstrasse. On the contrary, the North-German Gazette, the Berlin semi-official organ, was allowed to publish Turkish official denials of the massacres and vigorous protests against the slanderous imputation of the enemy press that the Ottoman Government had anything to do with any "excesses" that might have been committed.

The last phase of Turkish militancy was inaugurated by the Brest-Litovsk Treaty in March, 1918, and extended, as far as Dr. Lepsius's documents are concerned, down to the capture of Baku in September, 1918. On the strength of the Brest Treaty the Turks occupied not only the assigned districts of Ardahan, Kars, and Batum, but advanced into the more densely populated Armenian lands beyond. As this advance threatened to engage too deeply the Turkish reserves, which he desired to see employed nearer home, Ludendorff in June, 1918, addressed from German Main Headquarters a strong remonstrance, based entirely on military considerations, to Enver. Hindenburg indorsed Ludendorff's injunction, and pleaded "as a Christian" that the Caucasus populations might be preserved. Enver returned an evasive reply.

An indictment of the attitude of the Central Powers in the face of Turkey's avowed purpose to exterminate the Armenian Nation is contained in a dispatch from Tiflis addressed to the Berlin Foreign Office on Aug. 20, 1918, by the Bavarian General, Baron Kress von Kressenstein, sometime Chief of Staff to Djemal Pasha's Fourth Turkish Army in Syria, who, after the Brest-Litovsk conference, had been appointed German High Commissioner in the Caucasus, with instructions to study the Armenian question on the spot. In this dispatch Baron von Kressenstein said:

If all the despairing cries for help on the part of the Government and clergy of Armenia pass unheeded, the responsibility for the annihilation of this ancient Christian people will lie forever upon Germany and Austria. History will not, and can not, admit that the two great Christian empires of Central Europe were not in a position to impose their will upon their Asiatic ally, at least in such a case as this, where the life and death of a whole people are at stake.

As for the entry of the Turks, under Nuri Pasha, into Baku on Sept. 16-17, 1918, it appears from an extraordinary dispatch sent by Lieut. Col. Paraquin, the German Chief of Staff to the Turkish Eastern Army Group, that the Turks did not even spare the nationals of their German ally. In this dispatch Colonel Paraquin said that he was besieged by German residents begging for protection, and on their heels followed the neutral Consuls on a similar errand. These appeals were communicated to the Pashas with an urgent request for attention. But the Pashas and their suites were engrossed in the preparations for a full-dress banquet. While the Pashas and their German confederates made merry, the inhabitants of Baku were being plundered and murdered. "The Turks," says Colonel Paraquin, "did not allow themselves to be disturbed."

In the evening the Danish Consul appeared in the great hall of the Hotel Metropole, where the convivialities were in full swing, and reported to Colonel Paraquin that German houses were being plundered and that the lives of the occupants were in danger. The German Colonel thereupon strode up to Nuri Pasha and in a loud voice said to him:

Your Excellency, I beg of you now at last to take effective steps for the protection of the Germans. If not, I shall be compelled to report to the German Embassy at Constantinople how little you protect German life and property!

Nuri was taken aback, but protested that he had done everything possible. The Colonel pointed out that not a single senior officer had yet visited the town, and that the troops, instead of being told off on guard duty, had merely been paraded for inspection. The Colonel declares that, although the moment was not one for polite amenities, he employed no word or gesture that might be calculated to give offense. Nevertheless, on the following day, Sept. 18, Halil Pasha sent his aide de camp to Colonel Paraquin with a message to say that, in view of the Colonel's conduct toward Nuri Pasha in public the day before, he was relieved of his post as Chief of Staff to the Eastern Army Group.

All the satisfaction that General von Kressenstein, the German High Commissioner at Tiflis, could get from Nuri was an assurance in French that any "little accidents" that might have occurred would be repaired.

Syria and the Anglo-French Pact

Tentative Spheres of Influence

THE presence of British troops in Syria, the portion of the former Turkish Empire claimed by France, caused increasing friction for several months, but the issue was amicably adjusted early in September by frank conferences in Syria between Lord Allenby and General La Forcade, and a little later by similar conferences in Paris between Premier Lloyd George and the French Government. The arrest of the pro-French Emir Saïd by the British called forth many indignant articles in the French press, which charged the British with working against French aspirations in Syria. The criticism at all times was tempered by French gratitude for what that the British had done in the war, but the possibility of serious misunderstanding was finally removed by the announcement, on Sept. 16, 1919, that a satisfactory agreement between the two Governments regarding the distribution of spheres of influence in Syria and adjoining provinces had been concluded.

Lord Allenby himself had stated in Paris on Sept. 10 that Great Britain would recognize the mandate of France in Syria. The British, he said, were in Syria for purely military reasons, and left all political matters to France.

The main lines of the agreement ultimately reached were published by the Temps on Sept. 16. By virtue of this agreement Great Britain from Nov. 1 was to evacuate all the territories north of a tentative frontier between Syria and Palestine, it being understood that this frontier had only a provisional character and that its outline might be modified when the Peace Conference decided finally on the political organization of the Levant.

The district of Mosul was apparently not included in the regions in which Great Britain intended to cease to be responsible for the maintenance of order. On the other hand, it was agreed that the departure of the British troops should not have as its consequence the occupation by French troops of the four cities of Damascus, Hama, Homs, and Aleppo, which are in "Zone A," in which the Anglo-French Agreement of 1916 provided for the constitution of an Arab State or confederation of Arab States. Nevertheless, the Arab power would henceforth look to the French and not to the British Government for support and advice.

Among the territories in which the relief of the British troops would be carried out by French troops figures Ciliciain which are already French units, as well as a French mission under the direction of Colonel Brémont.

This distribution of responsibilities and forces of occupation was not in any way to prejudice subsequent communications between the two Governments with regard to political questions which might arise in Syria or final solutions which can only be decided by the Peace Conference.

Regarding the decision to leave Damascus, Homs, Hama, and Aleppo out of the zone of direct military occupation, it was understood that the British Government communicated to the French Government certain documents showing, first, that as early as Nov. 23, 1915, Sir Arthur Nicolson, then Permanent Under Secretary at the Foreign Office, acquainted M. Picot, the delegate of the French Government, with the negotiations proceeding between the British Government and the Shereef of Mecca, and with the demand of the Shereef touching the four towns in question; secondly, that at a fresh meeting on Dec. 21, 1915, at the Foreign Office, M. Picot informed Sir Arthur Nicolson that the French Government acquiesced in the four cities being administered by the Arabs themselves under French influence; thirdly, that in a letter of May 16, 1916, in which Sir Edward Grey gave his signature to the Anglo-French Agreement concerning the Levant, it was specified that the Arabs were to "obtain the cities of Homs, Hama, Damascus, and Aleppo."

Both the Paris Temps and The London Times pointed out that the documents presented by the British Government showed no contradiction between the promises made by the British Government to the Shereef of Mecca and the Anglo-French Agreement of 1916, and that the very text of this agreement in the first article, which speaks of "Zone A," and in the second article, in which allusion is made to negotiations to be continued with the Arabs, manifestly took into account the engagements entered into with the latter.

The whole question of tentative British and French spheres of influence in the Levant was illuminated by Colonel

Thomas Lawrence—whose activities in Syria during the war are described elsewhere in this issue—in a running description of British promises made both to the French and to the Arabs. These promises were embodied in four documents, which Colonel Lawrence defined as follows in a communication to The Manchester Guardian on Sept. 12:

DOCUMENT I.—The British promise to King Hussein, dated Oct. 24, 1915. It undertakes, conditional on an Arab revolt, to recognize the "independence of the Arabs" south of latitude 37 degrees, except in the provinces of Bagdad and Basra, where British interests require special measures of administrative control, and except where Great Britain is not "free to act without detriment to the interests of France."

[N. B.—Hussein asked for no personal position, and for no particular Government or Governments.]

DOCUMENT II.—The Sykes-Picot Agreement made between England and France in May, 1916. It divides the Arabic provinces of Turkey into five zones, roughly—(a) Palestine from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, to be "international"; (b) Haifa and Mesopotamia from near Tekrit to the Gulf to be "British"; (c) the Syrian coast, from Tyre to Alexandretta, Cilicia, and most of Southern Armenia, from Sivas to Diarbekir, to be "French"; (d) the interior (mainly the provinces of Aleppo, Damascus, Urfa, Deir, and Mosul) to be "independent Arab" under two shades of influence—

(i.) Between the lines Akaba-Kuweit and Haifa-Tekrit, the French to seek no "political influence," and the British to have economic and political priority, and the right to supply "such advisers as the Arabs desire."

(ii.) Between the line Haifa-Tekrit and the southern edge of French Armenia or Kurdistan, Great Britain to seek no "political influence," and the French to have economic and political priority and the right to supply "such advisers as the Arabs desire."

[N. B.—The geography of the agreement is the geography of the White Knight, and it makes a similar irruption into economics when it lays down that the Bagdad Railway may not be finished till a Euphrates Railway has been built!]

DOCUMENT III.—The British statement to the seven Syrians of Cairo dated June 11, 1917. This assures them that pre-war Arab States, and Arab areas freed by military action of their inhabitants during the war, shall remain entirely independent.

[N. B.—This assurance was unqualified, and might have conflicted with Document I. or Document II., but was regulated locally by arrangement between Allenby and Faisal, by which the Arab army operated almost entirely in the area given to the Arabs in Document II.]

UNDER THE ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENT THE FRENCH HOLD SYRIA AND THE BRITISH ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR PALESTINE—ALSO FOR THE MOSUL DISTRICT. THE FRENCH OCCUPY CILICIA. THEY EVACUATE DAMASCUS, HAMA, HOMS, AND ALEPPO, AS THESE CITIES ARE PROMISED TO THE KINGDOM OF HEDJAZ. THE MAP SHOWS LATITUDE 37 DEGREES, MARKING THE NORTHERN BOUNDARY OF THE ARAB STATE UNDER THE AGREEMENT OF 1916 WITH KING HUSSEIN. THE LINES HAIFA-TEKRIT AND AKABA-KOWEIK MARK THE NORTH AND SOUTH BOUNDARIES OF THE BRITISH AREA CONCEDED IN THE ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENT OF 1916.

DOCUMENT IV.—The Anglo-French Declaration of Nov. 9, 1918. In this Great Britain and France agree to encourage native Governments in Syria and Mesopotamia, and without imposition to assure the normal working of such Governments as the peoples shall themselves have adopted.

[N.B.—This was interpreted in the Orient as changing the "direct" British and French areas "b" and "c" of Document II. to spheres of influence.]

[The author of Document I. was Sir Henry McMahon. Document II. and III. were by Sir Mark Sykes. Lord Robert Cecil authorized IV. They were all produced under stress of military urgency to induce the Arabs to fight on our side.]

The misunderstanding between the British and French was largely due to the inability of Britain to withdraw her promises to the Arabs, on the basis of which the allied nations secured the Shereef of Mecca (now King of the Hedjaz) as an ally against the Turk.

When Emir Feisal, during his former visit to Paris, declined to accept France as a mandatary for Syria, Great Britain declared formally that she would not accept the mandate in France's stead. Regarding Mosul, it was agreed during M. Clemenceau's visit to England in December, 1918, that the Mosul district should go to Britain as an integral part of Mesopotamia. The arrangement by which the British evacuation of Damascus, Hamal, Homs, and Aleppo will not be followed by the French occupation thereof was due to the fact that the boundary of the new Arab State by the 1916 treaty was placed slightly west of these towns. At this writing (Oct. 10) Emir Feisal is on his way to London at the request of the British Government to discuss the mandate for his own country, the Hedjaz.

The Anglo-Persian Agreement

Great Britain Provides Advisory, Military, and Financial Aid, but Denies Planning a Protectorate

AN agreement was concluded at Teheran, Persia, on Aug. 9, 1919, between Great Britain and Persia in regard to the future political, economical, and financial relations of the two countries, and two letters sent by the British Minister at Teheran to the Persian Prime Minister entered into supplementary verbal engagements. The full text of the two main instruments, as well as of the two letters, was made public in England on Aug. 16 and given out by the State Department at Washington on Sept. 19. The first instrument embodies Great Britain's agreement to supply, at Persia's expense, expert advisers, military officers, munitions, and equipment to form and supply an army to maintain order in Persia and along her borders. The second provides for a loan of £2,000,000, at 7 per cent., redeemable in twenty years, and possessing priority over all other debts except a former British loan of £1,250,000 made on May 8, 1911. In return for the new loan Persia pledges her customs receipts. The letters offer aid in recovering Persia's war claims and in arranging her boundary lines.

TEXT OF AGREEMENTS

The text of the two official agreements, of the agreement of May 8, 1911, and of the official letters transmitted, is given herewith:

No. 1

Agreement between the Governments of Great Britain and Persia.

Preamble: In virtue of the close ties of friendship which have existed between the two Governments in the past, and in the conviction that it is in the essential and mutual interests of both in future that these ties should be cemented, and that the progress and prosperity of Persia should be promoted to the utmost, it is hereby agreed between the Persian Government on the one hand and his Britannic Majesty's Minister, acting on behalf of his Government, on the other, as follows:

1. The British Government reiterate, in the most categorical manner, the undertakings which they have repeatedly given in the past to respect absolutely the independence and integrity of Persia.

2. The British Government will supply, at the cost of the Persian Government, the services of whatever expert advisers may, after consultation between the two Governments, be considered necessary for the several departments of the Persian administration. These advisers shall be engaged on contracts and endowed with adequate powers, the nature of which shall be the matter of agreement between the Persian Government and the advisers.

3. The British Government will supply, at the cost of the Persian Government, such officers and such munitions and equipment of modern type as may be adjudged necessary by a joint commission of military experts, British and Persian, which shall assemble forthwith for the purpose of estimating the needs of Persia in respect of the formation of a uniform force which the Persian Government proposes to create for the establishment and preservation of order in the country and on its frontiers.

4. For the purpose of financing the reforms indicated in Clauses 2 and 3 of this agreement, the British Government offer to provide or arrange a substantial loan for the Persian Government, for which adequate security shall be sought by the two Governments in consultation in the revenues of the customs or other sources of income at the disposal of the Persian Government. Pending the completion of negotiations for such a loan, the British Government will supply on account of it such funds as may be necessary for initiating the said reforms.

5. The British Government, fully recognizing the urgent need which exists for the improvement of communications in Persia, with a view both to the extension of trade and the prevention of famine, are prepared to co-operate with the Persian Government for the encouragement of Anglo-Persian enterprise in this direction, both by means of railway construction and other forms of transport; subject always to the examination of the problems by experts and to agreement between the two Governments as to the particular projects which may be most necessary, practicable, and profitable.

6. The two Governments agree to the appointment forthwith of a joint committee of experts for the examination and revision of the existing customs tariff with a view to its reconstruction on a basis calculated to accord with the legitimate interests of the country and to promote its prosperity.

Signed at Teheran, Aug. 9, 1919.

No. 2

Agreement relating to loan of £2,000,000, at 7 per cent., redeemable in twenty years.

Preamble: Contract between the British Government and the Persian Government with reference to an agreement concluded this day between the said Governments. It is agreed as follows:

Article 1.—The British Government grant a loan of £2,000,000 to the Persian Government, to be paid to the Persian Government as required in such installments and at such dates as may be indicated by the Persian Government after the British Financial Adviser shall have taken up the duties of his office at Teheran, as provided for in the aforesaid agreement.

Art. 2.—The Persian Government undertakes to pay interest monthly at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum upon sums advanced in accordance with Article 1 up to March 20, 1921, and thereafter to pay monthly such amount as will suffice to liquidate the principal sum and interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum in twenty years.

Art. 3.—All the revenues and customs receipts assigned in virtue of the contract of May 8, 1911, for the repayment of the loan of £1,250,000 are assigned for the repayment of the present loan with continuity of all conditions stipulated in the said contract, and with priority over all debts other than the 1911 loan and subsequent advances made by the British Government. In case of insufficiency of the receipts indicated above, the Persian Government undertakes to make good the necessary sums from other resources, and for this purpose the Persian Government hereby assigns to the service of the present loan and of the other advances above mentioned, in priority and with continuity of conditions stipulated in the aforesaid contract, the customs receipts of all other regions, in so far as these receipts are or shall be at its disposal.

Art. 4.—The Persian Government will have the right of repayment of the present loan at any date out of the proceeds of any British loan which it may contract for.

Signed at Teheran, Aug. 9, 1919.

No. 3

Article 5 of contract between the Persian Government and the Imperial Bank of Persia relating to the Persian Government 5 per cent. loan of £1,250,000 of May 8, 1911.

(Included for reference)

Art. 5.—The Imperial Government of Persia specially assigns to the service of the loan, and as a first charge thereon, subject only to prior charges amounting to £15,714 1s. 10d.

per annum for three years, and £30,278 12s. 7d. per annum from the year 1913 to the year 1928. The full net customs receipts of every description which the Government now is, or at any time hereafter may be, entitled to collect and receive at all ports or places in the Persian Gulf, including Bushire, Bunder Abbas, Lingah, Mohammerah, and Ahwaz, which receipts are hereby made payable to the Bank, and the Imperial Government of Persia hereby engages forthwith after receipt thereof to pay to the Bank all such customs receipts as aforesaid without deduction other than for actual expenses of administration of the customs of the said ports disbursed prior to the date of such payment.

(a) The Imperial Government of Persia undertakes that throughout the continuance of the loan all sums collected by the customs administration shall be paid to the Bank at the ports of collection or at its nearest branch, week by week, for meeting the prior charges referred to above and for the service of the loan, and an account of such receipts shall be submitted to the Persian Government by the Bank at the end of each month.

(b) The Bank shall, out of the moneys so collected, pay the prior charges above mentioned, and the interest and sinking fund of the loan, and shall hold the surplus at the disposal of the Imperial Government of Persia.

(c) The bank undertakes, out of the moneys so received, to pay on behalf of the Imperial Government of Persia the half-yearly coupon in London, and supervise the working of the sinking fund and service of the loan free of charges connected with the same.

(d) In the event of the customs receipts of the above-mentioned ports for any three months falling short of the amount required for the prior charges and the service of the loan, either for interest or amortization, the Imperial Government of Persia binds itself to make good such deficiency from other sources of Government revenue, and, further, should receipts from these sources fall below the amount required as above, the Persian Government hereby assigns for this purpose the revenue derived from the receipts of the telegraphs—this assignment to constitute a second charge on the said telegraph receipts up to the year 1928, after which the telegraph receipts will be free.

No. 4

Sir P. Cox to his Highness Vossug-ed-Dowleh.

British Legation, Teheran, Aug. 9, 1919.

Your Highness: I trust your Highness has been able, during your successful direction of affairs of the Persian State, to convince yourself that his Britannic Majesty's Government have always endeavored to support to the utmost the efforts of your Highness's Cabinet, on the one hand to restore order and security in the interior of the country, and on the other to maintain a policy of close cooperation between the Persian and British Governments.

As further evidence of the good-will by which the Cabinet of London is inspired, I am now authorized to inform your Highness that, in the event of the agreement regarding projects of reforms which your Government contemplates introducing in Persia being concluded, his Britannic Majesty's Government will be prepared in due course to co-operate with the Persian Government with a view to the realization of the following desiderata:

1. The revision of the treaties actually in force between the two powers.

2. The claim of Persia to compensation for material damage suffered at the hands of other belligerents.

3. The rectification of the frontier of Persia at the points where it is agreed upon by the parties to be justifiable.

The precise manner, time, and means to be chosen for pursuing these aims shall be discussed, as soon as practicable, by the two Governments. I have, &c., P. Z. COX.

No. 5

Sir P. Cox to his Highness Vossug-ed-Dowleh.

British Legation, Teheran, Aug. 9, 1919.

Your Highness. With reference to the second desideratum indicated in my previous letter of today's date, it is understood and agreed between the two Governments reciprocally that, on the one hand, his Majesty's Government will not claim from the Government of his Majesty the Shah the cost of the maintenance of British troops which his Majesty's Government were obliged to send to Persia owing to Persia's want of power to defend her neutrality, and that on the other hand the Persian Government will not claim from the British Government an indemnity for any damage which may have been caused by the said troops during their presence in Persian territory.

It is to be understood, however, that this agreement of the two parties does not in any way affect the claims of individuals and private institutions, which will be dealt with independently.

A note from your Highness informing me that you accept this position on behalf of the Persian Government will suffice to record the agreement of the two Governments on this subject. I have, &c., P. Z. COX.

ENGLISH EXPLANATION

The English explanation of the events that led to the signing of the Anglo-Persian agreement was as follows:

When the operations on the western front were approaching the stage of final success, the Shah appointed Vossug-ed-Dowleh Prime Minister. He, as well as two other Ministers, was favorable to British interests. Almost at the same time Great Britain sent as Minister to Teheran Sir Percy Cox. It was desired to conclude an agreement with Persia which would make it possible to safeguard British interests and prevent a recurrence of the difficulties encountered during the war, and which would give Persia the support she needed to maintain her position among the independent nations of the world. The Persian Government, according to this account, realized that Great Britain was the only great neighboring power interested in her fate and able to lend her assistance from a disinterested point of view.

She decided therefore of her own volition to ask Great Britain's aid in putting Persia's situation upon a sound basis, and to conclude an agreement by virtue of which the former country would be able to give to Persia the assistance she required. The possibility of a protectorate was specifically excluded by the first article of the agreement, which brought an end to the intrigues and jealousies of the different powers that had been disorganizing the country.

FOREIGN COMMENT

The publication of the treaty, however, aroused considerable comment abroad, some of it hostile. The Chicago Tribune, in its Paris edition, declared that the treaty was in contradiction not only with the Fourteen Points of President Wilson, but also with the clauses of the League of Nations. Many bitter attacks upon the treaty appeared in the French Press, especially in the Temps. Prominent Persians in Paris charged that the treaty reduced their independence to a mockery by placing all their financial and military affairs under British control; also, that it violated Article 10 of the League of Nations covenant. They asserted that under this agreement Persia was placed in the grip of England for twenty years at least by the period fixed for payment of the £2,000,000 loan, with no assurance that military and financial control would end even then.

The Echo de Paris objected that the treaty had been concluded without submitting it to the League of Nations. Commenting on the treaty terms it said:

If the above stipulations do not constitute a most complete protectorate, then words have lost their meaning. Doubtless nowhere is a formal protectorate mentioned, and doubtless a clause announces the independence and full integrity of Persia, but the substance of the agreement will fool no one.

Le Figaro also said that the Anglo-Persian agreement was equivalent to a protectorate and quoted The Morning Post of London, which said: "Were we not concerned in this matter we should say this was a protectorate."

The Temps on Aug. 16 virtually accused England of violating the covenant of the League of Nations. The promise to respect the integrity and independence of Persia it characterized as an oratorical precaution, and declared that Persian independence was attacked by the treaty itself. Persian sovereignty, it said, was lost by the clauses forcing Persia to employ only British officers and intrusting her finances only to British specialists. Persia, one of the nations invited to join the League of Nations, became the victim of what Article X. of the covenant especially forbade. Further, the Temps continued, Persia has a Constitution—that of 1907—which provides that all treaties must be ratified by its Assembly unless for the sake of expediency they are secret treaties. But this treaty cannot be considered secret because England has repudiated secret diplomacy. It cannot be ratified by the Assembly because no Assembly exists, and none can be elected under the existing régime of British military occupation. The Temps added that France resented this Persian treaty on moral grounds because of its violation of Wilsonian principles and of the League of Nations covenant, and asserted that France had no ulterior motive for its attitude and no intention to ask of England compensatory advantages to condone the offense.

Of the English papers The Daily News stood out in disapproval. Its comment was in part as follows:

Great Britain, having secured by the present agreement a position of monopoly in Persia, is prepared to consider doing for herself and us between herself and Persia what Persia desired the Peace Conference to do in the name of the Allies as a whole. Why did Great Britain frustrate that legitimate and reasonable desire? Was it in order to retain a lever to raise herself into the position of preponderance she obtains by the present treaty? The suspicion may be ill-founded—we should be thankful to be convinced that it was—but few agreements have worn an uglier look.

Other British papers approved the agreement and disclaimed the designs attributed by foreign criticism. The Daily Chronicle said:

No doubt we shall be accused of endeavoring to establish in Persia a second Egypt, but that is not our intention, nor is it to the interests of this country. A prosperous, well-governed, self-dependent and friendly Persia will be of infinitely more value to us than discontented and dependent. With a frontier bordering upon Russia, it is to her interest and ours that she should be free; for, even if we wanted—which we do not—another Egypt, we should not wish to have it in that place, above all others, where we need a friendly buffer State. We want an independent Persia for precisely the same reason that we have always wanted an independent Afghanistan.

The Morning Post commented as follows:

We do not think the new agreement can arouse the objection of any foreign Government; and, indeed, the services of British troops during the war when they occupied the Caspian region and Bagdad and held (what they still hold) the line from Bagdad to Kasvin, thus preventing the Germans from entering Asia by that route, entitle this country to some recognition.

ATTITUDE OF UNITED STATES

London representatives of American oil interests viewed the agreement as an attempt to assure British control over the great Persian oil fields and other natural resources such as the British Government had been planning in the Euphrates Valley; in this connection The London Chronicle's financial editor said that while the agreement was pre-eminently political, it was also true that the Government controlled the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, and no doubt had an eye to its financial interests in Persia.

Officially the Government of the United States had been inclined to favor Persian participation in the Peace Conference. Before it convened, the Persian Government had made representations both to the United States and Great Britain on its right of representation. One of the grounds on which it based this claim was that England, Russia, and Turkey had violated Persian neutrality during the war, the British, in especial, having established military bases on Persian territory and used it as a ground for military operations. In a reply to Persia's request sent by Secretary Lansing to Mirza Ali Kuli Khan, then Persian Chargé d'Affaires at Washington, it was stated that "The Government of the United States regards with sympathy the request that Persian delegates be admitted to the Peace Conference with power to take part in the discussion and determination of all questions with which Persia is interested or concerned." The Persian Government sent its delegation to Paris in January. All American efforts to secure the delegation's participation in the conference, however, proved abortive, and the mission was allowed only to present certain claims of its country on Feb. 14, followed by a supplementary memorandum on March 23 and a reminder on April 6. The Persians declared that no reasonable attention had been paid to their demands.

It was stated on Aug. 29 that Kaighosrow Shahrokh, member and Chief Custodian of the Persian Parliament, who was sent to the United States on a special mission, and who is now in Washington, had filed with Secretary Lansing a protest against the Anglo-Persian agreement, and that other influential Persians in the United States had begun to organize a movement against the new arrangement.

BRITISH OFFICIAL DENIALS

Officially, meanwhile, the British Government denied all designs on Persia. Cecil B. Harmsworth, Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, addressing the House of Commons on Aug. 18, said:

The policy of his Majesty's Government is to assist Persia to re-establish herself on a sound basis. There is not the slightest foundation for a suspicion that the Government proposed or that the Persian Government would have consented to create anything in the nature of a protectorate.

The Persian Government turned to Great Britain as her most powerful friendly neighbor, and this Government would have departed from its traditional policy of warm interest in the Persian Government had it declined to respond to her appeal.

Mr. Harmsworth said the attitude of the Persian Cabinet and the impending visit of the Shah to England constituted a sufficient answer to all the insinuations.

On Sept. 19 Earl Curzon, Government leader in the House of Lords and President of the council, speaking at a dinner given in London in honor of the Foreign Minister of Persia, said in part:

The independence of Persia is a British as well as a Persian interest. Indeed, our main interest in Persia is its independence. We do not want Persia to be a mere buffer against our enemies. We want her to be a bulwark for the peace of the world, and I can assure our guest he need have no fears upon that point. We shall respect the independence of his country.

We did not ask at the Peace Conference for a mandate in respect to Persia. Had it been offered, we should not have accepted it. I do not believe for a moment that Persia would have asked for it. We prefer to trade with Persia as a partner on equal terms, with that country enjoying her own sovereignty and capable of dealing with us on terms of partnership.

I do not conceal from myself that, fully as we understand the agreement concluded between us, suspicions have been aroused as to its real character. These suspicions rest, in the main, upon a misconception which should not be difficult to remove. I see it stated in some quarters that this agreement is a veiled protectorate by Great Britain over Persia. I take it that a protectorate means some assumption of exclusive responsibility and some curtailment or restriction in the protected country's liberties.

I find no evidence of such a condition of affairs in this agreement. I would not have been a party to any attempt to set up a British protectorate over Persia. In any case, it would have been impossible, because Persia would neither have asked for nor accepted it. On the contrary, she would have resented and resisted it. I should have been opposed to it because it would have been contrary to our repeated engagements, and, in the last resort, because I should have regarded it as inimical to British interests.

We have, or shall have, as a result of this war enough to do in the eastern parts of the world. If a nation assumes a protectorate, it also assumes certain responsibilities which have a tendency to attain the weight of a heavy burden. Above all, it is compelled to give financial assistance on a scale which may ultimately be overwhelming. Therefore neither I nor my colleagues would have consented to or acquiesced in anything like the creation of a British protectorate over Persia.

DENIES VIOLATION OF LEAGUE

Those who believe the British are going, as a result of this agreement, to settle down in Persia and to Anglicize, to Indianize or Europeanize it in any sense of the term are grossly mistaken. All we want to do is to give Persia expert assistance and financial aid which will enable her to carve out her own fortunes as an independent and still living country.

I see it stated in some quarters that this agreement is a disparagement or deliberate neglect of the League of Nations. Articles X. and XX. of the covenant are supposed in some sense to have been ignored by us.

I would say emphatically, on behalf of my Government and after a conversation with his Highness this afternoon, that both his Government and mine accept unreservedly Articles X. and XX. of the covenant of the League of Nations; and that we see in them nothing inconsistent with what we have done. On the contrary, as soon as the treaty of peace is ratified and as soon as the Council of the League of Nations comes into effective existence, it is the intention of his Government and mine to communicate the agreement to the council of the League with a full explanation and defense of its contents.

There is another point in the agreement concerning which there has been some misunderstanding. There is a passage in it which says the two Governments had agreed to the appointment of a joint committee of experts for the examination and revision of existing customs tariffs, and it seems to have been inferred that Great Britain is claiming the right to revise customs treaties, not only between Persia and Great Britain, but between Persia and foreign powers. An examination of the text shows there is no ground for this suspicion.

Again, when we undertake in this agreement to co-operate with the Persian Government for the encouragement of Anglo-Persian enterprises, for the development of the country, we create thereby no monopoly. We claim no exclusive rights for ourselves to the exclusion of other powers, and, indeed, some of them have rendered substantial service to that country. . . .

I ask our guest to give, as I am confident he will be able to do, recognition of the fact that in the recent negotiations between us both parties acted with absolute freedom and were subject to no pressure whatsoever. We could not have imposed this agreement upon Persia if Persia had not been willing to accept it, and that country could not have wrung it from us. We are jointly prepared to defend this agreement, and look forward to the vindication of its real character in its operation.

Prince Firuz, Persian Foreign Minister, speaking in Teheran for the Shah, who was in Paris incognito, stated on Oct. 11 that Persia had sent a delegation to the Peace Conference when it was first organized, but the delegates had been refused admission; in the distracted condition of the country it had turned to Great Britain for financial and other assistance, and had received it. The agreement concluded with the British Ministry, he said, would be submitted to the Persian Parliament at an early date, and then to the League of Nations for approval. "Nothing in this agreement," he added, "affects the independence of Persia. It gives no permanent rights to Great Britain, nor any monopolies. We can ourselves fix the powers of counselors and of any military instructors it may please us to accept from England."

Text of the Shantung Treaty of 1898

What China Conceded to Germany

CHINA refused to sign the Treaty of Versailles because that treaty gave to Japan, temporarily, at least, the concessions formerly wrung from China by the German Empire; the President of China, however, issued a mandate at Peking on Sept. 24, 1919, announcing the termination of the war between that country and Germany. The mandate stated that, though China had refused to sign the treaty, it now recognized all the articles of that document except the one relating to the Shantung concessions. In view of the continued importance of the Shantung question in international affairs CURRENT HISTORY here presents the text of the original treaty of March 6, 1898, between Germany and China, which came into force with the formal exchange of ratifications at Berlin on April 29, 1898. The portions of the treaty embodying the "commercial concessions" (Parts II. and III.) were not made public officially until ten years later.

Following is the text of the entire document as translated from the German official version:

The incident at the mission station in the prefecture of Tsaouchoufu in Shantung having now been settled by amicable agreement, the Imperial Chinese Government regards the occasion as a suitable one for giving a special and concrete proof of its grateful recognition of the friendship which has hitherto at all times been manifested by Germany toward China. In consequence, the Imperial German Government and the Imperial Chinese Government, inspired by the mutual and reciprocal desire to strengthen the bonds of friendship between their two countries and further to develop the economic and trade relations of the citizens of the two States respectively with each other, have concluded the following special convention:

Part I.—Leasing-Arrangements Concerning Kiao-Chau

ARTICLE I.—His Majesty the Emperor of China, in pursuance of the object of strengthening the friendly relations between China and Germany, and increasing the military preparedness of the Chinese Empire, gives his promise—while he reserves to himself all rights of sovereignty in a zone fifty kilometers (one hundred Chinese li) in width surrounding the line of high-water mark of Kiao-Chau Bay—to permit within this zone the free passage of German troops at all times, and also to make no decree concerning measures of policy or administration affecting this zone without the previous assent of the German Government; and especially not to interpose any hindrance to any regulation of the water courses which at any time may become necessary. His Majesty the Emperor of China hereby reserves to himself the right, in friendly understanding with the German Government, to station troops in the zone above mentioned, and also to decree other military administrative measures.

ARTICLE II.—With the object of fulfilling the justifiable wish of the German Emperor, that Germany, like other powers, may have a place on the Chinese coast under its own jurisdiction, for the repair and fitting out of its ships, for the storing of materials and supplies for the same, and also for the establishment of other appliances connected therewith, his Majesty the Emperor of China concedes to Germany, by way of lease, provisionally for ninety-nine years, both sides of the entrance to Kiao-Chau Bay. Germany undertakes to carry through to completion, upon the territory conceded to it, the fortification of the buildings and establishments and for the defense of the entrance of the harbor.

ARTICLE III.—In order to prevent any possibility of conflicts arising, the Imperial Chinese Government will not, during the term of the lease, exercise rights of sovereignty, but concedes the exercise of the same to Germany, over the following explicitly defined territory:

1. On the northerly side of the entrance of the bay: The tongue of land bounded on its northeasterly side by a line drawn from the northeasterly corner of Potato Island to Loshan Harbor.
2. On the southerly side of the entrance of the bay: The tongue of land bounded on its southwesterly side by a line drawn from the southwesterly point of the inlet situated southwestward of Chiposan Island in a straight line to Tolosan Island.
3. The Chiposan Islands and Potato Island.
4. The whole expanse of water of the bay up to the highest water-mark as it is at this time.
5. All the islands which front upon Kiao-Chau Bay, and which require to be taken into consideration for the defense of the bay from the side toward the sea, namely, for example, Tolosan, Tschallantau, &c.

The high contracting parties bind themselves to have planned out and established an exact fixation of the boundaries of this territory leased to Germany and also of the fifty-kilometer zone around the bay; this to be done by commissioners appointed by both parties respectively and in a manner adapted to the local circumstances.

Chinese warships and merchant ships shall participate in all privileges in Kiao-Chau Bay on the same basis with the other nations which are on friendly terms with Germany, and the entrance and departure, as well as the sojourn of Chinese ships in the bay, shall be subjected to no other limitations than those which the Imperial German Government, by authority of the rights of sovereignty over the whole extent of the bay ancillary to its land rights and hereby conceded to it, may, at any time, by public decree, declare to be prohibitions applicable to the ships of other nations.

ARTICLE IV.—Germany obligates itself to erect the necessary guides and signals for navigation on the islands and shoals in front of the entrance of the bay.

No imposts shall be collected from Chinese warships or merchant ships in Kiao-Chau Bay except those to which other ships are subjected, for the purpose of the upkeep of the necessary harbor and wharf establishments.

ARTICLE V.—In case Germany should hereafter at any time express the wish to give back Kiao-Chau Bay to China before the expiration of the terms of the lease, China obligates itself to make good the expenditures which Germany shall have made in Kiao-Chau, and to concede to Germany a better place to be under Germany's own jurisdiction.

Germany obligates itself never to give any kind of leasehold right to any other power.

The Chinese people residing in the leased territory, assuming that they demean themselves in conformity with the laws and the public order, shall participate at all times in the protection of the German Government. So far as their lands are not included in plans for public improvements, they shall be at liberty to remain upon them.

If parcels of real estate owned by Chinese shall be included in plans for public improvements, the owner shall be indemnified for them.

As respects the reorganization of the Chinese customs stations which, as formerly situated, were outside the leased territory of Germany, but within the community-zone of fifty kilometers, the Imperial German Government intends to enter into an amicable understanding with the Chinese Government in regard to the determinate regulation of the customs boundary and the collection of customs, in a manner which will protect all the interests of China; and it binds itself to enter into further negotiations on this subject.

Part II.—Railroad and Mining Concessions

ARTICLE I.—The Imperial Chinese Government grants to Germany the concession for the following lines of railroad in the Province of Shantung:

1. From Kiao-Chau by way of Weihsen, Chingchou, Poshan, Tzechuan, and Tsinanfu, and from thence in a straight line to the boundary of Shantung;
2. From Kiao-Chau to Ichoufu and from thence onward through Lalwuhien to Tsinanfu.

It is understood that the building of the section from Tsinanfu to the boundary of Shantung shall not be entered upon until after the completion of the road to Tsinanfu. In order that an opportunity may be given for considering the connection of this line with the line to be built by China itself. The special agreement to be made after consultation, in regard to the details of all the undertakings, shall determine the route for this last section.

ARTICLE II.—For the building of the above-named lines of railroad, one or more German-Chinese railroad companies shall be formed. German and Chinese merchants shall be at liberty to contribute capital therefor, and on both sides there shall be named trustworthy officials to supervise these undertakings.

ARTICLE III.—For the regulation of the details a special agreement will be drawn up by the high contracting parties. China and Germany will regulate the matter for themselves; nevertheless the Chinese Government hereby obligates itself to the German-Chinese railroad companies which are to build the railroads to concede fair terms for the building and operation of the designated railroads, so that in all economic questions they shall not be placed in a worse position than other Chinese-European companies elsewhere in the Chinese Empire. This provision has reference only to economic matters. No part whatsoever of the Province of Shantung can be annexed or occupied by the building of the railroad lines.

ARTICLE IV.—Along the railroads above named within a space of thirty li from the lines, especially in Poshan and Weihsen on the Kiao-Chau-Tsinanfu line, and also in Ichoufu, and Lalwuhien on the Kiao-Chau-Ichoufu-Tsinanfu line, it shall be permissible for German contractors to work the coal-beds, and carry on other undertakings, and also to carry into execution the plans for necessary public works. As respects these undertakings German and Chinese merchants shall be at liberty to associate themselves in the furnishing of the capital. As in the case of the railroad concessions, so also as respects the working of mines, appropriate special arrangements will be agreed upon after mutual consultation. The Chinese Government hereby promises to concede to the German merchants and engineers fair terms in all respects, in harmony with the arrangements above mentioned undertaken by it in reference to railroads, so that the German contractors shall not be placed in a worse position than other Chinese-European companies elsewhere in the Chinese Empire. Moreover, this provision has reference only to economic matters, and has no other meaning.

Part III.—Priority Rights in the Province of Shantung

The Imperial Chinese Government obligates itself, in all cases in which for any purposes whatsoever within the Province of Shantung, the asking of foreign aid in persons, capital, or material shall be under consideration, to tender the public works and the supplying of materials to which the plans relate, for a first bid, to German industrial development engineers and material supply merchants who are engaged in similar undertakings.

In case the German industrial development engineers and material supply merchants are not inclined to undertake the carrying out of such works or the supplying of the materials, China shall be at liberty to proceed in any other manner at its pleasure.

The foregoing arrangements shall be ratified by the sovereigns of the two States which are the makers of this agreement, and the instruments of ratification shall be so exchanged that, upon the receipt in Berlin of the instrument of ratification on the part of China, the instrument of ratification on the part of Germany shall be handed to the Chinese Minister in Berlin.

The following agreement is drawn up in four originals—two German and two Chinese: and on March 6, 1898 equivalent to the fourteenth day of the second moon in the twenty-fourth year of Kuang-hsü, it was signed by the representatives of the two States which are the makers of the agreement.

(Signed)

Baron von HEYKING, Imperial German Minister.

LI HUNG-CHANG, Imperial Chinese Chief Secretary, Minister of the Tsungli-Yamén, &c.

WENG T'UNG-HO, Imperial Chinese Chief Secretary, member of the Council of State, Minister of the Tsungli-Yamén, &c.

Shantung Under General Ma Liang

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

[MANAGER OF THE CHINA BUREAU OF INFORMATION]

The Governmental methods of General Ma Liang, the pro-Japanese ruler of Shantung Province, are described in this article by Mr. Sokolsky, the head of a Chinese bureau of information recently established in Shanghai, China. Though Ma Liang is a Chinaman, his sympathies are on the Japanese side of the controversy. His acts in enforcing martial law in the disputed province during August, 1919, are here reviewed from a Chinese viewpoint.

THINGS reached their climax in Shantung at the end of July, when the Civil Governor, Shen Ming Chang, resigned. Thus the last barrier between the Chinese and the Japanese disappeared. Governor Shen was beloved by the people of the province, and he resigned because of his inability to settle the many disputes which arose between China and Japan in a manner acceptable to the Chinese people; because he wished to protest against the high-handed actions of the Japanese in Shantung; and because he was bitter against the Japanese, stating that they were riding roughshod over China.

After the Civil Governor had resigned, martial law was declared and General Ma Liang was appointed to carry out its provisions. Ma Liang is a man of considerable education and ability. He has written a series of books on the subject of physical training which are the best in the Chinese language. He is a brilliant commander and is very much beloved by his troops. However, he has a purely military point of view, and is unable to understand the present patriotic movements in China, except as a direct offense to the militarists and as an insult to him personally. His army is paid out of a loan which was made by Japan to General "Little" Hsu, and he feels that if the Japanese lost their power his army would be unpaid. Therefore he has been acting in the interest of Japan and against the interest of his own country in the province.

Ma Liang's attitude toward Japan is best described in his own words in a speech which he delivered at the Normal School for Boys in Tsinan on July 22. He said:

What we eat, the Japanese give us; our clothes, the Japanese give us. We should unite with the Japanese and be as one. We must show the Japanese how grateful we are to them for all their kindness. If you persist in refusing to buy Japanese goods I will force you to buy them. . . .

The Americans want us not to buy Japanese goods, because the white peoples want us to destroy ourselves and the Japanese. The Chinese refused to sign the Peace Treaty only because the Americans told them not to do it. Had they signed the Peace Treaty the following special privileges would have accrued to China:

1. Japan and China would have been friendly to each other.
2. Extraterritoriality would have been abolished, and hereafter Chinese officials would be able to punish Europeans and Americans.
3. The customs would have been revised favorably to China.

Had the Peace Treaty been signed these three points would have been gained and only Tsing-tao lost.

A student arose and asked Ma Liang, "According to you it would be better for China to belong to Japan?" Ma Liang replied: "Why not? Korea, India, and Palestine belong to others. The people in those countries seem to be happy. Why should the Chinese worry about it so? Hereafter any one who boycotts Japanese goods will be executed; and, because I am a Mohammedan, I will begin with the Mohammedans."

On Aug. 3, 600 students in Tsinan met and appointed fifteen of their number to call upon the Military Governor and to make three requests:

1. That the martial law which had been declared throughout the province be canceled.
2. That the old Civil Governor, Shen Ming Chang, who had been permitted to resign, should be reappointed.
3. That General Ma Liang be removed.

Ma Liang regarded this as a personal matter. He immediately arrested the fifteen students and bamboosed them. Ma Liang made violent threats against the student prisoners, whom he said he would execute summarily as a warning to the whole province that his will should not be opposed. At 9 o'clock the same evening the British and American Consuls at Tsinan called upon Ma Liang to inquire after the fate of the students. He said they had been released.

Early in the morning of Aug. 4 General Ma executed three Mohammedans, the eldest of whom was a native physician 68 years old, who had rendered professional services to General and Mrs. Ma. Before being put to death the old man was frightfully tortured with red-hot irons and was given 112 lashes. Ma Liang executed these Mohammedans under the cover of martial law and on the ground that they were Bolsheviks. It is not likely that Ma Liang knew anything about Bolsheviks or that he even knew the word. The act and excuse both emanated from the same source, from his Japanese advisers, who are using him to cow the brave people of Shantung.

The President of the Tsinan Students' Union, Mr. Hsia, is a prisoner in the Shantung Christian College, in which he studies medicine. Should he leave the building, he will be arrested, and if not executed, at any rate imprisoned and bamboosed. I visited Mr. Hsia and he told me of his interview with Ma Liang. He said that he had asked Ma Liang not to declare martial law, and to release the merchants and proclaim freedom of meeting. The requests were refused. Ma Liang said: "You cannot interfere in this business. If you do I will kill you. I don't want to talk with you; I have the power to force you to do as I say."

On Aug. 2 the students visited the Military and Civil Governors to make the same requests. Ma Liang, through his highly developed spy system, knew what was happening, and frightened the Military Governor by telling him that the students were going to rebel the following day and send him a bomb.

Subsequently sixteen students were imprisoned in the Normal School Building. Sixty girl students, who decided to lend the boys their moral support, were prevented by soldiers from entering the building, but sat in the hot sun in the street. Ma Liang arrived with his body-guard, drove all the students into the school, and delivered this speech:

You students are foolish, not patriotic. You are under the influence of Southern leaders. The merchants who have been arrested were not patriotic. They were Bolsheviks. They must be severely punished. The students must obey the rules. The President has proclaimed martial law, and who does not obey will be shot. * * * The students' movement is due to Western influence. The Chinese and the Japanese must stand together against the Western nations. Had the treaty been signed China would have been in a position of equality with all the nations of the world. * * * The business of a student is to study in the school, and if any student participates in these foolish movements against the Japanese I will shoot him.

One student who remonstrated with him was bamboosed till an artery in his wrist was broken. Girl students who tried to join their imprisoned comrades were brutally treated and insulted.

After this the student headquarters were closed, their literature was burned, the boycott movement was suppressed, and the effort to raise funds to buy back the railroads came to an end for the time being.

Evolution of the Tank

A Brief History of the Land Dreadnoughts and Their Increasing Efficiency in Battle

THE first armored battle cars or "tanks" were a British invention developed from an American automobile tractor used for agricultural purposes on the Western prairies. They made their initial appearance at the battle of the Somme, Sept. 15, 1916. Various models were tried successively after that, both by the French and by the British, with two diverging tendencies, one toward smaller and more mobile machines, culminating in the French "baby tanks," and the other toward still more powerful and heavy machines, culminating in the Mark V. model, weighing thirty-six tons and armed with six-pounder guns. When the war ended there were in hand extensive developments of both kinds of tanks that gave promise of force sufficient to smash through the enemy lines with impunity in the following Spring.

When trench warfare resulted in the establishment of fixed lines the British Navy's armored car division lost its former value, demonstrated in the early part of the war in scouting and skirmishing expeditions. Lieutenant Walter G. Wilson, R. N. V. R., of Squadron 20, throughout 1915 carried on experiments with a view to discovering a trench-crossing machine which would take infantry into the enemy lines with comparative immunity from rifle and machine-gun fire. Meanwhile the Landship Committee, with Mr. (now Sir Eustace) d'Eyncourt as Chairman, had been formed. The test laid down was that the machine must be able to climb a parapet four and a half feet high and cross a trench five and a half feet wide, this being the average dimensions of an enemy trench; it also had to cross soft ground of a consistency equal to Flanders mud and break through barbed wire posts.

Lieutenant Wilson worked in conjunction with Mr. (now Sir William) Trit-ton of the engineering firm of W. Foster & Co., at Lincoln, and at that firm's works two experimental machines were set up, nicknamed Little Willie and Big Willie. In the latter was embodied the germ from which sprang all subsequent types of tanks—i. e., a curved armored steel hull with all-round track. Trials took place at Hatfield Park in January and February, 1916, at which the King, Mr. Lloyd George, Lord Kitchener, Commodore Sueter, and Mr. Churchill were present. It was the last-named who, as First Lord of the Admiralty, sanctioned and encouraged the experiments when there was a marked lack of enthusiasm in high military quarters.

FIRST EXPERIMENTS

Foster's was ordered to build 125 machines, and in order that no whisper should reach the enemy of what was afoot and owing to some resemblance borne by the very first machine to an oil tank cart such as used to be seen in the streets of London, the name "tank" was adopted. It was undoubtedly the best-kept secret of the war. Supply was placed in the hands of a leading member of the Landship Committee, also an officer of the Armored Car Squadron, Major Albert Stern, (now Colonel Sir A. Stern.) a man of immense resource and energy. Colonel Stern put his whole heart and soul into the pioneer work of production, and was not afraid to enlist the support of the most powerful in the land when opposition had to be broken down. Another order for tanks was given to the Metropolitan Carriage Works Company, Birmingham, and in time this firm became the backbone of heavy tank production.

By September, 1916, a considerable number of tanks, Marks I., II., and III., were in France ready for action, receiving their first practical test on the Somme. They carried 105 horse power Daimler engines, with an armament of 6-pounder 40-calibre naval guns and machine guns and averaged two miles an hour on fairly hard ground.

With the development of the tanks, these first machines, by the end of the war, had come to be looked upon as the Noah's Arks of the Tank Corps, with the cartwheel device at the back for getting over awkward angles. It had become manifest that speed, steering, and invulnerability had to be greatly improved, and the terrain for these juggernauts of war carefully chosen. The huge possibilities of the tank even in its primitive state were exemplified in the Ministry of Munitions Journal, in which it was reported that on Sept. 25, 1916, one tank followed by a company of infantry cleared 1,500 yards of enemy trench, killing many Germans and capturing 360 prisoners at a cost of five casualties to English troops.

TANK MARK IV.

Thus came the Mark IV. tank, with its epicyclic control, its thicker armor plate, and its unditching gear, a beam which could be manipulated to lever it out of awkward holes. The latter device, however, could not be used unless the crew exposed themselves, a drawback that was remedied in the later types. The Mark IV. male tank carried two 6-pounder guns of a new type, shorter than the naval gun, and four Lewis machine guns; and the female tank six machine guns. Its highest speed was a little less than four miles an hour on firm ground, and it weighed twenty-eight tons and measured twenty-six feet over all. It had a 150 horse power Ricardo engine.

Meanwhile the medium Mark A tank, commonly known as the "whippet," had been designed. It weighed seventeen tons, carried two forty-five horse power Tylor engines, had a maximum speed of eight miles an hour, and was armed with four Hotchkiss machine guns. The crew comprised one officer and three men. It made its debut in a minor action during the great German push in March, 1918, and in the following month filled the enemy war correspondents with dismay at machines "which could outpace cavalry and were too quick for field guns to put them out of action." This was an exaggerated notion of the mobility of the whippet, but the machine did accomplish some remarkable feats. Near Villers' Bretonneux, after the German bid for Amiens had failed, a few whippets routed a German brigade, causing 400 enemy casualties at a cost of five British casualties and one whippet hors de combat.

FRENCH BABY TANKS

By this time the French had taken up tanks most enthusiastically, and their light Renault chars-à-assaut—with a thirty-seven-millimeter gun or eight-millimeter Hotchkiss machine guns—caused the enemy almost as much uneasiness as its British prototype.

Louis Renault had submitted a model for smaller tanks to the French commission handling such matters. No decision being reached regarding their use, he manufactured at his own risk of failure one hundred of these light machines and presented them to General Pétain. After seeing them in action the Commander in Chief of the Armies of the North and Northeast realized their possibilities, and a large order was given Renault's firm. These tanks, manufactured in great numbers, contributed largely to the victory obtained by Mangin's army on July 18, 1918. To commemorate this event and to express due recognition of Renault, the French Association of Automobile Manufacturers tendered him a banquet on the occasion of his nomination as a member of the Legion of Honor.

The heavier French tanks—the St. Chamond and Schneider—carried much more formidable armaments than the British machines, but were necessarily less mobile with their seventy-five-millimeter (about 3.3 inch) guns and ammunition. All these machines did well at the battle of Noyon and other engagements.

THE MARK V.

Other types were being designed in England throughout 1916 and 1917—gun carriers, salvage, and infantry supply—but every nerve was strained to improve the heavy fighting tank. Thus came the Mark V., whose main feature was the very much easier control and rapidity of turning. This machine weighed thirty-six tons, was twenty-eight feet in length, had a maximum speed of close on five miles an hour, and was armed with two short six-pounder guns and four Hotchkiss machine guns. The female Mark V. carried six machine guns and no six-pounders. The Mark V. carried a 150 horse power Ricardo engine.

This machine and a modified form of it—Mark V.—bore the brunt of the tank fighting in the Summer of 1918, and it is acknowledged by the military experts that Marshal Foch's great counterattack on the Soissons salient in July owed much of its success to the co-operation of tanks, which gave courage and confidence to the troops, while it spread a corresponding measure of despair among the enemy ranks. Heavies used to make a plunge at machine-gun posts and go clean over them, burying the enemy gunners and their weapons in the ground under thirty-six tons of metal. In a short time their coming became in most cases a signal for an enemy saue qui peut.

IN THE CAMBRAI BATTLE

The very idea of tanks contemplated a vast saving of infantry man power, and if in its early essays the tank did not execute this function in a marked degree it was largely due to the softness and the flatness of the terrain selected. On the Somme in 1916 and near Arras in the Spring of 1917 it was this difficulty of ground, coupled with the slowness of the machines then in use, which gave the German gunners chances which they could not miss. But in the capture of the Messines Ridge in June, 1917, tanks gave great assistance to the infantry, and this was repeated in the Ypres-Comines Canal operations in the following months. In a certain small attack in August, 1917, which ordinarily would have been expected to incur several hundreds of casualties, the co-operation of several tanks reduced the number to fifteen.

Then came the famous battle of Cambrai in November, 1917, which dispelled any lingering doubts as to the efficacy of tanks and resulted in the capture of an enemy zone over six miles deep and of thousands of prisoners and over a hundred guns and trench mortars, besides the loss to the enemy of many killed and injured. The surprise was so complete that on the first day the British infantry losses were only half the number of prisoners taken. Yet the best machines used in this attack were Mark IVs., and during the operations of 1918 that terminated in the enemy's complete surrender the saving of casualties by the Mark V. and Medium Mark A machines was immeasurable; though it must be stated in fairness to the Tank Corps that the tank casualties were often very heavy. The Germans had devoted an extraordinary amount of thought and genius to combating tanks, having failed to produce a successful machine themselves. They turned out a few very cumbrous machines, inferior in everything but armament to the earliest British types, and the German Headquarters Staff is understood to have reported adversely on the use of them, though several came into action, together with some of the British captured Mark IVs.

The enemy were under no illusion as to the efficacy of tanks in 1918, but neither their designing nor manufacturing capacity was capable of quick production, and when this new weapon really began to appear in numbers on the British side the tank became the bugbear of the Germans.

WHO INVENTED THE TANK?

Secretary for War Winston Churchill, testifying before the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors, declared that it was impossible to say "that this or that man invented the tank," the caterpillar monster that broke through the enemy's wire entanglements, and its progeny, the whippet (British) and the baby (French), that chased retreating Germans and poured machine-gun fire into them. Mr. Churchill spoke of eighteen types of land ships from which models were constructed by the Government, though only ten or eleven of these designs dealt with the tank idea. The caterpillar tractor, a farm implement invented by "Uncle" Ben Holt of California, was finally adopted as the motive power and basis of the war tank. Colonel I. C. Welborn, Director of the Tank Corps of the United States Army, made the following statement in December, 1918, about the evolution of the machine which the British first used at Delville Wood on Sept. 15, 1916, in the battle of the Somme:

For several years prior to the world war the authorities of the British Army had been endeavoring to create some machine highly destructive in its fighting capacity, and at the same time affording maximum protection to human life. The Holt Manufacturing Company, maker of the Holt farm tractor, was giving a tractor demonstration in one of the large German cities [in 1914]. A representative of the British Government who happened to see the exhibit conceived the idea that the caterpillar tractor might be employed in propelling a huge steel fighting machine which would enable a moving fort to negotiate the steepest hills and to move over difficult ground impossible of passage by any other vehicle. This officer immediately brought the tractor to the attention of General (then Colonel) E. D. Swinton of the British Army, who also realized the effective use to which the caterpillar tractor could be put.

GENERAL SWINTON'S TESTIMONY

Whether General Swinton was the first to prepare a model of the superstructure of an armored turret car based on a caterpillar tractor is still disputed by some of his countrymen. When General Swinton visited the United States in June, 1918, he frankly said:

America must be credited with both the machine gun and its antidote, for in Antwerp in 1914 [not in a German city, it seems] a friend of mine saw for the first time an American agricultural caterpillar tractor. He wrote to me inquiring if there were not some military uses to which the idea could be put, and the invention of the tank resulted.

The tank idea was born of the tactical problems of the Great War, not long after the first battle of the Marne, when trench fighting began and open warfare was brought to a sudden stop: Never before had defenses bristled so densely with wire entanglements. Open warfare, according to Field Marshal Haig, was resumed in some degree in the battle of the Somme, but it was not until Sir Julian Byng made his surprise attack on the German line before Cambrai in the Autumn of 1917 that tanks were employed in force and without artillery preparation. Then the trench system was broken up for a time, and there was open warfare on a front of several miles. Open warfare had been planned by both the French and British General Staff long before the Americans entered the war, but there was no practical test until the British were ready to assemble a large number of tanks to lead the infantry into action.

Humorous German Balance Sheet of Gains and Losses

In an August issue of the Berlin comic paper, Ulk, appeared the following ingenious "Balance Sheet of the War."

Secret History of the Tanks

By SIR ALBERT STERN

Sir Albert Stern, who was made a Lieutenant in the Armored Car Division of the British Navy in November, 1914, and who was one of the chief creators of the tank, has narrated in the Strand Magazine the secret history of the new engine of war. A Major Hetherington, Transport Officer of the division, was a great advocate of new inventions. After a discussion of the uselessness of armored cars except on roads, Major Hetherington one day got the Duke of Westminster sufficiently interested in the idea of a "land cruiser" to invite Winston Churchill to dinner to discuss it. Mr. Churchill was delighted with the project of a cross-country car, and appointed a committee to study it, Eustace Tennyson d'Eyncourt, Director of Naval Construction, being made its Chairman, on Feb. 24, 1915. After describing this committee's early efforts, Sir Albert Stern continues:

WE encountered opposition from all quarters. Manufacturers did not like our type of work. It was all experimental and meant continual canceling of orders. Then, in July, 1915, the Ministry of Munitions took over all inventions in connection with land warfare. * * * In August the whole of the Armored Car Division was disbanded. This disbandment was stopped by the personal intervention of Mr. d'Eyncourt. It was one of the many occasions on which he saved the landships (and future tanks) from extinction.

The first tank, "Mother," was finished on Jan. 26, 1916, and sent by train to Hatfield station. Colonel Sir Maurice Hankey arranged for Mr. McKenna, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to travel down to the Hatfield trials in my car. I explained to him our ideas of mechanical warfare and its value in the saving of life and shells. After the trials Mr. McKenna said that it was the best investment he had yet seen, and that, if the military approved, all the necessary money would be available. Sir William Robertson was well satisfied with the machine.

Colonel Swinton, who was acting at this time as Assistant Secretary to the Committee of Imperial Defense, was intrusted with the task of raising and training a corps to man the tanks, and a camp was taken at Thetford, in Norfolk. It was kept a great secret, and the whole ground, several miles in extent, was surrounded by armed guards. Several displays were given there during the Summer, and live six-pounder shells were used. The King, Mr. Lloyd George, and Sir William Robertson were among those who saw our displays.

On Sunday, Sept. 17, Sir Douglas Haig appeared in front of General Butler's offices and congratulated Colonel Swinton and me. He said: "We have had the greatest victory since the battle of the Marne. We have taken more prisoners and more territory, with comparatively few casualties. This is due to the tanks. Wherever the tanks advanced we took our objectives, and where they did not advance we failed to take our objectives." He added: "Colonel Swinton, you shall be head of the Tank Corps. Major Stern, you shall be head of the construction of tanks. Go back and make as many more tanks as you can. We thank you." Immediately after my return we were ordered to build 1,000 tanks.

On Oct. 10 I received an official instruction from the Army Council canceling the order for 1,000 tanks. I immediately went to see Mr. Lloyd George, the Secretary of State for War. He said that he had heard nothing of the instruction. I told him that he could cancel my appointment, but he could not possibly get me to cancel the orders I had placed. Sir William Robertson, the Chief of the Imperial General Staff, then appeared, and Mr. Lloyd George said that he could not understand how this order could be canceled without his knowledge, since he was President of the Army Council. He asked me to tell Sir William Robertson what I had told him. This I did. Excusing myself owing to pressure of work, I then left the room. The order for the production of 1,000 tanks was reinstated next day.

In May, 1917, Sir Douglas Haig wrote a letter to Lord Derby, the Secretary of State for War, in which he said that the importance of tanks was firmly established and that there should be a special department at the War Office to look after them. A committee was therefore set up, with General Capper as Chairman. On July 27 Sir Eustace d'Eyncourt and I ceased to attend the meetings of this committee. We found that the three military members, who a month before had never even seen a tank, laid down all rulings even with regard to design and production. They were in the majority and we could do nothing. Instead of orders being given for thousands of tanks, as I had hoped, Mr. Churchill told me that the requirements of the army for 1918 were to be 1,350 fighting tanks. This I determined to fight with every means in my power, and I told Mr. Churchill so. I then had an interview with Sir William Robertson, Chief of the Imperial General Staff, and told him that the proposed preparations for 1918 were wholly and entirely inadequate.

On Oct. 11 I asked for an interview with Mr. Churchill in order to put my views before him, for he appeared to be taking the advice of the War Office and not of the pioneers of mechanical warfare. He said that I had his confidence, but that the War Office wanted a change made. The War Office, he said, accused me of lumbering them up with useless tanks at the front and of wasting millions of the public money. In the opinion of the War Office there had been a total failure in design, no progress had been made, all the money spent on tanks had been wasted, and the belief in mechanical warfare was now at such a low ebb that they proposed to give it up entirely. * * * On Oct. 15 I was told by Sir Arthur Duckham that three Generals at the War Office had asked for my removal.

The whole trouble with the War Office was that I had pressed for a large program of tanks, at least 4,000, for the fighting of 1918, but the committee against which we had continually protested, with its War Office majority of Generals who know nothing of tanks, had overruled me. Now, at a time when the decisions of experts were absolutely necessary in preparation for 1918, and when it was clear to us that enormous quantities of tanks were needed, the War Office program was for 1,350 tanks. Mr. Churchill told me that he agreed with Sir Eustace d'Eyncourt and me that quantities of tanks were necessary for 1918, but as Minister of Munitions he could not argue with the Generals at the War Office about their requirements; his business simply was to supply what they wanted.

Next day Sir E. d'Eyncourt and I asked for an interview with Mr. Churchill. He refused to see Sir E. d'Eyncourt, and told me that, with regret, he had decided to appoint a new man in my place, and, therefore, there was no object in discussing the situation. He added that he was in power and, therefore, it was his responsibility, and that he had taken the advice of the Council member, Sir Arthur Duckham. I told him that I would not resign, as I believed it to be against the public interest, but that he could dismiss me. I had an interview with Sir Arthur Duckham on the same day, and he told me that Mr. Churchill was unable to persuade the War Office to have a larger number of tanks, but that, as he was a believer in mechanical warfare, it was his opinion that America should be persuaded to arm herself with the necessary number of tanks for next year's fighting.

On April 8, 1918, Lord Milner, now Secretary of State for War, came to see me at the offices of the Mechanical Warfare (Oversea and Allies) Department in Paris. I explained to him the development of mechanical warfare, and told him that the tanks had great power of destruction quite out of proportion to their own total cost of humanity, which was limited to eight men a tank. I explained that I had been removed from my position on the demand of the War Office because I had fought for the development of mechanical warfare, and told the War Office that their preparations for 1918 were entirely inadequate; that the program had now been increased, too late, from 1,350 to nearer 5,000; that I had fought for the standardization of mechanical warfare against continual change of design, and that standardization was at last to be brought in by August, 1918—again too late. I said that we had fought our hardest to prevent inexperienced officers from ruining the one development in this country in which we had outstripped the Germans, but that instead of continuing its healthy growth under imaginative practical men, it had been placed under the heel of elderly service men, with the usual results: that the modern methods of standardization and efficiency, untrammelled by army procedure and prejudice, had been stamped out.

Finally, I begged him to see Sir Eustace d'Eyncourt and to discuss the question of some proper authority to control and develop mechanical warfare. From this date a new era of progress started for mechanical warfare at the War Office, with Sir Henry Wilson as Chief of the Imperial General Staff and General Harrington as Deputy Chief.

Colonel McCrae's Famous Poem and a Reply

IN FLANDERS FIELDS

By JOHN McCRAE

In Flanders fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place; and in the sky
The larks, still bravely singing, fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

We are the Dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe!
To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high!
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields.
France, June, 1915.

YE ARE NOT DEAD

By FRANK E. HERING

In Flanders still the poppies grow
Among the crosses, bending low,
On fragile stems, their cups of red
Like censers swinging o'er the dead
That fell short days ago.

Ye are not dead! If it were so
We that abide could never go
As blithely marching by your bed
In Flanders fields.

Because your bodies lie below,
Above, with an intenser glow,
The Torch moves on; in your brave stead
Men dare to bleed as ye have bled—
That larks may sing, and poppies blow
In Flanders fields.

DEFEAT OF RATIFICATION

Decisive Vote Against Peace Treaty Ends Long Debate in the United States Senate

THE United States Senate on Nov. 19, 1919, at 10:30 P. M., refused by a decisive vote to ratify the Treaty of Versailles. This decision, by which the United States alone of all the great powers rejected the treaty and the League of Nations covenant, was the outcome of four months of bitter debate, during which the Republican majority in the Senate—under the leadership of Senator Lodge of Massachusetts—had striven to alter or modify the treaty, and the Democratic Administration minority had tried to preserve it intact. When the crucial test came, each side defeated the purpose of the other, so that the treaty was rejected in two different ways. The vote on unconditional ratification—without amendments or reservations—stood 38 ayes and 53 noes, whereas an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the whole number was required to ratify. On ratification with the reservations, which had been adopted by the Senate sitting as a Committee of the Whole, the decisive vote was 39 ayes, 55 noes. A motion to reconsider brought a third vote of similar import.

Party lines were broken in the final votes by seven Democrats who joined the Republicans in rejecting the treaty without qualification; one Republican (McCumber of North Dakota) voted with the Democrats for unconditional ratification. In the ballot for ratification with reservations seven Democrats voted with the Republicans, while thirteen Republican Senators, known as irreconcilable opponents of the League of Nations covenant, voted with the Democrats.

Shortly after thus defeating the treaty the Senate adjourned, putting an end to the extra session, and dispersed to reassemble at the regular session on Dec. 1.

This action of the Senate killed the treaty for the time being, so far as the United States was concerned, and left the relations between this country and Germany in the same position as when the armistice was signed, Nov. 11, 1918. The President was the sole authority that could decide what further steps were to be taken. It was generally believed that he would again present the treaty to the Senate when it reassembled; that one or two of the Lodge reservations would be modified slightly to make them acceptable to friends of the treaty, and that ratification would follow in due course.

In CURRENT HISTORY for November the proceedings of the Senate on the treaty up to Oct. 25 were reviewed. The first decisive action after that date was the defeat by a vote of 38 to 40 of the amendment offered by Senator Johnson of California regarding the voting strength of Great Britain in the Assembly of the League of Nations. This amendment sought to equalize the vote of Great Britain and its dominions and colonies with the vote of the United States.

ALL AMENDMENTS DEFEATED

On Oct. 29 the Senate clearly demonstrated that, while it favored many reservations, it would sanction no amendments to the treaty; on that day it voted down four amendments by decisive majorities. By voting down an amendment sponsored by Senator Moses, Republican, of New Hampshire, on equality of vote in the League Assembly, by a vote of 47 to 36, the Senate completed the list of amendments promulgated by the Foreign Relations Committee. The other amendments voted on that day were offered by individual Senators. They were these:

One by Senator Johnson of California offered as a substitute to his amendment on equality of vote, killed by the Senate earlier in the week, and amplifying it so as to make it more emphatic; defeated by a vote of 43 to 35.

One offered by Senator Shields, Democrat, of Tennessee, to provide that Great Britain and her colonies and dominions have collectively but three delegates and one aggregate vote in the assembly; defeated 49 to 31.

One by Senator Sherman, Republican, of Illinois, to insert the phrase to "invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God," in the preamble, defeated 57 to 27.

All the amendments proposed by the Foreign Relations Committee had now been defeated by decisive majorities. On Nov. 4 Senator Lodge put in an amendment to strike from the treaty the three sections under which the economic rights on the Shantung Peninsula are awarded to Japan. He had given notice of this amendment early in October, when the Senate defeated the committee amendment on Shantung by a vote of 55 to 35. The Senate voted down the new amendment by 41 to 26. Then Senator Borah offered an amendment to strike from the treaty the article guaranteeing the territorial integrity and political independence of members of the League of Nations. After two hours of debate on it Mr. Borah withdrew the amendment, explaining that he would await the Senate's action on his reservation to limit the obligation imposed on the United States under that article.

On Nov. 5 an amendment by Senator La Follette of Wisconsin to strike from the treaty the labor provisions was defeated by a vote of 34 to 47. The following day the last attempt to amend the treaty, made by Senator Gore (Dem., Okla.) was defeated by a vote of 76 to 16; it provided that the United States should hold a referendum vote before entering any war.

BATTLE ON RESERVATIONS

The real battle on the qualifying reservations reported by the Foreign Relations Committee began on Nov. 7. The first vote was on the preamble, which required the written assent of three of the allied powers to the American reservations. Efforts to modify it were defeated, and it was adopted by a vote of 48 to 40; three Democrats, Senators Gore, Reed, and Walsh of Massachusetts, voted aye with the Republicans; one Republican, Senator McCumber, voted no with the Democrats; Senator Shields, Democrat, of Tennessee, would have voted aye, but was paired with Senator Martin (Dem., Va.), who was ill.

On Nov. 8, after a stubborn fight by the minority, the Senate, by a vote of 50 to 35, adopted the reservation offered by the Foreign Relations Committee majority, under which the United States claims the right to be the sole judge, in the event of its withdrawal from the League of Nations, as to whether its obligations to the League have been fulfilled.

Had all the Senators who were unable to vote because of being paired or absent cast their votes, the result would have shown every one of the forty-nine Republican Senators in favor of the reservation, together with six Democrats, making an aggregate of fifty-five Senators for the reservation and forty-one against it.

Efforts were also made by the minority to strike out all mention of a concurrent or joint resolution, giving Congress the option to proceed as it deemed fit. These were likewise defeated.

On the final vote, although Senators McCumber and Nelson had assailed the proposal for a concurrent resolution, contending that it was a deliberate affront to the President, in taking away the veto power he had under the Constitution, they voted for the reservation exactly as it was offered by the majority. An unexpected vote in favor of the reservation was that of Senator Chamberlain, Democrat, of Oregon, who, supporting it, broke away for the first time from the Administration alignment.

ANNULLING ARTICLE X.

The Senate on Nov. 10 began the debate on the reservation regarding Article X. of the treaty; this reservation put the United States on record as refusing to be bound by any obligation to use its armed forces in case of outside aggression threatening the territory of any of the members of the League, except by the consent of Congress. This was the reservation which President Wilson had denounced as "a knife-thrust at the heart of the covenant." A modified reservation offered by Senator Thomas, Democrat, of Colorado, was defeated by a vote of 48 to 36, four Democrats—Gore, Reed, Smith of Georgia, and Walsh—voting with the Republicans. The debate continued on Nov. 11 and 12. On the 13th the reservation precisely as recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee was adopted by a vote of 46 to 33. On this crucial ballot all the Republicans voted aye, together with four Democrats, Senators Gore, Reed, Smith of Georgia, and Walsh of Massachusetts. Senator Shields, Democrat, of Tennessee, was also paired in the affirmative.

INVOKING CLOSURE RULE

After the reservation had been adopted, Senator Lodge, the majority leader, offered a petition, signed by thirty Republican Senators, to invoke the closure rule, so as to limit further debate on the treaty. Under the rules the petition went over until Nov. 15, when it was to be voted on without debate. The Senate took a recess over Nov. 14 on account of the funeral of Senator Martin.

Senator Lodge's move for closure came after a similar attempt made by Senator Hitchcock, the minority leader, under which debate on the reservations alone would have been restricted. This effort of Mr. Hitchcock failed, when the Senate sustained a ruling by Senator Cummins, Republican, of Iowa, who was in the chair, that the closure, if invoked, must operate as to the entire treaty and not the reservations alone.

Among the reservations offered by Senator Hitchcock was one, touching upon Article X., to provide that the advice which the League of Nations Council might give to members of the League respecting the use of their military forces might be considered by the members as only advisory and that, for itself, the United States reserved the right, through Congress, to decide whether to accept the advice. The minority reservation on Article X. was offered by Senator Hitchcock as a substitute for the committee reservation before the latter was finally voted upon. It was defeated by a vote of 44 to 52.

Nov. 15 was a field day for voting.

The closure rule was first adopted by a vote of 78 to 16, whereby all further debate on any question regarding the treaty was limited to one hour for each Senator. The Foreign Relations Committee reservations were then offered in quick succession, and ten were adopted during the day by votes averaging 53 to 40, the Republicans voting solidly for each reservation; various Democrats voted with them, as many as thirteen breaking party lines in certain cases.

On Nov. 17 two reservations offered, respectively, by Senators Owen and Reed, both Democrats, were voted down. One of them rejected participation in the disposal of the German colonies, and the other excluded the League of Nations from action affecting the "honor and vital interests" of the United States.

THE PRESIDENT'S ATTITUDE

Senator Hitchcock announced on the same day that President Wilson had informed him that he would "pocket" the treaty if the Lodge resolution of ratification, with the majority reservations as a part of it, were adopted. Various minor reservations offered by different Senators were quickly voted down at this session, the majority indicating that no further reservations would be adopted. During the session of Nov. 18, preceding the final vote on the ratifying clauses, a number of reservations were offered, but each in turn was defeated by a decisive majority.

On Nov. 19 the way was clear for final and decisive action on the treaty. The Democrats held a conference before the Senate assembled, at which the following letter from President Wilson to Senator Hitchcock was read:

My Dear Senator: You were good enough to bring me word that the Democratic Senators supporting the treaty expected to hold a conference between the final vote on the Lodge resolution of ratification and that they would be glad to receive a word of counsel from me.

I should hesitate to offer it in any detail, but I assume that the Senators only desire my judgment upon the all-important question of the final vote on the resolution containing the many reservations of Senator Lodge. On that I cannot hesitate, for, in my opinion, the resolution in that form does not provide for ratification but rather for nullification of the treaty. I sincerely hope that the friends and supporters of the treaty will vote against the Lodge resolution of ratification.

I understand that the door will then probably be open for a genuine resolution of ratification.

I trust that all true friends of the treaty will refuse to support the Lodge resolution. Cordially and sincerely yours,
WOODROW WILSON.

DEFEAT OF THE TREATY

The Senate debate continued throughout the day, each side availing itself of every known manoeuvre in parliamentary tactics, but the Republicans stood solid on every vote, and were aided by the votes of four to seven Democratic Senators.

The first crucial vote, which betokened the fate of the treaty, came late at night on the question of ratification with the Lodge reservations. Thirty-nine Senators voted for ratification on these terms and fifty-five voted against. The second vote was on the same question, revived by a motion to reconsider, and this time forty-one Senators voted for and fifty against. The third and final vote was on the question of ratification without reservations of any kind; thirty-eight Senators voted "yes" and fifty-three "no." The Senate then adjourned sine die at 11:10 o'clock.

Immediately after the last vote, which spelled the doom of the treaty as far as that session of Congress was concerned, Senator Lodge, the majority leader, offered a concurrent resolution declaring peace to exist between Germany and the United States, this being done so as to pave the way for an independent treaty with Germany.

As the House had adjourned sine die, the Lodge resolution had to go over until the next session of the Congress, which meets Dec. 1.

After the Democrats for the second time had voted down the Lodge resolution of ratification, Senator Underwood, Democrat, of Alabama, offered the substitute resolution of ratification without reservations. Although Senator Lodge and those working with him had blocked all previous efforts of the Democrats to obtain a vote on any resolution of their own through parliamentary points of order, Mr. Lodge allowed the Underwood resolution to come to a vote.

Seven Democratic Senators voted against it and one Republican Senator, Mr. McCumber of North Dakota, voted for it. The vote on the resolution ended the efforts of the minority to save the treaty.

The defeat of the treaty was witnessed by crowded galleries which followed the various manoeuvres with acute interest. Crowds stood in the corridors leading to the galleries, unable to get into the Senate Chamber.

In the votes on ratification, the full voting strength of the Senate was recorded except that of Senator Fall, who was at his home in New Mexico. He would have voted to reject the treaty.

VOTE ON LODGE RESOLUTION

The vote on the Lodge resolution of ratification came at 5:30 P. M., after the Senate had debated the treaty for five and a half hours. Senator McCumber of North Dakota had just made a four-minute speech, in which he told the Administration forces that, by assuming their attitude for unequivocal ratification of the treaty, they were "scuttling their own ship." As he sat down cries of "vote, vote, vote," came from all over the Chamber.

No other Senator arose to speak and the Vice President ruled that the majority resolution of ratification was "now before the Senate for vote."

The crowded galleries sat in tense silence as the roll was called. A murmur swept through them as the vote was announced, 55 to 39, by which the resolution was defeated.

The vote on the Lodge resolution was:

Under Senator Pomerene's proposal the committee would "prepare and report to the Senate such a resolution of ratification and reservation as, in their judgment, will meet the approval of not less than two-thirds of the Senate. Senator La Follette, Republican, of Wisconsin, moved to lay the resolution on the table and his motion was carried, 48 to 42.

The motion for unconditional ratification offered by Senator Underwood was defeated by 38 to 53. Senator McCumber, Republican, voted aye; Senators Gore, Reed, Shields, Smith (Ga.), Thomas, Trammell, Walsh (Mass.), all Democrats, voted no with the Republicans.

THE RATIFYING RESOLUTION

The following is the official text of the ratifying resolution offered by Senator Lodge, which met defeat:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan:

1. The United States so understands and construes Article I. that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the League or not—under the provisions of Article X., or to employ the military or

A motion was immediately made by Senator Reed to reconsider the vote in order to bring the resolution of ratification again before the Senate; it prevailed by a vote of 62 to 30. Various parliamentary moves followed, but the Republican majority voted down all efforts to outmanoeuvre them in their position. The second vote on the Lodge resolution, which followed, resulted in defeat by 41 to 50.

Senator Pomerene, Democrat, of Ohio, who in the meantime had been in conference with the Administration leaders, moved that the treaty, along with the majority resolution of ratification, be referred to a "Committee of Conciliation," composed of six Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate. Those on the committee, he proposed, should comprise the majority leader, Senator Lodge, who would be naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under Article XXII., Part I., or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children, and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the Council or of the Assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the Assembly or by the Council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe Doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

6. The United States withholds its assent to Articles CLVI., CLVII., and CLVIII., and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.

7. The Congress of the United States will provide by law for the appointment of the representatives of the United States in the Assembly and the Council of the League of Nations, and may in its discretion provide for the participation of the United States in any commission, committee, tribunal, court, council, or conference, or in the selection of any members thereof and for the appointment of members of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences, or any other representatives under the treaty of peace, or in carrying out its provisions, and until such participation and appointment have been so provided for and the powers and duties of such representatives have been defined by law, no person shall represent the United States under either said League of Nations or the treaty of peace with Germany or be authorized to perform any act for or on behalf of the United States thereunder, and no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

8. The United States understands that the Reparations Commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

10. If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the Council of the League of Nations under the provisions of Article VIII., it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in Article XVI. of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than that violating said Article XVI., to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

12. Nothing in Articles CCXCVI., CCXCVII., or in any of the annexes thereto or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII. (Articles CCLXXXVII. to CCCCXXVII. inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII. and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

14. The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the Council or Assembly in which any member of the League and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate have cast more than one vote, and assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the Council or Assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the League if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

RESOLUTION TO DECLARE THE WAR ENDED

The following resolution offered by Senator Lodge just before the Senate adjourned was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas by resolution of Congress adopted April 6, 1917, and by reason of acts committed by the then German Government, a state of war was declared to exist between that Government and the United States; and

Whereas the said acts of the German Government have long since ceased; and Whereas by an armistice signed Nov. 11, 1918, hostilities between Germany and the allied and associated powers were terminated; and

Whereas by the terms of the Treaty of Versailles Germany is to be at peace with all the nations engaged in war against her whenever three Governments, designated therein, have ratified said treaty; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the said state of war between Germany and the United States is hereby declared to be at an end.

Following the adjournment of the Senate there was great activity among the friends of the treaty to bring about a compromise. President Wilson made no public utterance regarding the matter. In European countries general regret was expressed over the failure of the Senate to accept the treaty, but the feeling persisted that at the following session some compromise would be reached whereby the United States would ratify the treaty with reservations that would prove acceptable.

Putting the Treaty Into Force

Steps Taken by Allies to Start Machinery of Peace Pact Without the United States

AFTER receiving the news that the United States Senate had adjourned without consenting to the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles the peace delegates of France, England, and Italy at Paris decided to give up their long wait for America's participation, and on Nov. 21 the Supreme Council agreed upon Dec. 1, 1919, as the date for the final ceremonies that would put the treaty and all its machinery into operation. There was still great reluctance to undertake the work of the many commissions created under the treaty without the aid of the United States, and some sign of a change of heart at Washington was still awaited eagerly.

Meanwhile many further steps toward the final exchange of ratifications had been made. The German "instrument of ratification" had reached Paris on July 11. Great Britain, Italy, and France, as related in detail a month ago, had furnished the three allied ratifications required by the treaty itself for putting the pact into force, but certain things besides American acceptance were still lacking. In England the treaty had received the assent of King George on July 31, but it had been arranged that the British ratification should not be fully completed until the dominions had passed their several measures in favor of the treaty. Both houses of Parliament in the four British dominions gave their approval as follows:

In the case of New Zealand resolutions were passed by the Legislative Council and House of Representatives on Sept. 2.

In the case of Canada resolutions were passed by the Senate and House of Commons on Sept. 4 and Sept. 11, respectively.

In the case of the Union of South Africa resolutions were passed by the Senate on Sept. 12 and by the House of Assembly on Sept. 10.

In the case of Australia resolutions were passed by the House of Representatives on Sept. 19 and by the Senate on Oct. 2.

King George completed the British ratification on Oct. 10 and dispatched his "instrument" to Paris on that date. The instrument included a copy of the Peace Treaty bearing the royal signature and the wafer Great Seal; the King's ratification on behalf of the British Empire; the protocol and the agreement concerning the Rhine Provinces, and the treaty respecting Poland. It was largely printed on vellum and magnificently bound in gold and embossed leather, the whole being held together by ribbons in the colors of the four great Orders of Chivalry. It was dispatched from London on Oct. 10 to Paris in charge of a King's messenger and deposited in the archives there.

The King of Italy had ratified the treaty by royal decree on Oct. 7, thus being the first of the "principal allied and associated powers" to complete the task of ratification; the measure, however, still awaited action by Parliament, which was not in session, before becoming a national law.

RATIFICATION BY FRANCE

The French ratification, the third in order, having received the approval of the Chamber and Senate on Oct. 2 and 11, respectively, was formally completed on Oct. 13, when the Journal Officiel contained this laconic item: "On Oct. 13, 1919, the President of the French Republic signed the instrument ratifying the treaty of peace with Germany and other documents signed at Versailles June 28, 1919, in order that these might be deposited in conformity with the final clauses of said treaty." The instrument signed by President Poincaré consists of a copy of the Treaty of Versailles preceded by a sheet of paper on which is written:

From Raymond Poincaré, President of the French Republic, to all those who shall see this, Salutation!

A second sheet, placed at the end of the treaty, bears the following:

Having examined the said treaty, we have approved and do approve it by virtue of the provisions of the law voted by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies. We declare that it is accepted, ratified, and confirmed; and we promise that it will be inviolably observed.

In token of which we have given the present document bearing the seal of the republic.

Done at Paris, Oct. 13, 1919.

RAYMOND POINCARÉ,

President of the Republic.

S. PICHON,

Minister of Foreign Affairs.

JAPAN'S RATIFICATION

Japan, the fourth of the great powers to accept, ratified the peace of Versailles on Oct. 30. Three days previously the Privy Council had approved it at a meeting over which the Emperor presided. Some of the members had criticised the Government, and complained that the delegates to Paris had not been sufficiently prepared, blaming them for having accepted without protest the waiver of indemnity for the maintenance of prisoners of war. It was pointed out that Japan, unlike her allies, had no prisoners in Germany to counterbalance the expense of caring for enemy prisoners in Japan. Regarding the Shantung issue, it was decided that the United States Senate's rejection of the Shantung amendment removed any obstacle of courtesy that might stand in the way of Japan's immediate adoption of the treaty.

The committee, headed by Viscount Kiyoura, in its report dwelt particularly on the view that as the ratification by the Emperor was tantamount to imperial assent to the League of Nations, the League would not encroach upon the prerogatives of the Emperor; also that it would not interfere with the alliance with England. This satisfied the critics in the council, who had feared that the League would hopelessly fetter the future of Japan. The report pointed out that the League covenant permitted the withdrawal of Japan under stated conditions. Finally, after unanimous approval without reservations, the treaty was submitted to the Emperor, and received his signature on Oct. 30. No Parliamentary vote was necessary to complete the ratification.

The Brazilian Chamber of Deputies, on Nov. 7, approved the Treaty of Versailles without discussion or amendment; before the vote was taken Deputy Joaquin Czorío paid a tribute to the work of President Wilson at the Peace Conference, characterizing him as the world's leader of human progress. The Senate took similar action after a short discussion on Nov. 11, and late that afternoon President Pessoa affixed his signature to the instrument of ratification. Thus Brazil officially ended her war with Germany on Armistice Day.

A semi-official message from Prague announced that the Czechoslovak National Assembly had adopted both the Versailles and St. Germain treaties on Nov. 7.

PROMULGATING THE TREATY

The principal steps that still remained to be taken after the first three powers had ratified the treaty were these: The formal exchange of the three ratifications by the powers concerned, and the deposit of the "instruments" in the archives of the French Foreign Office at Paris; drawing up the "procès-verbal," or formal record of the deposit of these instruments; then the promulgation of the treaty.

After the procès-verbal has been drawn up, the treaty must be promulgated in France by a special decree inserted in the Journal Officiel, whose first article, according to the Paris Temps, will read about as follows: "The Senate and Chamber of Deputies having approved the treaty signed June 28, 1919, at Versailles, between France * * * and Germany, and the ratifications of this act having been exchanged at Paris, the said treaty, whose substance follows, will receive its full and entire execution." Finally will come the putting into force of the treaty with all its machinery of executive boards and commissions. The whole series of formalities can be completed in a short time.

Besides bringing the League of Nations formally into existence, the promulgation of the Peace Treaty by the powers which have already ratified it will bring into force a prodigious list of obligations which must be performed by Germany. They touch upon great and small matters in many parts of the world, and are subject to time limits ranging from fifteen days to fifteen years.

A number of commissions, including that which is to take charge of the Sarre Basin and the one which is to delimit the Polish-German frontier, are to be set up within fifteen days of the establishment of peace.

Within three months the German Army must be reduced to 200,000 effectives, all unauthorized munition plants must be closed. Germany must hand over all her military and naval aeronautical equipment, including the remnants of her once proud Zeppelin fleet, and must modify her laws to conform with various treaty provisions.

The time limit for the reduction of the German Navy personnel to its prescribed strength is two months, and by the same date the German warships named in the treaty must be delivered to the Allies. One month is the limit for the delivery of the last scrap of submarine equipment. The German forts which the treaty names must be disarmed within two months and dismantled within six.

The date of May 1, 1921, is stipulated as the limit for Germany's delivery to the Reparations Commission of her initial reparation payment of 20,000,000,000 marks, and the commission is required by May 1, 1919, to notify Germany of the total damage claims to be filed against her by her late enemies. Germany immediately loses legal title to all her colonies and to all her surface warships not in home ports. Rights in Shantung pass formally to Japan and Great Britain's protectorate over Egypt is legalized.

Germany immediately accepts as binding upon her some fifty treaties relating to many subjects, and agrees to accept in future many other treaties yet to be negotiated by the Allies. Prisoners of war are to be repatriated, the treaty says, "as soon as possible" after the date of effective peace. German troops must be withdrawn from various sections, including portions of East Prussia and Poland, within fifteen days. Coal deliveries to Belgium and France must begin at once.

FRANCO-BRITISH PACT

The supplementary treaty between Great Britain and France, by which Britain agrees to go to France's aid in the event of unwarranted German aggression, was advanced another step toward effectiveness in the evening of Nov. 20, when Stephen Pichon, the French Foreign Minister, and Sir Eyre Crewe, British Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, exchanged ratifications of that treaty. Sir Eyre was the representative of Great Britain in the Supreme Council in the absence of Premier Lloyd George. The treaty does not come into full force until the similar treaty with the United States has been ratified.

Five additional countries indicated their adhesion to the League of Nations during the month. Chile gave official notice to that effect on Nov. 4. Colombia, through its Congress, gave provisional adhesion to the covenant on Nov. 10 and the action was approved by the President. The Senate of Paraguay on Nov. 13 voted for adhesion to the League and to the International Labor Organization. Holland announced through her Minister of Foreign Affairs on Nov. 15 that she intended to enter the League of Nations as soon as the Peace Treaty came into force. Switzerland's adhesion to the League was voted by the National Council at Berne on Nov. 19. The vote came after eight days of debate, the count being 124 in favor of joining the League to 45 against. The decision of the council is subject to a referendum.

AUSTRIA RATIFIES TREATY

Ratification of the Treaty of St. Germain between Austria and the allied and associated powers was the first important business submitted to the Austrian National Assembly when it convened in Vienna on Oct. 14. Dr. Karl Seitz, the President of the Republic, presided over the sessions, and on Oct. 15 the treaty was referred to a special committee. This committee reported the treaty two days later with recommendation of its acceptance, and the National Assembly at once voted for its ratification without debate—on Oct. 17. The German party alone opposed it, that party being a unit in opposition.

On the same day a bill was introduced stipulating that the territory assigned to Austria by the Treaty of St. Germain should be a democratic republic to be known as "the Republic of Austria." Another provision in the bill abrogated the law of 1918, which had declared Austria to be an organic part of the German Empire. All these acts were in compliance with demands of the Peace Conference. On Oct. 25 President Seitz completed Austria's acceptance by signing the treaty. The peace of St. Germain will become effective when the formal notices of ratification by Austria and three of the principal allied and associated powers have been deposited in the French Foreign Office and this fact has been made public in a procès-verbal.

Holding Germany to the Terms

Extensive Violations of Armistice and Treaty Provisions Dealt With in a New Protocol

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 20, 1919]

THE question of the fulfillment of the reparation terms by Germany occupied the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference during October and November. Many details still remained to be worked out, but the council's determination to insist on Germany's full responsibility for violations of the armistice terms, including the sinking of the German battleships at Scapa Flow and the maintenance of armed forces in the Baltic in the face of repeated Entente protests, was made plain by the measures which it adopted. Such questions as the punishment of the German officials who had conducted or encouraged atrocities in France and Belgium, the failure of Germany to restore art treasures and machinery stolen from both of these countries, her double-dealing in the matter of the disposal of her ships, her arbitrary actions in respect to Danzig, and illegal methods in the preparation of plebiscites were considered and discussed.

One matter that came prominently to the fore was that of the delimitation of the territory of the Sarre Valley. In this district, which was occupied by French forces, serious troubles had occurred owing to various causes connected with the high cost of living, the lack of coal, and the scarcity of food staples, especially potatoes. Spartacist agitators, taking advantage of this, organized a revolt, which was put down by the French authorities after 10 persons had been killed and 600 others arrested. The delimitation of the portion of this territory to be administered by France was urgently necessary, but this could not be done by the council until the League of Nations was convened. The appointment of the Sarre Commission was scheduled for swift action as soon as the treaty came into force and the League should begin to function.

GERMANS STRIP DANZIG

Another matter that came to the council's attention was Germany's action in Danzig, which, by the terms of the treaty, was to be constituted as a free city. It was stated on Oct. 16 that the German authorities in this port were stripping both the city and the port of all objects of value; that they had sold naval shipyards, artillery magazines, State workshops and arsenals, and other institutions which had brought them in more than 275,000,000 marks. The value of the docks sold amounted to hundreds of millions. On Nov. 6 the German Government, in a communication addressed to the Danzig municipality, announced that it did not consider itself bound to surrender its authority over the city until the United States ratified the treaty, as the terms of the treaty provided that this transfer must be made to the "principal allied and associated powers," among whom, the German note held, the United States must be included.

Meanwhile Sir Reginald Tower was appointed High Commissioner for Danzig under the Peace Treaty, and he took up his official duties at the beginning of November. By Article 101 of the Peace Treaty a commission of three members was to be constituted within fifteen days after the coming into force of the treaty; this commission was to be composed of a High Commissioner as President, one member to be appointed by Germany and one by Poland. Its main duty was to be the delimitation of the frontier of the future free city. At the date mentioned the members of the Entente Military Mission had reached Danzig.

In some respects Germany manifested her desire to fulfill the reparation demands laid upon her, notably in the establishment of a new Government censorship of all letters from and to England and America, devised to control tax-dodging and the sending of money out of Germany; but the Supreme Council was by no means satisfied with Germany's official acts in other directions. In the preparation of the coming plebiscites in Upper Silesia, Schleswig, Teschen, and Klagenfurt the German methods adopted to secure control were particularly obnoxious to the council, which received many complaints of the German proceedings.

GERMANS TERRORIZE SILESIA

In Upper Silesia the Poles charged that 200,000 German troops had been brought in, and that every one who had ever been in Silesia was being traced down and given free transportation to enable him to cast his vote in the disputed district. The Germans, they also declared, were terrorizing the Polish population and killing many Poles. Complaints of German activities in Schleswig were also received by the council. In all the regions where plebiscites were to be held, provision for the sending of allied troops had been decided upon under the treaty.

An example of the German method of preparing for plebiscites was embodied in an appeal made by the Government to the German people on Oct. 15, which called the Peace Treaty "dreadful" and "unbearable," especially with regard to the loss of German territory. All the territories to be disposed of by plebiscite, said this appeal, could be saved to Germany if every German did his duty at the voting time. Every former citizen of any of these districts was urged in fervent language to return to his former home "to perform an act which future historians will classify with the great deeds of the past."

ARMISTICE TERMS VIOLATED

Discussion of the terms of the armistice which Germany had not fulfilled was begun by the Supreme Council on Oct. 29. At this meeting military, naval, and financial reports were presented on violations of these terms, including the following transgressions: the presence of German soldiers in the Baltic, the sinking of the ships of war at Scapa Flow, and the failure of Germany to restore art treasures, machinery, and agricultural implements stolen from France and Belgium. Other violations of less importance were also cited. To deal with those not covered by the treaty a special protocol was drafted and forwarded, with a letter, to Germany on Nov. 6. The text of this letter, which dealt also with the question of ratification, was as follows:

By the terms of the final provisions of the treaty signed at Versailles June 28, 1919, it has been stipulated that "A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand and by three of the principal allied and associated powers on the other hand."

The President of the Peace Conference had the honor of calling to the attention of the Government that three of the principal allied and associated powers, namely, the British Empire, France, and Italy, have ratified, and Germany, on the other hand, having also ratified the treaty, the condition referred to above has been fulfilled.

The other allied and associated powers who have up to the present time made known their ratification are Belgium, Poland, and Siam.

In compliance with the said provisions, and if the various acts necessary to the coming into force of the treaty be fulfilled in time, there will take place in Paris, at a date which will be announced later, and notification of which will be given five days in advance, a procès-verbal of the deposit of these ratifications, at which the German Government is requested to participate. The final provisions of the treaty add: "From the date of this first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming in force of the treaty."

The principal allied and associated powers have decided that the treaty shall not go into force until the execution of the obligations which Germany had by the armistice convention and the additional agreements undertaken to fulfill, and which have not received satisfaction, shall have been fully carried out.

The German Government is therefore asked to give to the German representatives authorized to sign the procès-verbal of the deposits of ratification full powers to sign at the same time the protocol, of which a copy is hereto annexed, and which provides without further delay for this settlement.

The German Government therefore is now invited to send to Paris, by Nov. 10, 1919, duly qualified representatives for this purpose to:

- I. Arrange in agreement with the representatives of the allied and associated powers the conditions for the setting up of the commissions of government, of administration, and of plebiscite, the holding over of powers, the transfer of services, the entry of interallied troops, the evacuation of German troops, the replacement of the said German authorities, and all other measures above provided for. Attention is now called to the fact that the German authorities must leave intact all service organizations and officers as well as the documents required by the interallied authorities for the immediate entry on their duties, and that the German troops must also leave intact all the establishments which they occupy.

2. Agree with the staff of the Marshal, Commander in Chief of the allied and associated armies, as to the conditions of transport of interallied troops.

TEXT OF PROTOCOL

The text of the proposed protocol, transmitted at the same time, was as follows:

Protocol: At the very time of proceeding to the first deposit of ratifications of the Peace Treaty it was ascertained that the following obligations which Germany had agreed to execute, in the armistice conventions and the complementary agreements, have not been executed or have not received full satisfaction, viz.:

First—Armistice convention of Nov. 11, 1918, Clause 7: Obligation of delivering 5,000 locomotives and 150,000 cars. Forty-two locomotives and 4,460 cars are still to be delivered.

Second—Armistice convention of Nov. 11, 1918, Clause 12: Obligation of withdrawing within the frontiers of Germany the German troops which are in Russian territory as soon as the Allies judge the time proper. The withdrawal of troops has not yet been executed, in spite of the reiterated injunctions of Aug. 27, Sept. 27, and Oct. 10, 1919.

Third—Armistice convention of Nov. 11, 1918, Clause 14: Obligation to discontinue immediately all requisition, seizures, or coercive measures in Russian territory. The German troops continue to use these methods.

Fourth—Armistice convention of Nov. 11, 1918, Clause 19: Obligation of immediate delivery of all documents, specie, values of property and finance, with all issuing apparatus, concerning public or private interests in the invaded countries. The complete statements of the specie and securities removed, collected, or confiscated by the Germans in the invaded countries have not been delivered.

Fifth—Armistice convention of Nov. 11, 1918, Clause 22: Obligation of delivering all German submarines. Destruction of the German submarine UC-48 off Ferrol, by order of her German commander, and the destruction in the North Sea of certain submarines proceeding to England for delivery.

Sixth—Armistice convention of Nov. 11, 1918, Clause 23: Obligation of maintaining in the allied ports the German battleships designated by the allied and associated powers, these ships being destined to be ultimately delivered. Clause 31: Obligation of not destroying any ship before delivery; on June 21, 1919, destruction at Scapa Flow of the said ships.

Seventh—Protocol of Dec. 17, 1918, annexed to the Armistice Convention of Dec. 13, 1918: Obligation of restoring all works of art and artistic documents removed from France and Belgium. All works of art were transported into unoccupied Germany and have not been restored.

Eighth—Armistice Convention of Jan. 15, 1919, Clause III. and Protocol 392-1, additional Clause III. of July 25, 1919: Obligation of delivering agricultural implements in lieu of the supplementary railroad material provided for in Tables 1 and 2 and annexed to the protocol at Spa of Dec. 17, 1918. The following were not delivered on the date fixed (Oct. 1, 1919): Forty "Heucke" plowing outfits, all the personnel necessary to operate the apparatus, all the spades, 1,500 shovels, 1,130 plows, T. M. 23-26; 1,765 plows, T. F. 18 21; 1,512 plows, T. F. 23 26; 629 Belgian plows, T. F. O. M. 20; 1,205 Belgian plows, T. F. O. M. 26; 4,282 harrows of 2 K 500; 2,157 steel cultivators; 966 fertilizer spreaders, 2 M. 50; 1,608 fertilizer spreaders, 3 M. 50.

Ninth—Armistice Convention of Jan. 16, 1919, Clause 6: Obligation of restoring the industrial material removed from French and Belgian territories. All this material has not been restored.

Tenth—Convention of Jan. 16, 1919, Clause 8: Obligation of placing the entire German merchant fleet at the disposal of the allied and associated powers. A certain number of ships of which delivery had been requested by virtue of this clause have not yet been delivered.

Eleventh—Protocols of the Brussels Conference of March 13 and 14, 1919: Obligations of not exporting any war material of any nature. Exportation of aerial material to Sweden, Holland, and Denmark.

A certain number of the above unexecuted or incompletely executed stipulations were renewed by the treaty of June 28, 1919, the going into force of which will of right render applicable the sanctions provided for. This applies in particular to the various payments in kind stipulated as reparations.

On the other hand, the question of the evacuation of the Baltic provinces was the object of an exchange of notes and decisions which are in course of execution. The allied and associated powers expressly confirm the contents of their notes, the execution of which Germany by the present protocol agrees to carry out loyally and strictly.

Lastly, the allied and associated powers cannot overlook or sanction the other infractions committed against the armistice conventions, and violations as serious as the destruction of the German fleet at Scapa Flow, the destruction of the submarine UC-48 off Ferrol and the destruction in the North Sea of certain submarines proceeding to England for delivery. Consequently Germany agrees:

First (A)—To deliver as reparation for the destruction of the German fleet at Scapa Flow:

(a) Within a period of sixty days from the signing of the present protocol and under the conditions provided for by Paragraph 2 of Article CLXXXV. of the treaty of peace, the following five light cruisers: Königsberg, Pillau, Graudens, Regensburg, Strassburg.

(B) Within a period of ninety days from the signing of the present protocol and in all respects in good condition and ready to function, such a number of floating docks, floating cranes, tugs and dredges equivalent to a total displacement of 400,000 tons as the principal allied and associated powers may demand. As regards the docks the lifting power will be considered as displacement. In the number of docks above provided for there should be about 75 per cent. of docks of over 10,000 tons.

(b) To be delivered within a period of ten days from the signing of the present protocol: A complete list of all the floating docks, floating cranes, tugs and dredges which are German property. List which will be delivered to the Interallied Naval Control Commission provided for by Article CCIX. of the peace treaty will include the material which on Nov. 11, 1918, belonged to the German Government or in which the German Government had an important interest at that date.

(c) The officers and men who formed the crews of the battleships sunk at Scapa Flow, and who are actually detained by the principal allied and associated powers, with the exception of those who surrender, as provided for by Article 228 of the Peace Treaty, will be repatriated at the latest when Germany shall have completed the above Paragraphs A and B.

(d) The destroyer B-98 will be considered as one of the forty-two destroyers the delivery of which is provided for by Article 185 of the Peace Treaty.

Second—To deliver within a period of ten days from the signing of the present protocol the machines and engines of the submarines U-137, U-138, and U-150, to offset the destruction of the submarine UC-48, as well as the three engines of the submarine U-146, which is still to be delivered to offset the destruction of submarines in the North Sea.

Third—To pay to the allied and associated Governments the value of the exported aerial material according to the decision and estimation which will be made and notified by the Aerial Control Commission provided for by Article 210 of the Peace Treaty and before Jan. 1, 1920.

In case Germany should not fulfill these obligations within the time above specified, the allied and associated powers reserve the right to have recourse to any coercive measures or other which they may deem appropriate.

The date set for the signing of this protocol by Germany's representatives, Nov. 10, 1919, came and passed, but the German delegation did not appear until a week later. It was made up as follows: Herr von Simson, Director of the Office of Foreign Affairs in Berlin; Herr Gauss, Counselor of Legation; Herr Loehrs, Captain von Gayern, Major Michaelis, and Herr von Boeticher. Baron Kurt von Lersner, German representative in Paris, sat with the commission. After a preliminary session, however, the whole delegation returned to Berlin on Nov. 22, leaving the matter in suspense.

QUESTIONS OF OCCUPATION

The question of the expenses of the occupation by the allied troops in Germany was referred to the Sub-Committee on Reparations on Oct. 1. France requested that these expenses be calculated in accordance with the French tariff. M. Rolin-Jacquemyns, Belgian High Commissioner in the Rhineland, proceeded to Coblenz early in October, where the sessions of the Interallied Commission, composed of four members, representing respectively Belgium, Great Britain, France, and America, were to be held. Command of the interallied troops of occupation of the Rhine was taken over by General Degoutte, hero of the great Marne counterstroke in July, 1918, to replace General Fayolle, who was to head the Interallied Commission to supervise the disarmament of Germany.

Another change announced was the appointment of André Tardieu, head of the General Commission for Franco-American War Matters, as Minister of Blockade and Invaded Regions in the place of Albert Lebrun, whose resignation M. Clemenceau had demanded on Nov. 6, on the ground that he was running for election as a Deputy on the same ticket with Louis Marin, who cast his vote against ratification of the Peace Treaty by the Chamber of Deputies.

BELGIAN QUESTIONS

The measures taken by the Belgian Government in occupying the districts of Eupen and Malmédy were made the subject of strong protests by the German Government in notes to the Entente powers dated Sept. 1 and Sept. 5. In answer, the Supreme Council pointed out on Sept. 26 that Germany had renounced all rights in these territories in favor of Belgium, on the understanding that a part or all of them might revert to Germany under the League of Nations on the basis of a plebiscite; meanwhile they were incontestably under the sovereignty of Belgium, which had signified its consent to enter into pourparlers with Germany regarding the execution of the treaty in these territories, as well as in neutral and Prussian Moresnet.

The Belgian Minister on Oct. 28 gave Belgium's approval to a list of 1,150 Germans, soldiers and civilians, whose arrest was demanded on charges arising from violation of the laws of war at the time of the invasion of Belgium, or during the occupation of that country by German troops. This list was sent to the Peace Conference on Nov. 5. The indictments were based principally on the executions of civilians at Louvain and other towns, on the deportation of workmen, on forced labor exacted from prisoners of war, on the treatment of young men who attempted to cross the frontier to join the Belgian Army, and on pillage.

WORK OF RECONSTRUCTION

The report of the German Mining Commission sent to France to ascertain the extent of the damage done by the Germans in the devastated regions stated that the work of construction would have to be done "from the ground up," especially in the Departments of Pas de Calais, Courrière, Lens, Lievin, Drocourt, Mourchin, Carvin and Dourgas, where the damage done was "terrible." Most of the mines, the report said, had been "drowned," and in rebuilding new shafts they would have to be protected against the inward pressure of the water. The work of reconstruction was one of great difficulty, and the extent of damage was in many cases impossible to ascertain; location of responsibility, also, the report, stated, would be hard to make, owing to the inadequacy of military records showing the chronological location of the military units. Commenting upon this report, the German newspaper Vorwärts declared that there was enough work to be done in reconstructing these mines to keep all the unemployed of Germany busy for the next eight years, and that this showed the fallacy of the frequently expressed theory that the emigration of thousands of people from Germany was an economic necessity.

Work of the Peace Conference

Many Momentous Problems Occupy the Historic Paris Congress in Its Last Sessions

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 20, 1919]

MANY questions of international importance were discussed, and some were decided, in the final weeks of the Peace Conference at Paris; others, which could not be settled before the imminent dissolution of the conference, were covered by the creation of special machinery devised to function after the body which for so many months had virtually ruled the whole of Europe had broken up. The great difficulties facing the conference in October and November were the German-Russian imbroglio in the Baltic, and the continued defiance of Rumania, whose armed forces remained in Budapest despite the sending of no fewer than nine notes demanding their evacuation, and whose Government approved the annexation of the Province of Bessarabia contrary to the decisions of the Supreme Council.

The note which the Supreme Council dispatched to Germany inviting her, in common with the allied and neutral nations of Europe, to participate in the blockade of Soviet Russia, was published in the November CURRENT HISTORY. It was announced from Berlin on Oct. 26 that the Foreign Affairs Committee of the National Assembly had agreed with the Government that the invitation to share in such a blockade must be declined, and that all the party committees had accepted this decision unanimously. The reply to the allied invitation was subsequently drafted and dispatched to Marshal Foch. In this reply Germany stated that she declined to participate on the ground that she did not believe that such a blockade would achieve the desired end, as all coercive steps would lead to Russian reaction, but added that Germany was prepared to co-operate in any other measures against the Bolshevik régime which would prove effective. The note also pointed out that, according to the articles of the League of Nations, a blockade would not be justified at that time. The opportunity was seized to ask that the blockade against Germany be completely removed, and that all German ships held in Baltic harbors be restored to their owners. The Supreme Council referred the German reply to the proper commission for consideration and reply.

In view of the obstinate refusal of the troops of General von der Goltz to leave Courland, the Supreme Council sent several notes to the German Government demanding that it take more effective measures to secure this evacuation, under penalty of a re-establishment of the economic blockade existing before the armistice. Against such a prospect the German Government protested vigorously, asserting that it had done all in its power to recall these insubordinate troops, and asking that an interallied commission be appointed to proceed to Berlin, and then to the Baltic, to control the situation.

INTERALLIED BALTIC COMMISSION

Such a commission was subsequently appointed by the Supreme Council, under the official title of the Allied Commission to Supervise the Evacuation of the Baltic Provinces, and was made up as follows: General Niessel, representing France, President; General Turner, England; General Marietti, Italy; Commandant Takeda, Japan; Brig. Gen. S. A. Cheney, United States. General Niessel had been much in Russia under the Bolsheviks, and spoke Russian fluently; formerly he had been a member of the Interallied Commission to Posen. This commission left for Berlin early in November, where it began an investigation of the Allies' suspicions that the German Government was not free from complicity in the failure of General von der Goltz's troops to withdraw, and discussed the question of control of the railroad lines running from East Prussia to Courland. After the completion of the Berlin discussions, the commission was charged to proceed to Riga to bring about, by persuasion or sterner measures, the dispersal of the Germano-Russian troops under Colonel Avalov-Bermondts who had attacked the Letts in Riga.

With regard to complaints against German activities in the plebiscite regions in Schleswig and Upper Silesia, and the Polish complaint that the Germans were holding municipal elections in the latter district, although these elections were scheduled to take place only after the arrival of the mission to organize the plebiscite, word was sent to Germany that the results of these elections—which turned out to be in favor of the Polish element—must be disregarded.

Foreign Minister Trumbitch of Serbia, who arrived in Paris on Oct. 23 from Belgrade, brought with him authorization from his Government to sign the Austrian Peace Treaty under reservations. Serbia, like Rumania, had failed to sign the Austrian treaty because of objections on the part of the Yugoslavs to the clause dealing with racial minorities. The signature of Rumania was promised by the latter country on Nov. 6. The Austrian delegation handed the Peace Conference the document of ratification of the treaty on the following day.

On Oct. 25 the Supreme Council adopted instructions for the commission appointed to conduct the plebiscite in the disputed district of Teschen and to determine whether the region was to be allotted to Czechoslovakia or Poland. Regarding this latter country, the council was still considering the future of Eastern Galicia, formerly Austrian territory, though now for some time occupied by Polish troops. It also decided on Nov. 3 to request the Polish Government to open to traffic certain railroads crossing the German-Polish frontier north of Warsaw.

RUMANIA'S DEFIANCE

The Rumanian Government's defiance of the wishes of the Supreme Council in respect to the evacuation of Hungary by the Rumanian Army continued week after week. On Oct. 16 Frank L. Polk, Under Secretary of State and head of the American peace delegation at Paris, submitted to the council a telegram from the Interallied Mission at Budapest, which complained of the action of the Rumanians in Hungary, particularly concerning their requisitions of foodstuffs on a large scale, and their preventing the distribution of what remained; it demanded in forcible terms that the Rumanians withdraw from Hungary and make restitution. The council commissioned Sir George Clerk to proceed immediately to Budapest to inform the mission that the council had already sent a note to the Rumanians demanding their immediate withdrawal, and that it would insist on compliance with its demands. On Nov. 1, to add to the council's perplexities, Rumania's representatives announced the annexation by Rumania of the Province of Bessarabia, despite the council's warning of the serious consequences which this annexation might create and its proposal of a plebiscite. No action on Rumania's announcement was taken by the council at this time.

A further note, however, was sent to Rumania on Nov. 3 calling on her to answer the communication sent her three weeks before, which she had avoided until that time on a technicality. This note, dispatched on Oct. 12, called on the Bucharest Government to remove the Rumanian troops from Hungary, notified it that it must cease all efforts to obtain more territory for Rumania than the Peace Conference had assigned to it, and served notice that all "requisitions" on Hungary would result in diminishing the total of the reparations to which Rumania would be normally entitled. The text of the allied note of Nov. 3 was as follows:

The Supreme Council has decided to request the allied Ministers at Bucharest to notify jointly, without delay, the Rumanian Government of the fact that it was unfavorably impressed upon learning that General Conda, sent as special envoy to Paris by the Rumanian Ministry, arrived without the Rumanian reply to the last note from the powers under the pretext that the Italian Minister had not taken this step at the same time as France, England, and the United States.

The Supreme Council expresses the formal desire to obtain within the shortest time a brief and clear reply from the Rumanian Government on all the points discussed. As the situation in Hungary demands an early decision in order to insure the re-establishment of normal conditions, which is absolutely essential for the security of Central Europe, the principal allied and associated powers cannot allow Rumania to prolong dilatory negotiations on the three questions stated Oct. 12 last.

Please communicate this in the name of the conference, collectively with your colleagues, who need not wait for special instructions from their Governments owing to the urgency of the situation.

PICHON.

RUMANIA'S EVASIVE REPLY

Rumania's answer was received and read to the Supreme Council on Nov. 12. This reply stated that the Rumanian troops were being withdrawn to the River Theiss, but made no mention of any further evacuation. As the River Theiss lies far to the west both of the boundary line between Hungary and Rumania laid down by the Peace Conference and the line which the Rumanians themselves have demanded, this reply was deemed by the council as inadequate and unsatisfactory. Regarding the question of requisitions in Hungary and the signing of the Austrian treaty the reply evaded all commitment. Reports reaching the conference confirmed the Rumanian withdrawal to the River Theiss, which was said to be attended with great disorder, and the levying of requisitions on an unprecedented scale.

Hungarian troops, under Admiral Horthy, entered Budapest on Nov. 15. The council voted that a new note to Rumania should be drafted, calling on her to declare her intentions in regard to withdrawal to the line desired and as to signing the Austrian treaty within one week.

Shortly after the conclusion of the session, at which this decision was taken, Rumania's representatives dispatched to the Foreign Office notice of a telegram sent on Nov. 6 from Bucharest, which stated that the Rumanian Government would sign the Austrian treaty with the clause on racial minorities, but would demand an understanding as to the spirit in which this article would find application.

This left outstanding disputes with Rumania over the subject of requisitions in Hungary, and the question of her future boundaries, including Bessarabia. Regarding these boundaries, it was reported in Paris on Oct. 24 that Rumania's demands for a rectification of the frontiers fixed for the western borders, involving a removal of her boundary with Hungary to a point fourteen miles to the west of the point fixed by the Supreme Council, had been refused. The vexed question of the disposition of the Banat of Temesvar had been settled at this time by dividing this territory between Rumania and Serbia; the frontier was minutely defined in a note communicated by Secretary Dutasta of the Peace Conference to both of the nations involved. According to this division Serbia received most of the rich agricultural plain adjoining Serbia on the north, and two-thirds of the waterways, while Rumania received the eastern half of the Banat, including several important industrial towns.

Besides the difficulty involved in compelling Rumania to evacuate Budapest, the council was faced with the vexation of being unable to conclude terms of peace with Hungary, owing to the continuance in office of the Cabinet of the Hungarian Minister, Stepan Friedrich, reports of whose monarchial proclivities had reached the council's ears, and whose Government had never been recognized by the Entente Powers. Energetic measures were taken on Nov. 12, when Sir George Clerk, the allied emissary, on his arrival at Budapest, delivered an ultimatum to Premier Friedrich, notifying him that a Coalition Cabinet must be formed within forty-eight hours, or he himself resign his office.

GREEK OCCUPATION OF SMYRNA

The report of the commission appointed to investigate the Greek occupation of Smyrna was approved by the council on Nov. 12, at which date it was decided to ask the Greek authorities to insure that order be maintained in future, and that there be no recurrence of such anti-Turkish aggressions as those of which Turkey had complained after the Greek occupation, and also to notify the Greeks that their military occupation of Smyrna must be understood to be only provisional and temporary.

M. Venizelos, the Greek Premier, announced in Paris on Nov. 15 that he had asked for a new investigation, and urged that the commission's findings be rejected, on the ground that no Greeks had been appointed on the commission, and no Greek testimony had been accepted. As regards the duration of the occupation, M. Venizelos stated that it had been his understanding that the Greeks should occupy permanently "a country which has been Greek for 3,000 years."

BULGARIA'S ACCEPTANCE

Bulgaria's reply to the peace terms of the allied powers was delivered on Oct. 24, the last day of the time limit set for its receipt. The answer comprised three pamphlets. The first of these related to the political and labor clauses, the second to the territorial provisions, and the third to the military, naval, aerial, and reparations terms. The reply was moderate in tone, and adhered unreservedly to the clauses concerning the League of Nations and labor. It accepted the principle of the protection of minorities in Bulgaria on condition that the same measures be applied to other Balkan States. The reply, however, made reservations regarding reparations, and protested especially against the total sum demanded of Bulgaria. It asked for the suppression of interest charges, and requested an extension of the time limit for payment. Regarding the military clauses, Bulgaria objected to the voluntary enlistment system, maintaining that conscription alone could produce sufficient forces to preserve order.

The longest part of the reply dealt with territorial clauses, and protested against modifications of frontiers on ethnical grounds. Quoting statistics extensively, it proposed a plebiscite in Thrace, and the formation of this region into an autonomous State. The various subdivisions of the Bulgarian reply were submitted to the proper commissions for reports, on the basis of which the council would formulate its answer.

This answer, which made but slight concessions to the Bulgarians' demands, was completed by Nov. 1 and submitted to the Bulgar representatives the following day; a time limit of ten days was set for Bulgaria's final decision. The council likewise considered the terms of a note to be sent to the Rumanian and Yugoslav Governments, setting forth the status of those Governments with regard to the Bulgarian treaty, and informing them that it would be impossible for them to sign this treaty so long as they withheld their consent to sign the treaty with Austria. Subsequently the consent of both of the countries involved was transmitted to the council.

The Bulgarian peace delegation on Nov. 13 sent an official note to the council announcing that Bulgaria was prepared to sign the treaty. M. Stambulisky, the Bulgarian Premier, had left Sofia for Paris to complete the ceremony.

In a statement issued at Boston on Nov. 7 the League of Friends of Greece in America assailed the terms of the treaty with Bulgaria. This statement said in part:

The treaty is unjust to Greece, Serbia, and Rumania. The Bulgarian troops, under orders from Sofia, have annihilated half of the Serbian populations, have desolated Eastern Macedonia and Western Thrace. Despite all these crimes, Bulgaria has lost no Bulgarian territory. Western Thrace is Greek, not Bulgarian, yet Bulgaria is given by the Bulgarian treaty 250,000 inhabitants of Thrace, of whom only 35,000 are Bulgarians, the others Turks and Greeks.

NEW COMMISSION CREATED

With the prospect that the Bulgarian treaty would be signed, the labors of the conference drew appreciably nearer to their logical termination. Many problems, however, after the expected dissolution of the conference in December would be left in abeyance. Besides the League of Nations a plan was formed for the future conduct of European affairs by means of a new commission, whose creation was announced about Oct. 16 as a co-ordinating committee to which the various sub-committees created by the Versailles treaty would report from time to time. On Oct. 21 this body assumed the name of "The Committee for the Enforcement of the Treaty of Versailles."

This new commission was to concern itself not only with the enforcement of the German treaty, but with the enforcement of all treaties made by the Peace Conference. While the League of Nations Council would receive reports from the League committees, the Enforcement Commission would receive reports from other committees. The underlying reason for the creation of the new commission was to make sure that there should be some organization to represent the allied nations authoritatively at all times, whether the League of Nations functioned smoothly or with difficulty. Effectiveness was to be given to the decisions of the commission by the support of the Reparations Commissions, which, in case of any emergency, would bring pressure to bear upon the former enemies of the Entente.

The ceremony of formally putting in force the treaty of Versailles was still deferred pending the much-hoped-for ratification by the United States. The possibility that the American Senate, however, might defeat the ratification measure was given due consideration by the Supreme Council, and on Nov. 10 the council reached an agreement on the procedure for convoking the first council of the League of Nations without the participation of the United States, though admitting the difficulties in the way of executing the treaty without American participation in the numerous Interallied Commissions on Reparations, Control, and Military Occupation.

Belgium's request that the seat of the League of Nations be changed to Brussels, the council decided, would be placed before the first meeting of the Assembly of the League. This first meeting, it was also decided, would take place in Paris on the day when the final exchange of ratifications took place. The call for this meeting would be issued by President Wilson after the date for the exchange of ratifications was finally decided.

A note was dispatched to Germany on Nov. 2 inviting her to send a deputation to attend the ratification ceremony and sign a protocol assuming responsibility for the fulfillment of certain terms of the armistice; also agreeing to make good in actual payment the loss of the ships sunk at Scapa Flow, as well as to surrender 400,000 tons of floating docks, tugs, and other naval equipment. In this note no mention was made of the inter-allied blockade of Soviet Russia, in which Germany, as well as several neutral nations, including Sweden and Switzerland, had declined participation, and this was taken in allied circles to be significant of the Entente's lack of belief that the blockade could be successfully maintained.

POLAND GETS GALICIA

The Supreme Council on Nov. 21 decided to turn over Eastern Galicia to Poland for twenty-five years, at the end of which the League of Nations will determine what to do with this territory. Eastern Galicia, with its 16,000,000 inhabitants, will be federated with Poland under a mandate, the arrangements for which will give Poland practically the government of the region.

This decision came after many weeks of discussion of the Galician problem. Poland asked for annexation outright, but this was opposed by England, which favored giving a mandate to Poland for five years, at the end of which time there would be a plebiscite. Paderewski opposed this solution, asserting that Galicia could not be reconstructed if for five years there was to be constant electioneering. The solution finally adopted was a compromise acceptable to Poland. The mandate is different from the mandates provided in the treaty as League of Nations mandates. It means that if Poland administers Galicia well for twenty-five years that area will become an integral part of Poland.

The council on Nov. 21 also approved the text of an agreement granting political suzerainty over the Spitzbergen Archipelago to Norway.

CONFERENCE NEARS CLOSE

It was stated in Paris that the Peace Conference would reach the end of its labors early in December. Both the British and American delegations expressed the opinion that the League of Nations should take over the functions of the Peace Conference as soon as possible, on the ground that the conference was originally charged with making peace, and not with governing the world. They favored leaving to a Committee of Ambassadors, with fixed powers, the winding up of the few specific tasks which might remain undone.

Matters still in abeyance at the time when these pages went to print were the dispute between Holland and Belgium over the revision of the treaty between these two countries; the settlement of the Adriatic problem, including the Fiume question; the final disposition of Dalmatia and Albania; the Germano-Russian Baltic problem; the persuasion or compulsion of the recalcitrant small powers, including Rumania, to fulfill their obligations; the securing of a stable Hungarian Government that could sign a peace treaty; the defining of the eastern boundary of Poland; the effecting of an arrangement whereby Greece, Rumania, and Serbia would sign treaties guaranteeing the rights of ethnical minorities, and the completing of arrangements, for control of plebiscites in Schleswig, Galicia, Upper Silesia, and elsewhere, where national territorial claims were still in conflict.

D'Annunzio's Seizure of Zara

Raid on the Dalmatian Coast

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 22, 1919]

DURING October and November the occupation of Fiume by the armed forces of Gabriele d'Annunzio continued. A dramatic message from d'Annunzio brought to Rome by Whitney Warren, the American architect, on Oct. 23, addressed Americans as "brothers" and implored their aid for Fiume, which, the message said, "is fighting for liberty."

At the Fiuman elections, held on Oct. 27, the Annexationists won by a large majority, amid a great display of military strength by the d'Annunzian forces, Fiume was in a ferment. Walls and streets were placarded with slogans appealing to all citizens to vote as a patriotic duty, and denouncing as traitors all who did not vote for annexation. Only the Unions Nazionale was allowed to enter the field, and the only option was in the choice of forty candidates for the "National Council." The polls were guarded by gendarmes and soldiers. Girls and women went to vote with shouts of jubilation. Two American newspaper men were roughly handled.

Fiume, said a neutral at the time, was ruled by 9,000 bayonets, and everything was possible. The "elections," according to this view, were nothing but a farce. All comers and goers were held up and searched. All not in favor of Italy were considered traitors. The Sushak bridge was closed by d'Annunzio, barring all the Croats of that suburb from participating in the vote. Results of the election received in Paris on Oct. 29 showed that 6,688 persons voted the straight annexationist ticket, 186 voted for the party led by Professor Zanella, d'Annunzio's opponent in Fiume, and 3,189 of those registered did not vote.

D'ANNUNZIO'S STATEMENT

D'Annunzio in a statement of some length given on Oct. 31 to a representative of The New York World set forth his entire case in a remarkable statement, in which he declared that by the results of the recent elections Fiume had confirmed her declaration of May 18 that she alone had the right to decide her own fate. This statement was in part as follows:

Why did we make war? I asked a meeting of recruits one evening behind an embankment of the Piave, which had become a frontier of tremendous import. "To reacquire the summit of an Alp, a handful of land jutting into the sea or the bend of a gulf? Yes, surely, for these things as well, but the great reason is the cause of territory, the cause of the spirit, the cause of immortality."

The cause of territory has its limits and because it is only in Fiume today that people talk frankly and roughly amid so much senile chatter we shall persist in our frankness and our rudeness. The cause of territory has its limits. To the north of Fiume it must include Idria as far as the Toroid Balkans; the district of Idria (40 miles south of Fiume), because by centuries of historical traditions and by the evidence of its configuration it belongs to the body of Italy. It has no sound frontier of itself, but forms the bulwark of the Alps of Ternova.

With Idria in our hands, Gorizia (15 miles northwest of Trieste) remains protected. If it be taken away from us Gorizia remains exposed to the Yugoslav guns. Italy has no raw materials. If she possessed Idria she would have at least one, mercury, in which the district is rich.

As Idria, so should Postumia be ours by rights. If we do not possess Postumia the waves of Balkan tribes, bitter waves of barbaric Slavs, will surge up to within twelve miles of the walls of Trieste. Without the district of Postumia we would leave in the hands of the Southern Slavs, Longatico, Nauporto, and perhaps Prevaldo, which from time immemorial, constitute the true gate of Italy, the Latin threshold against the northern and eastern incursions of the barbarians of all times.

And tomorrow the citizens of free Trieste on ascending one of the hills which crown St. Just could, with the naked eye, discern a railway equi-distant from Trieste and Fiume, and he who dominates that railway has full command of their trade.

To renounce St. Pietro on Carso is to renounce the district of Castelnovo, twenty-two miles southwest of Trieste, which includes a large zone of Carso territory. (Carso, or Karst, consists of rugged platforms and mountain ranges rising east of the Adriatic. The chief range extends north of Istria from the Isonzo River to the Quarnero Gulf.)

Thus our adversary would occupy the crest of Middle Carso from Mount Aquila to Mount Maggiore, would dominate the Valley of the Timavo and so cut off Trieste from its aqueducts and its water works. The adversary would threaten from near the railway between Trieste and Pola, and by destroying its strategic value he would weaken the naval frontiers. Furthermore, we should lose the bulwark which consists of Mount Auremiano, Mount Tore and Mount Nevoso, which is our necessary frontier, and thus an absurd frontier would be traced between villages like that frontier which once existed in Friuli (now part of Udine).

Without Idria, without Postumia, without Castelnovo, Italy's boundaries would remain in the hands of foreigners, would remain in the hands of Balkan tribes.

And not Fiume alone, but the whole of the Julian Veneto would be reduced to an Italian agony behind a broken frontier. When, on May 19, the Fiumians and Italians shouted in the face of the Supreme Council that the history written with Italy's most generous blood could not stop at Paris and that they firmly awaited violence, no matter whence it came, they announced thereby the fall of the old world.

Therefore, Fiume's cause is the biggest and finest opposed today to the meanness and weakness of this world. It stretches from Ireland to Egypt, from Russia to the United States, from Rumania to India. It embraces the white races and the black, it reconciles the gospel with the Korean, Christianity with Islam.

Every insurrection is an effort toward expression, an effort toward creation. No matter if it be interrupted by bloodshed, so long as the survivors pass on to the future the spirit of liberty and of a new life and the profound instinct of that indestructible relationship which binds people to their soil.

LEADER'S ADVICE TO ITALY

D'Annunzio on Nov. 8, in a statement made public by his Press Bureau, proposed that Italy decline to restore order in the Fiume situation at the behest of the Supreme Council. This statement was as follows:

The way out is wide, clear, direct. it is the same for us who entered the city Sept. 12.

I realize that the Italian Government persists in its erroneous judgment and increases it by accepting from the Supreme Council a mandate to restore order in Fiume, held by me.

I propose that the Italian Government send back the Fiume problem to the Peace Conference by returning the mandate, which it will be impossible to execute without shedding fraternal blood and without the danger of civil war throughout the nation.

When the mandate is returned the Government of Fiume claims the honor of remaining solely responsible for its attitude before the conference and before the world.

Soon after the issuance of this statement the blockade of Fiume was officially lifted; food was passing freely into the city over the railway from Trieste, and commercial relations with the outside world had been resumed. Efforts were being made at this time by d'Annunzio's Government to stabilize the currency; all old Hungarian money had been invalidated, and Italian money was pouring in from all parts of Italy, which was being used by d'Annunzio to pay his soldiers and the expenses of his organization.

D'ANNUNZIO RAIDS DALMATIA

A dramatic development of d'Annunzio's campaign occurred on Nov. 15, when the poet-soldier landed at Zara, on the Dalmatian Coast, made a triumphal entry into the city amid enthusiastic acclamations from the populace with 600 troops, including Arditi, grenadiers, and d'Annunzio's entire staff, and announced its occupation. D'Annunzio had sailed from Fiume in the darkness of early morning on the torpedo boat Nullo, followed by the war fleet of Admiral Millo, who received him and publicly swore allegiance to him.

News that d'Annunzio had begun a new adventure soon reached Trieste and roused great excitement. The newspapers both there and at Rome were generally unsympathetic to the Dalmatian enterprise. D'Annunzio returned to Fiume on Nov. 16 and received a great ovation. His intention to occupy other territory, including Spalato and part of Istria, which he argued should form an independent State, was announced at this time. The dictator of Fiume was said at this time to have a force of 50,000 men, ample food supplies and equipment, and the favor of a large element of the regular army.

A semi-official statement issued in Rome on Nov. 22 declared that a minority of d'Annunzio's forces, counting on the support of friends in the interior of Italy, persisted in the idea of attempting seditious action against Italy itself, contemplating the overthrow of the monarchy and the establishment of a republic. In Zara, meanwhile, a Belgrade statement said that d'Annunzio's troops left in control had instituted a reign of terror, insulting and attacking all not wearing the armlet of Italian colors inscribed "Italy or Death!" Private advices reaching London on Nov. 22 left no doubt of d'Annunzio's intention of annexing the whole Dalmatian coast and attacking Montenegro. The situation was regarded as extremely grave. A Serbian division, 12,000 strong, was concentrated at Spalato on Nov. 22, ready to oppose the advance of d'Annunzio and his forces if he approached the city.

GOVERNMENT SENTIMENT CHANGING

The situation of the Italian Government, crushed with war debts, with its army still mobilized, and unable to secure a settlement of the Adriatic question with its allies, was made even more unpleasant by d'Annunzio's new activities. The defection of Admiral Millo to d'Annunzio at Zara was officially disapproved. In Rome, however, Premier Tittoni, in a letter to his constituents, came out boldly for an Italian Fiume, and reproached the Allies for not understanding that the question of Fiume had for the Italians not an economic but a moral significance.

No steps were taken to combat d'Annunzio's new activities, and up to the time when this edition of CURRENT HISTORY went to press, the situation created by d'Annunzio's occupation of Zara remained unchanged.

CURRENT HISTORY IN BRIEF

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 20, 1919]

KING ALBERT IN WASHINGTON

AFTER touring the United States from New York and Boston to the cities of the Pacific Coast, everywhere encountering formal receptions and cordial addresses of welcome, King Albert, Queen Elizabeth, and Prince Leopold of Belgium arrived in Washington, D. C., on Oct. 28. Both Houses of Congress paused in their discussions on that date to give a hearty welcome to the royal guests. King Albert delivered short addresses before the Senate and the House, paying tribute to the American Army, to which he gave the credit of deciding the victory; to Brand Whitlock, the American Ambassador to Belgium when the war broke out, and to Herbert Hoover, the American Food Administrator. He predicted that the ties linking the United States with Belgium would never be broken, and offered thanks to all Americans who aided his people in the war. The galleries of both houses were crowded, and the King's remarks were greeted with the most enthusiastic applause. In the House many of the children of the members were present. Later in the day, at a reception in the home of the Assistant Secretary of State, Breckinridge Long, Secretary of War Baker pinned upon the King's breast, by the order of President Wilson, the American Distinguished Service Medal, in the presence of General Pershing, General March, and other military and civil notabilities. In the evening the King and Queen and their son were the guests of honor at a dinner given by Vice President Marshall, at which King Albert proposed a toast to President Wilson's speedy recovery from illness.

On Oct. 29 the Belgian monarchs visited Mount Vernon and placed a wreath of chrysanthemums on the granite slab of George Washington's tomb. In the course of the day, the King was visited by Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, who after a 45-minute interview declared the Belgian monarch to be "a real man, even if he is a King." In the evening the royal guests attended a dinner given by Secretary Lansing. On the following day King Albert and Queen Elizabeth made an informal visit to the bedside of President Wilson, with whom they had a cordial conversation, and on Oct. 31 the royal guests sailed on the American transport George Washington, after sending a heartfelt message of farewell to President Wilson by wireless. Before departure the King gave expression to the pleasure and interest of his visit to the United States, and on landing at Brest, Nov. 13, he again cabled his gratitude for the rare hospitality vouchsafed by the United States.

SUPPRESSING GERMAN OPERA

A GERMAN opera company in New York City attempted in October to produce operas in the German language, but public sentiment, voiced through the ex-soldiers who still had many comrades lying wounded in New York hospitals, refused to permit this form of art. After throngs of soldiers and sailors had practically stopped the performances in the Lexington Theatre, despite the attempts of a large force of policemen to keep order, Justice Leonard A. Giegerich of the State Supreme Court issued a decision dissolving an injunction which had restrained Mayor Hylan and the police from interfering with the production of German opera in the theatre named. Justice Giegerich based his decision on the state of feeling consequent on the war, which made the performance of opera in the German language a provocation to a large proportion of the community. All performances of this kind were prohibited until after the Peace Treaty had been ratified by the United States.

A curious contrast to this action in the United States was afforded by the announcement from Paris on Nov. 9 that a performance of Wagnerian music had been given on the preceding day at the Pas de Loup Concert, and had elicited only two isolated protests in the audience; the protestors, a man and a woman, were ushered out, and the conductor of the concert, René Baton, declared that interruptions against German music would not be tolerated. He regarded it as a pure question of art, and said that he proposed to include at least 20 per cent. of German music in his programs. A vote of three Pas de Loup concert audiences on the subject resulted in 4,983 favoring the return of German music and 213 opposing it.

EXPLOITS OF A MASTER SPY

CAPTAIN FRITZ DUQUESNE, a former Boer officer, is being hunted in Mexico by British and American Secret Service agents on charges of arson and murder. Duquesne, according to evidence in hand, was Germany's most daring spy in America, and was responsible for many "sink without a trace" plots against British shipping. Information gathered by the British Secret Service showed that Duquesne operated during the war as head of a desperate gang in South America. Their principal exploits were related to attempts to destroy allied shipping, including the following list of outrages:

Destruction of the steamship San Salvador by fire.

Narrow escape from complete destruction by S. S. Vauban.

Burning of coaling station at Bahia.

Destruction of the Pembrokehire in the Atlantic.

Bursting of boilers of the liner Liger, through dynamite mixed with the coal.

Dynamiting of the steamship Tennyson.

Erection of illicit wireless station north of Pernambuco.

Complete disappearance of four ships leaving for South American ports, and never heard from again.

Duquesne himself was arrested in New York last May on a charge of fraud. It was learned at this time that he traveled under various aliases, notably Frederick Fredericks and Captain Claude Stoughton. When taken into custody he was posing as a Captain in the Australian Light Horse, with the ribbons of the South African, Matabele and Long Service medals. By simulating complete paralysis Duquesne got himself transferred to the prison hospital, whence he escaped with the aid of confederates, who took him in a waiting automobile to an airplane, in which he flew to Mexico. Secret Service agents followed him there, but at the middle of October he was still evading them.

GERMAN DYNAMITER SENTENCED

WERNER HORN, the German reservist who on Feb. 2, 1915, attempted to dynamite the international bridge at St. Croix between the United States and Canada, was sentenced by a New Brunswick court on Oct. 31, 1919, to ten years in the penitentiary. Horn stated his intention to appeal to Germany, declaring that he could not be punished after the signing of peace.

SENTENCE OF A FRENCH BOLSHEVIK

CAPTAIN JACQUES SADOUL, sent to Russia as a member of a French military mission, entered a year ago into close personal relations with Lenin and Trotsky, a fact which enabled him to take an effective part in the release of the French journalist, Ludovic Naudeau, from Moscow prisons, as recounted by M. Naudeau in the November CURRENT HISTORY. Sadoul's relations with the Bolsheviks, however, proved to be of a treasonable and even traitorous nature, according to charges filed against him by the French military authorities, and on Nov. 6 court-martial proceedings were begun against him at Paris on the ground that at the fall of Odessa he had deserted his own countrymen in support of the enemy; that he was with the Bolshevik forces which captured the city from the French and British troops; that he supplied information to the enemy, and later urged French prisoners to join the Bolsheviks.

Meanwhile Captain Sadoul's friends had submitted his name as a candidate for election to the Chamber of Deputies, though he was still in Russia, and an active campaign in his behalf was in full swing at the time of his court-martial. The President of the court refused to allow Mme. Sadoul to be represented at the trial. Albert Thomas, the former Socialist Minister of Munitions, also was unsuccessful in the object of a petition which he filed in Sadoul's behalf. On Nov. 8 Captain Sadoul was condemned to death by unanimous vote of the court-martial. Though the sentence cannot be executed until the condemned officer is given up by Lenin and Trotzky, the episode is not without significance.

D'ANNUNZIO'S ODDITIES

GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO, the Italian poet and dramatist, now the centre of the world's attention as the raider and military chief of the disputed port of Fiume, has for many years given abundant evidence of the eccentricities of his artistic temperament. Among these were innumerable "love" affairs, including the episode with Eleanora Duse. Nearly all his novels and plays were written at "La Capponcina," a remarkable pseudo-monastic abode, covered with Latin inscriptions, in which every article of furniture is alleged to be at least 400 years old. Photographs of d'Annunzio writing, according to his fixed custom, on an ancient church altar by the light of sixty candles, because he believed, with Balzac, that only by candle-light could he obtain inspiration, have been spread throughout the world. They recall the legend of Alfred de Musset writing feverishly all night in his apartment in Paris by the light of candles. D'Annunzio, like Mascagni, pays great attention to his dress, and just before the war a Neopolitan paper published an amusing inventory of his clothes.

LABOR TROUBLES IN SWEDEN

IN the first week of October a lock-out was proclaimed in the wood-working trades of Sweden, including that of the furniture and piano makers; repeated conciliatory efforts had failed, and the fight was bitter. This strike was one of a long series which have afflicted Sweden and crippled her industries for a whole year. As early as last January there were strikes among the sailors and engine-drivers which assumed serious dimensions. A threatened strike by the railway men, which aimed eventually at the State railways and food supply, was averted by the Government only by the granting of important concessions. There followed a long and demoralizing strike in the Swedish match industry and among the dockers at Gothenburg, the latter as the direct outcome of the decision taken at the International Stevedoring Congress in Holland that all goods which could in any way be classed as war material should be blockaded. Most serious of all was the printers' strike, which lasted for about two months. During this time all the papers, except the Bolshevik organ, Folkets Dagblad Politiken, appeared with considerably reduced issues, but the conflict ended with the victory of the owners. That this strike was managed and supported by Bolshevik money was stated from Stockholm to be beyond question.

The extra session of the Swedish Riksdag in October had before it the Eight-hour Working Day bill. This measure was defeated by a substantial majority in the First Chamber last Spring, after its acceptance by the Second Chamber, but the Premier's statement in the debate showed the Government's determination to carry it through. Industrial leaders almost without exception opposed the bill on the ground that it would mean nothing short of ruin to Swedish industry, which was already working under severe depression owing to strong competition from abroad.

HELGOLAND AND ENGLAND

A MESSAGE from Cuxhaven dated Oct. 1 stated that a strong agitation was proceeding in Heligoland for separation from Germany and union with Great Britain, and that a plebiscite on the question was planned. The people of the island, according to the Berliner Tageblatt, are anxious to come again under British rule. Before Great Britain ceded Heligoland to Germany it was one of the most peaceful spots in the world, a unique place to study the habits of rare sea birds, inhabited by a tiny community untroubled by the cost of living, inasmuch as it escaped the income tax and was well supplied with German wine and cigars, imported for the Summer visitors who came for the bathing season. The change which dug huge fortifications a hundred feet deep in the cliffs, covered them with gun emplacements, and girdled them with a labyrinth of walls 50 feet thick, as a means of protecting the Elbe, and providing a base for attack on England, was considered by the inhabitants as a doubtful blessing and proved a severe strain on the island's zeal for the Fatherland. When the war broke out the Heligoland fishermen were all shipped off to the mainland, and the island was given over to the sea-gulls and the German gunners. Since the Berlin revolution the original inhabitants have returned, the island has again been thrown open, and a beginning has been made with the dismantling of the formidable fortifications as stipulated by the Versailles Treaty.

NORWAY FOR PROHIBITION

BY a popular referendum vote on Oct. 7, Norway adopted the prohibition of whisky, brandy, and other strong liquors. The vote stood 428,455 in favor of prohibition to 284,137 against it. Christiania was strongly against the proposal, and only 18,500 voted for it, as compared with 70,000 in opposition. The passing of the measure did not affect the consumption of wines and beers.

AUSTRIA SELLS ART TREASURES

IT was decided by the Austrian Government on Oct. 1 to sell the vast and costly art treasures of the nation, in order to obtain money to feed the half-starved people. Valuable paintings, rare manuscripts, tapestries, porcelain, historical furniture from the Imperial palaces, Ministries and other State buildings, aggregating a total value of 1,000,000,000 crowns, ($250,000,000 at the pre-war rate of exchange), as the result of this decision will be scattered throughout the world. Among the objects offered for sale are the famous Gobelin and Arras tapestries collected by the Hapsburgs during many decades. These number nearly 400 pieces, and their value cannot be estimated. There are also costly gold and silver saltcellars, and dishes and flagons set with precious stones, the work of the most famous Florentine jewelers. Even after the alienation of all these objects, however, Vienna will still be rich in art treasures, as the Peace Treaty with Austria provides that the collections belonging to the Government of the former Austro-Hungarian Empire or to the crown of Austria-Hungary may not be sold or dispersed within a period of twenty years.

END OF A ROBBER CHIEF

TOWARD the beginning of October it was announced from Teheran that the Persian Government, which had shown unusual activity in repressing disorders in the country, had at last hanged the famous robber chief Nayib Hussein, who was so old that he had become almost legendary in his own lifetime, as well as his son, Mashallah Khan, both of whom had long terrorized the district of Kashan. Nayib Hussein lived in a huge fortified castle on his "estate" near Kashan, where, supported by his sons, he levied blackmail in the bazaars of the town. Often he occupied the town itself, and he became so powerful that in 1912 the Government invited him to assume responsibility for the safety of the roads from Kashan to Kum and Yezd. His name was a household word in Persian homes, and was used as a bogey to frighten naughty children. On six previous occasions his violent end had been announced in the official Gazette of Teheran, but the old brigand had always survived to demonstrate that the news of his death had been "very much exaggerated."

BOLSHEVISM IN THE FAR EAST

THE Berlin correspondent of the Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant pointed out at the end of September that propagandist traffic was being actively carried on by means of couriers between Moscow and India, and that prominent Indians and Persians, as well as Turks, were welcome guests in the Soviet Capital. The propagandists traveled between the front of Kolchak and the Ural troops of General Dutov. Lenin himself has stated that his main objective is Asia, and that at one time he sent so many troops and such quantities of money to that theatre that the western front was weakened by it. A Russian, the Berlin correspondent said, conducted the propaganda campaign in India as a representative of Lenin, while a former Turkish officer had the management of affairs in Turkestan. Here he had initiated a great anti-British organization by means of unlimited Russian money, as well as arms and ammunition. These various organizations which, according to Lenin's own words, were directed against the integrity of India, were being extended and were gaining strength.

When the revolt against British rule in Afghanistan broke out, Lenin's couriers brought hope and encouragement to these new foes of Great Britain. After the revolt was ended, Lenin received the Afghans' Extraordinary Ambassador in Moscow with the greatest honors. The attitude and words of the envoy on this occasion were scarcely those of the representative of a beaten and humiliated nation, such as the British Afghan officials had depicted the Emir's people to be. A leading article of The London Times pointed out on Oct. 11 that the Government of India, after forty years, had given the Afghans control of their external relations.

The visit of the Afghan Embassy to Moscow had its picturesque and significant features. The Ambassador, Mahomed Vali Khan, according to the reports of eyewitnesses of the ceremony of greeting, was a stately figure, above the average height, and under forty years of age. Like all the rest of his embassy, he was dressed in European costume, with the exception of an astrakhan cap. The embassy arrived in Moscow on Oct. 10, and was met at the station by a large deputation. A guard of honor had been provided, accompanied by a band and banners. "Comrade" Narimanov, Director of the Musulman Near East Department, delivered the following greeting:

Welcome! In the name of the Soviet Authority and the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs, I greet, in the person of your Excellency, Afghanistan, and its first embassy to the capital of the Russian Workers and Peasants' Government. This historic fact proves that Russian imperialism, striving to enslave and degrade small nationalities, has gone, never to return. In the name of my Government, I purposely greet you in the Turkish language in the Red Russian capital, in order to prove that the Workers and Peasants' Government treats all peoples and languages with sincere respect. Such a Government knows how to value sincere friendship. I welcome you.

Comrade Sultan Galiev, welcoming the Ambassador in the name of the Revolutionary Council of the republic, said:

Your small but heroic country is fighting for its emancipation from the age-long oppressors of the East, British imperialism. We know that you need help and support, and that you expect this support from Soviet Russia. In the name of the Revolutionary Council, and in the name of the revolutionary organizations of the many million laboring Mohammedan masses of Soviet Russia, I declare to you that Soviet Russia will give you that assistance, as she herself is fighting against international imperialism and for the rights of the oppressed nations of the whole world.

In reply to the greeting of Comrade Sultan Galiev, the Ambassador said:

We know that the Musulman peoples of Russia are now free, and we strongly hope that, with the assistance of Soviet Russia, we shall succeed in emancipating our Afghanistan and the rest of the East.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE

THE great pause in the life of the universities on the banks of the Isis and the Cam caused by the war has come to an end. Oxford and Cambridge have been unlike themselves, unlike any portion of their history, except perhaps the civil war period, when pikemen thronged the streets and "quads," as the men in khaki of the modern armies have thronged them during the past five years. The writer of these lines visited both universities in 1914, some months after the war had broken out; the "yard" was filled with the tents of wounded British soldiers, and uniformed guards were everywhere. Today Oxford and Cambridge are returning to their traditional pursuits; freshmen are pouring into the classrooms, and the Don is assuming once more the importance of which he had been temporarily deprived. The number of undergraduates in the Fall of 1919 was wholly unprecedented, and both of the great British universities have some difficulty in finding accommodation for them all. So the new era of peace and the life intellectual has been inaugurated within the old stone walls of Oxford and Cambridge, and the world of books has again come into its own.

STRASBOURG UNIVERSITY

IN Alsace-Lorraine the life of Strasbourg University has begun anew under French direction, but there are still German disharmonies to mar the even tenor of student life. Evidence of such disharmony is contained in an open letter which the students addressed to M. Millerand, High Commissioner of the French Government in Alsace, in which they strongly protest against the excessive number of Germans who still frequent the classes at the university. This letter reads as follows:

After the evacuation of the territory by German troops there was a conviction, both in Alsace and in Lorraine, that the Germans would deem it more suitable not to remain in the territory which had been restored to France once again, and that the great majority would ask to return to the country of their origin.

To the general surprise, not only do a considerable number of Germans manifest a tendency to attach themselves permanently to the country, but many of those whose presence was merely tolerated show themselves unworthy of the kindness of the French Government by openly expressing sentiments contrary to the interests of France.

There are even some who, by a stealthy and clever propaganda, are tending to sow discontent between Alsations and the people of Lorraine. In a word, there are very few Germans who observe a correct attitude; most of them take advantage of the mildness of the Government to affect public opinion for their own advantage. Actuated by these motives, the club of the students of Strasbourg, deeply solicitous for the future of the country, expresses the wish that the general commissary should not allow himself to be influenced by demands often prompted by purely personal considerations, but should take against the Germans residing in Strasbourg the rigorous measures which public opinion unanimously expects of him, viz., that the great majority of German citizens, if not all of them, should be invited to quit the reintegrated territory, and that those whose presence is tolerated should be subjected to the strictest observation.

The French Government is doing all in its power to make the great Alsatian University worthy of the best French standards. The most renowned French professors are being sought for the institution, and the substitution of French for German in the examinations has already been begun with considerable success. The German-speaking but French-sympathizing Alsatian students are working hard to master the difficulties of the new academic tongue, which they take pride in using. French professors, it is said, will have no great difficulty in the work of reassimilation, for Teutonic "kultur" never succeeded in taking deep root in Alsace, especially in the old University of Strasbourg, where French sympathies for many decades have been openly expressed.

THE FRENCH PEACE ARMY

AREPORT of the French Sub-Committee on Armaments, submitted to the Senate Commission on Military Affairs and dealing with the reorganization of the French Army in time of peace, contained the following program:

An annual conscription of 200,000 instead of 600,000 men, as previously.

Enlistments and re-enlistments, 150,000.

Divisions retained in twenty districts.

Headquarters of the 21st Division to be moved from Epinal to Strasbourg.

North Africa, two army corps; an additional corps of colonial troops.

Home army to have one active corps, instead of two, with a reserve division.

Army corps on eastern frontier to have two active divisions, one at more than full strength, to be stationed on the Rhine. The North African army corps and the colonial corps each to send a division to the Rhine, thus giving six infantry divisions for the French Army of Occupation on the Rhine.

Cavalry to be reduced to four divisions; one division to be sent to the Rhine.

The fulfillment of the program, to sum up, involves a peace footing of 350,000 men and a war footing of 1,350,000. The Rhine front is to be heavily guarded. A further reserve of 2,000,000 men, based on the fifteen classes of the territorial and reserve forces, is kept for emergencies.

CANADA'S WAR MEMORIALS

THE Canadian Government was the first to submit detailed plans to the Battle Exploits Memorials Committee for sites for battlefield memorials. The sites proposed by Canada, and fully approved by the Memorials Committee, whose duty it is to pass upon all memorial proposals, so as to avoid clashing with other units and to investigate the validity of the claim, were as follows:

1. St. Julien.
2. Courcellette.
3. Observatory Ridge (Sanctuary Wood).
4. Vimy. (Hill 145.)
5. Passchendaele.
6. Caix. (Between Caix and Le Quesnel.)
7. Dury. (Drocourt-Queant Line.)
8. Bourlon Wood.

Plans to obtain title and permission to build are being obtained from the respective Governments concerned. A preliminary estimate of $500,000 was authorized in the Canadian Parliament in October for the erection of the proposed memorials. The French and Belgian Governments were co-operating heartily with the Canadian representative, Colonel Hughes, in all steps taken.

STRAINED RELATIONS WITH MEXICO

A SITUATION fraught with serious possibilities in the relations between the United States and Mexico arose during November, owing to the abduction by bandits in the City of Puebla, Mexico, of William O. Jenkins, a prominent cotton manufacturer in that city, who for years had been acting as United States Consular Agent there. The seizure of Mr. Jenkins was accomplished on Oct. 19, 1919. He was overpowered at his home by five masked men, his safe was forced open and $30,000 taken from it, and he was forced to accompany the bandits to their headquarters, where he was held for ransom, $150,000 being the sum named.

The State Department at Washington on Oct. 25 instructed the American Embassy in Mexico City to demand the release of Mr. Jenkins. The release was accomplished on Oct. 26 by the payment of $25,000 in cash and the balance in notes by friends of the kidnapped man. A few days later Señor Mestre, Mr. Jenkins's attorney, and two weeks thereafter Mr. Jenkins himself were arrested by the Mexican authorities on the charge that they had connived to bring about the kidnapping in order to place the Carranza Government in disrepute. The American authorities had previously investigated this report through the embassy at Mexico City and had satisfied themselves that it was cruelly unjust and utterly groundless; the Mexican Judge, Franko, who investigated the abduction originally, took occasion to refute the charge and praised Mr. Jenkins as a friend of the Mexican people.

Mr. Jenkins in a letter to Congressman Davis of Tennessee, who represents the district where he was born, stated that the bandits told him their principal object was to show the helplessness of the Carranza Government and force that Government to pay the large ransom. He further stated that while he was held by the bandits, he suffered greatly from exposure and became very ill, and that after his release he was subjected to humiliations and serious annoyances by the Carranza authorities, until at length he was again arrested on the trumped-up charge of having connived at his own abduction.

Secretary of State Lansing on Nov. 20 sent a note to the Carranza Government demanding Mr. Jenkins's immediate release. The official announcement regarding the action was as follows:

The note, which is based on the rearrest of Consular Agent Jenkins at Puebla, points out that the United States Government is "surprised and incensed" to learn of the reimprisonment of Mr. Jenkins, particularly in view of the suffering and losses already sustained by him in connection with his kidnapping through lack of protection by the Mexican authorities and in connection with his first arrest by Mexican officials.

The note expresses the view, based on the information in the possession of the Department of State, that his rearrest is absolutely arbitrary and unwarranted and warns the Mexican Government that further molestation of the Consular Agent will seriously affect the relations between the United States and Mexico, for which the Government of Mexico must assume sole responsibility.

"PUSSYFOOT" JOHNSON

WILLIAM E. JOHNSON, an American who is conducting a prohibitionist propaganda in Great Britain, was attacked by a group of students at London Nov. 13, while speaking at Essex Hall, near King's College, in the Strand. The students seized the speaker, placed him on a stretcher, and carried him through the streets of London. They disclaimed any attempt to injure him, but some one in the crowd threw a missile that struck him in the face, destroying the sight of one eye. Mr. Johnson, universally dubbed "Pussyfoot" by the British press, had become one of the most-talked-of men in the United Kingdom, and though his campaign was unpopular, his injury was commented upon everywhere with regret.

BRITISH FINANCES

THE British Budget, laid before the House of Commons on Aug. 27, indicated a deficit of over $2,300,000,000. The estimated expenditure is in round numbers $8,000,000,000; the estimated revenue $5,800,000,000. The increase in expenditure was due to war pensions and bonuses, police grants, increased pay for army, navy, and air forces, loans to allies, and the railway strike. The army increase is over $500,000,000; navy, $50,000,000. The national debt is estimated at $40,000,000,000. The cost of the army during the ensuing year was estimated at $2,000,000,000; that of the navy, $800,000,000; that of the air forces, $280,000,000.

ARMISTICE DAY

THE first anniversary of the signing of the armistice was celebrated on Nov. 11 throughout America, Great Britain, France, and other allied countries. In Great Britain all business ceased precisely at 11 A. M. for two minutes in memory of the dead. The most impressive scenes were witnessed everywhere as the solemn moment was observed. Civic employes stood still at their posts. Judges in their courtrooms, Cabinet members in their offices, or wherever they happened to be, ceased their duties and stood at attention when the clock struck and the rockets burst that signaled the hour. Every man bared his head, and in many instances men and women stood sobbing in the streets.

In France high mass was celebrated and in some cities there were public demonstrations.

The dominating note at American celebrations was a memorial tribute to the dead; the observance was general, and a note of solemnity pervaded. President Wilson issued a formal message in commemoration of the day, in which he said:

The war showed us the strength of great nations acting together for high purposes, and the victory of arms foretells the enduring conquests which can be made in peace when nations act justly and in furtherance of the common interests of men. To us in America the reflections of Armistice Day will be filled with solemn pride in the heroism of those who died in the country's service, and with gratitude for the victory, both because of the thing from which it has freed us and because of the opportunity it has given America to show her sympathy with peace and justice in the councils of nations.

General Pershing paid tribute to the American Expeditionary Forces in his statement, saying:

Our armies have been demobilized and our citizen-soldiers have returned again to civil pursuits, with assurance of their ability to achieve therein the success they attained as soldiers, thus bringing a new asset to the nation. With broadened visions they return, not only with pride in the high standards of American manhood but with a new conception of its relations to the duties of citizenship.

As we pay tribute to our fighting men, we remember that solidly behind them stood the American people, with all our resources and our determination. This common service has welded together our people. These experiences safeguard the future of America and enable us to look forward confidently to the development of a stronger nationality and a deeper sense of the obligations that rest upon us. The exercise by the American people of practical patriotism during the war was an avowal of our firm adherence to the principles of free government that will continue to have great influence upon the progressive thought throughout the world. These are things which make this day significant.

MR. GLASS A SENATOR

CARTER T. GLASS, Secretary of the Treasury, was appointed Nov. 15 to the United States Senate to succeed the late Thomas S. Martin. His term does not expire until 1925. Mr. Glass became the Secretary of the Treasury after the resignation of William G. McAdoo. It was reported Nov. 24 that the President would appoint Russell Cornell Leffingwell, a New York attorney, who was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, to the Secretaryship. Mr. Leffingwell is a member of the law firm of Cravath & Henderson of New York City.

ST. MARK'S BRONZE HORSES RESTORED

THE famous Quadriga, the group of four bronze horses of St. Mark's, were replaced over the principal portal of the Basilica at Venice on Nov. 11 after having been hidden in a safe place during the years of war. This stately, ancient bronze was brought to Venice in the year 1204 by Doge Enrico Dandolo, and was removed early in 1915 in the fear that it would be damaged by the Austrian bombardment. This was the second time the horses had been removed from Venice, Napoleon having taken them to Paris to decorate the Triumphal Arch in the Place du Carrousel. They were returned to Venice in 1815.

BELGIAN AND FRENCH GRANTS IN AFRICA

BY an Anglo-Belgian agreement, referred to in the Belgian Senate on Aug. 26, the districts of Ruanda and Urundi, in German East Africa, were ceded to Belgium by Great Britain. The whole of German East Africa was assigned to the latter country by the Peace Conference as a mandatory of the League of Nations. Ruanda and Urundi constitute the most fertile district of the colony, and have a population of over 3,000,000 natives. The cession was made by Great Britain as a mark of British gratitude to her Belgian ally.

By a Franco-British agreement about four-fifths of Cameroun and two-thirds of Togo are to be ceded to France. German statistics give Cameroun an area of 540,000 square kilometers and a native population of 2,750,000 inhabitants. The population in French Cameroun has been estimated at about 1,500,000. The port of Douala will be the principal port of the whole territory when united. Togo, according to German statistics, possesses 87,000 square kilometers and a native population of 1,032,000 inhabitants. In 1912 its commerce totaled 26,731,000 francs. The British cession will include the port of Lome, which will be the principal issue of Dahomey, and two railways which are susceptible of extension to regions of French Sudan.

With Demobilization Practically Completed the Nation Grapples With Peace-time Problems

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 20, 1919]

FEW American troops remained abroad on Nov. 1, and most of these were getting ready to return. During the first twenty-seven days of October 16,047 army personnel sailed from Europe. Since the armistice a total of 3,421,916 men had been discharged from the army, more than a million of whom were in this country and never had an opportunity to go to France.

The estimated strength of the army on Nov. 3 was 270,200, not including nurses and field clerks. The distribution included 18,455 in Europe, 7,783 en route to or from Europe, and 209,884 in the United States. The total "enlisted" strength was 247,543, which was 30,000, or 12 per cent., below the number permitted under existing appropriations. There are still 13,560 emergency officers in the army.

Comparative figures prepared by the General Staff and published on Nov. 17 showed that the rate of demobilization of the army since the armistice exceeded the rate for the same period following the civil war and the war with Spain. Demobilization for the year reached 96 per cent., as compared with 94.4 the first year following the civil war. Demobilization following the war with Spain terminated with the tenth month, when a percentage of 83 was reached, the Philippine insurrection preventing the disbandment of some volunteer organizations until the succeeding year.

As compared with the civil war, demobilization during 1919 was less rapid for the first six months, and more rapid for the second six months. The emergency forces at their greatest strength, regulars not included, in each of these three wars, were:

Civil War—April 30, 1865, 1,034,064.

Spanish War—Aug. 31, 1898, 216,256.

World War—Nov. 11, 1918, 3,560,000.

The mustering out of troops after the civil war was virtually completed by the Summer of 1866, although a few volunteers were retained in service after Nov. 1, 1866. The last volunteer organization was disbanded Dec. 20, 1867, or two and one-half years after hostilities had ceased.

On Armistice Day, Nov. 11, the publication at Washington of a revised list of American war casualties showed a total of 293,089. The list included 34,625 killed in action, including 382 lost at sea; died of wounds, 13,955; died of disease, 23,392; died of accident and other causes, 5,326; wounded in action, 215,489; missing in action, 2.

Thirty-three graduates of West Point were killed in action or died of wounds received in action during the world war, according to information from the official records of the War Department. These officers belonged to fifteen graduating classes. The classes of 1917 and 1918 sustained the heaviest losses, six officers of the class of 1917 having lost their lives and ten of the class of 1918, which was graduated on Aug. 30, 1917.

No West Pointer of higher rank than Colonel lost his life in the war, but the majority of those from West Point killed in action were of grades ranging from Captain up to Colonel, only eight being of as low rank as Lieutenants. One of the officers, Second Lieutenant Albert F. Ward, was killed in action at Vladivostok, and the other thirty-two were killed in France.

DEATHS AT FLYING FIELDS

It was stated by the General Staff on Oct. 28 that since June 1, 1918, the Air Service had had 390 fatalities at flying fields in the United States, of which 14, or 4 per cent., were attributed to the failure of engines or the collapse of airplanes. The causes of 9 per cent. of all fatalities are declared to be unknown. The causes, numbers of fatalities, and percentage which each class of fatality bears to the total were made public, as follows:

	Number.	P.C.
Tail spin	118	30
Collision	61	16
Nose dive	47	12
Unknown	36	9
Side slip	21	5
Stall	19	5

300,000 FOR PEACE ARMY

The House Military Affairs Committee, it was announced Nov. 15 by Representative Julius Kahn, Chairman of the committee, had reached an agreement for a peace army of 300,000 officers and men.

The unanimous opinion of the committee is that the regular army should be recruited by voluntary enlistments, and that promotions should be from a single list, as recommended by General Pershing. The Tank and Chemical Warfare Service, Mr. Kahn said, would be continued, although many other divisions and bureaus created during the war probably would be discontinued.

Mr. Kahn's statement read to the committee was, in part, as follows:

It is believed by the members of the committee that in the legislation that we ultimately will report to the House such branches of the army as a tank section and a chemical warfare section will have to be provided. These are two of the entirely new developments of modern warfare. A number of new divisions and bureaus of the supply departments also were created during the war. Among these were the finance division, the transportation corps, and the storage and traffic division, while the air service was divorced from the signal corps and functioned as a separate organization.

The committee has reached virtually a unanimous conclusion as to the size of the regular army at this time. We feel that the legislation ought to contemplate a regular force of 250,000 combat troops. With the necessary auxiliary forces in the supply and staff corps it probably will bring the total number of officers and men to about 300,000. Enlisted men in the regular army we feel should be recruited by voluntary enlistments.

PERSHING'S MILITARY POLICY

General Pershing on Oct. 31 appeared before the House and Senate Committees on Military Affairs and gave his views as to the reorganization of the army. He insisted that the standing army, officers and men, should not total more than 275,000 or 300,000, as against 575,000, recommended by the General Staff. In agreement with the General Staff he recommended universal military training for youths of 19 for six months. He favored this, even though there were never another war, for its physical and educational features and the preliminary and necessary training it gave in citizenship. The youths so trained would not be subject to draft in peace times, as the standing army would be maintained by volunteers. General Pershing said:

In considering the total strength of the army all of us should take into consideration the cost. We cannot afford to adopt the principle of a large standing army at the enormous expense indicated in this bill.

Our success in the war was not due to our forethought in preparedness, but to exceptional circumstances, which made it possible to prepare after we had declared war. It is my belief that had America been adequately prepared our rights would never have been violated, our institutions would never have been threatened. As a military policy we should have:

(A)—A permanent military establishment large enough to provide against sudden attack.

(B)—A small force sufficient for expeditionary purposes to meet our international obligations, particularly on the American Continent.

(C)—Such force as may be necessary to meet our internal requirements.

(D)—A trained citizen reserve organized to meet the emergency of war.

In addition to preparing our young manhood to defend their country, universal military training brings many benefits which our Government should hasten to provide. It develops physical vigor and manliness. It develops mentality. It would decrease illiteracy. It teaches men discipline and respect for constituted authority. It encourages initiative and gives young men confidence in themselves. It better prepares young men for the duties of citizenship.

Such training is especially needed among our alien population, who would learn something of our language and our institutions. All these benefits have been bestowed upon the men who composed our forces during the war, and the benefits of such training should be universally extended to all our young men. Through service it increases their patriotism. It broadens their views through associating with men of all classes. It is democratic.

RESIGNATION OF OFFICERS

Up to Nov. 8 more than one-fourth of all the officers of the combatant army, who were in the regular army, had resigned, and other resignations were awaiting the action of the President and the Secretary of War. The total number accepted up to noon of that day was 1,999, which meant that 32 per cent. of all the officers in the Coast Artillery Corps, 30 per cent. of the officers of the field artillery, 24 per cent. of the cavalry officers, 28 per cent. of the infantry officers, and 16 per cent. of the official personnel of the Corps of Engineers had left the service.

More officers have resigned since the armistice than resigned during the entire history of the regular army prior to November, 1918. They are the younger officers, the Lieutenants and Captains, the ones who can least be spared. Virtually none of the field officers, whose salaries make it possible for them to make both ends meet during this present period of high cost of living, are resigning. A memorandum issued by the Morale Division of the General Staff says:

The army is in a very serious condition. The extraordinarily high cost of the necessities of life has so reduced the standard of living to which officers have heretofore been accustomed that there has resulted a profound state of discontent and low morale in the service.

* * * Those who resign are men of high initiative, force, energy, and self-reliance, military qualities which the army can ill-afford to lose.

The officers of the army are now being paid on the salary scale passed by Congress in 1908, since which time no increases have been granted. In numerous instances the situation in which the younger married officers find themselves, as a result of their inadequate incomes, borders on the pathetic. It is of record that in scores of cases they have had to cancel their life insurance, to sell their Liberty bonds, while their wives and daughters attend to all domestic work.

The answer to the problem now facing the country, on the solution of which depends the future of the military establishment, is in the hands of Congress, which now has before it a bill to increase the salary of officers of the army, navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and Public Health Service 30 per cent., and the pay of all enlisted men 50 per cent.

GENERAL OFFICERS NAMED

Secretary Baker on Oct. 31 announced the names of 101 general officers to be retained in the army under the provisions of the bill, which allows a total of 18,000 officers during the current year. The list includes the names of two Generals, two Lieutenant Generals, fifty-five Major Generals, and forty-two Brigadier Generals. Some of these are holding their permanent ranks, while others are holding temporary ranks as general officers higher than their permanent ranks.

The Generals ordered to be retained, all of whom will remain in their duties until further orders, are:

GENERALS—John J. Pershing and Peyton C. March.

LIEUTENANT GENERALS—Hunter Liggett and Robert L. Bullard.

MAJOR GENERALS—Leonard Wood, John L. Morrison, Charles G. Morton, Joseph T. Dickman, Charles E. W. Kennedy, Francis J. Kernan, Frank McIntyre, George W. Burr, William G. Haan, Henry Jervoy, James W. McAndrew, Charles H. Muir, Peter C. Harris, John L. Chamberlain, Enoch H. Crowder, Harry L. Rogers, M. Perritt, W. Ireland, William M. Black, Clarence C. Williams, George O. Squier, Jesse McCarter, Frank W. Coe, William J. Spow, Charles T. Menoher, William L. Sibert, Charles P. Summerall, James G. Harbord, William M. Wright, John L. Hines, Henry T. Allen, William S. Graves, Grote Hutcheson, James H. McRae, Samuel D. Sturgis, William S. McNair, Clarence H. Edwards, George Bell, Jr., Joseph E. Kuhn, David C. Shanks, Edwin F. Glenn, John Biddle, Omar Bundy, Harry C. Hale, George W. Read, Edward F. McGlachlin, Jr., Henry C. Sharpe, Charles J. Bailey, Charles S. Farnsworth, Ernest Hines, Clement A. F. Flagler, Edward M. Lewis, William H. Hay, Robert L. Howze, and A. W. Brewster.

ARMY SALES EXCEED BILLION

On Nov. 18 it was stated by the War Department that the sales of surplus army property in the United States and Europe reported to Nov. 8 amounted to $1,152,328,305. Sales in the United States alone amounted to $602,000,000, which was 9½ per cent. greater than the total sales in Europe. The total for the United States covered sales of real estate and improvements and included $123,245,240 in sales made prior to the establishment of the office of the Director of Sales. The value of sales of army property in this country and Europe was given as follows:

United States, $602,000,000; France, $400,000,000; Poland, $48,459,152; Belgium, $28,605,661; Siberia, $18,716,009; Czechoslovakia, $14,958,937; Rumania, $12,879,313; Esthonia, $10,820,117; Ukraine, $8,557,771; Lithuania, $4,414,861; Letvia, $2,538,313; Provincial Governments of Russia, $378,171. Total, $1,152,328,305.

To Nov. 5 the Liquidation Commission had made credit sales of surplus property in France and the liberated countries aggregating $550,328,305. Corrected reports received by the department reduced the value of the liquidated contracts.

The value of 22,596 contracts, reported liquidated to Nov. 1, was $2,091,436,000, as compared with $2,128,795,000 reported last week. This was a reduction of $37,000,000 due to corrected reports.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

The first convention of the American Legion, a national organization of ex-soldiers of the world war, was held in Minneapolis in the second week of November. It adjourned on Nov. 12 after selecting Franklin D'Olier of Philadelphia as First National Commander. Resolutions passed as the convention closed included condemnation of strikes of policemen, firemen, or other public employes, and a call for settlement of industrial disputes.

The convention for a time seemed split on the proposal to indorse a specific bonus plan. Representative Royal O. Johnson of Aberdeen, S. D., who served in France, urged the delegates to ask Congress to recognize and relieve the financial disadvantages incurred by persons who made sacrifices to serve their country. Former Senator Luke Lea of Tennessee, Chairman of the Bonus Committee, formally put this resolution before the convention and it was adopted.

A broad variety of subjects, including the Centralia tragedy, industrial unrest, and the National Non-Partisan League, were touched on. Delegates from Northwestern States drew up a resolution assailing the activities of President A. C. Townley of the Non-Partisan League, but it was tabled.

Commander D'Olier issued the following statement soon after his election:

The American Legion has an enormous amount of constructive work before it in the coming year, but the spirit of clear thinking, fair play, and co-operation manifested so wonderfully throughout this convention leaves no doubt in my mind that we shall be able to accomplish during the coming year just as remarkable results for our country as we did in such a comparatively short time in effecting the utter defeat of the enemy.

Every action of the convention was discussed carefully, and in every instance the soundest possible judgment prevailed. There was only one thought of every delegate present, and that was to do what was best for this country of ours, for which only so recently we were willing to give our all.

Declarations placing the legion on record against anti-American propaganda and activities were adopted, and resolutions passed, including:

Demand for the deportation of alien slackers and enemy aliens interned during the war, with selective admission of foreigners.

Authorizing the appointment of a legion committee to spread the teaching of the legion doctrine of "100 per cent. Americanism" among veterans of the war and aliens in this country.

Demanding a "change in the Department of Justice from a passive organization to a militant, active branch, whose findings will be promptly acted upon by the executive authority."

Opposition to organization of societies for relief of civilian populations of Germany, Austria and Hungary unless these societies be authorized by Congress.

NAVAL MINE SWEEPERS

On Oct. 12 it was announced at Plymouth, England, that the units of the American Navy then in British waters were assembling at that port for their journey across the Atlantic, and on Nov. 24 this whole fleet was receiving honors in New York Harbor. These vessels had just completed the gigantic task of sweeping up 21,000 of their mines, which formed a part of the North Sea barrage from the Orkneys to Norway. The barrier was 230 miles long, with an average width of 25 miles, and consisted of 70,000 mines.

The sweeping up of this huge mine field began on May 10 last, and American officers say they completed in one season's work that which it was confidently expected would take two years.

They employed eighty vessels, including thirty-six sweepers, and only four out of the thirty-six sweepers escaped damage through mines exploding near.

One ship sank and Commander King and six men were lost. The commander's devotion to duty was such that the American Navy promptly named a new destroyer after him.

INCREASES IN NAVY PAY

Urging immediate pay increases as necessary to retain present navy officers and men and obtain new ones, Secretary Daniels on Nov. 12 recommended to the House Navy Committee temporary increases aggregating $53,000,000 a year for all officers and men. The proposed new schedule would remain in effect until June 30, 1921.

Mr. Daniels also told the committee that funds allowed naval officers for public and official receptions should be increased.

The following annual increases, with similar advances in the pay of officers of corresponding rank in the Marine Corps, were recommended by Mr. Daniels:

Admirals, Rear Admirals, Vice Admirals, and Captains, $1,000; Commanders, $900; Lieutenant Commanders, $840; Lieutenants, senior grade, $720; Lieutenants, junior grade, $600, and Ensigns and warrant officers, $480. Monthly pay of chief petty officers would be limited to $126, and that of other enlisted men to $40 instead of $32.60.

ARMY TRANSPORT SERVICE

Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of Transportation, declared on Nov. 15 that since the armistice was signed the Army Transportation Service has redelivered to the Shipping Board and to private owners nearly 600 passenger and cargo ships aggregating about 4,000,000 deadweight tons. General Hines said:

The first anniversary of Armistice Day found the National Army returned from overseas and a division of the regular army on watch on the Rhine with scattering caretakers here and there in France, guarding American supplies and equipment yet to be returned to the United States. The Army Transport forces have been withdrawn from Marseilles, Bordeaux, St. Nazaire, La Pallice, and Le Havre. Soon the famous port of Brest will be closed, as Antwerp has been established as the port or base of operations for supplying the Rhine Valley Army during the reconstruction period. The return movement of troops and cargo was no sooner well under way than the transportation service of the War Department, heeding the call of Mr. Hurley and the American merchant marine, began redelivering cargo troop transports to the Shipping Board and American steamship lines.

The prompt redelivery of these steamships has proved a most potent economic transaction for the Government in reducing the enormous cost of war operations as well as a most timely stimulus to the American merchant marine in lifting the enormous congestion of export cargo that had accumulated at American seaports for shipment to all parts of the world. The war tonnage that has been redelivered by the Transportation Service reached a total of 590 ships of 3,911,000 tons deadweight, not including twenty-four battleships of 352,395 displacement tons that were pressed into service as troop carriers, and two troop ships and thirty-one cargo ships which were sunk. * * *

Today, with the emergency functions of the Oversea Transportation Service practically completed, an excellent perspective of these titanic accomplishments may be had. Briefly stated, it picked up 2,100,000 soldiers from the interior of the United States and set them down in every part of Europe and even in Siberia and brought them home. It carried overseas 8,000,000 tons of supplies and distributed same to wherever required for their sustenance. It transported their equipment, armament, ammunition, and all the varied paraphernalia necessary to successfully conduct modern, scientific warfare. Before the ink was dry on the signatures of the German envoys it had started to reverse the operation. It brought the soldier back and deposited him at his own fire-side, so that he might renew his normal existence in the industrial life of the nation with the least possible interruption. It gathered up 700,000 tons of army stores from various corners of Europe and returned same to the United States. It turned the chartered tonnage back to the merchant marine with all practicable speed.

It was stated in Washington, Nov. 1, that with the completion of the present construction program of the Shipping Board there would be under the American flag 1,731 oil-burning steamers of an aggregate of nearly 10,000,000 dead-weight tons. Fuel stations are now being established along the trade routes in the Atlantic and Pacific so that the American ships will be able to make a complete circuit of the world without taking fuel at other than American-owned stations.

A total of 486 oil-burning ships is now in the Government merchant fleet, while sixty-seven others have been sold to Americans or reconveyed to their American owners. In addition 636 oil-burning vessels are under construction.

BILL TO RETURN RAILROADS

By a vote of 203 to 159 the House on Nov. 17 passed finally the Esch bill to regulate the railroads after their release by the Government. This action was taken after Representative Claude Kitchin, former Democratic floor leader, had denounced the provision the railway unions demanded for the adjustment of wage disputes, and after Representative Mondell, Republican leader, had characterized the measure as a whole as "strong, sane, and sensible."

Representative Kitchin's denunciation of the so-called Anderson amendment, dealing with the adjustment of labor disputes, was made in a five-minute speech before the bill was reported from committee. This section continues in effect the present machinery of the railroads and presents no way to force a dispute before the adjustment boards unless action is initiated by the railway unions. There is nothing in the amendment which attempts to prevent strikes or gives authority to the board to enforce its decision.

Representative Mondell said that at no time in twenty years had the House so faithfully considered an important measure as in this instance. "While I am not in favor of some parts of the bill," he said, "yet I believe that it, as a whole, is strong, sane, and sensible, and represents the view of the majority."

The House, when the bill was reported from committee, where earlier important sections enlarging the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission had been adopted, declined, by a vote of 200 to 165, to recommit it, and rejected a motion to strike out the Anderson amendment by a vote of 253 to 112. The latter vote represented a stronger sentiment for the labor adjustment section than when it was adopted originally by the committee.

The bill passed finally also enlarges the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission is empowered to pass upon the issue of stocks and bonds by railroads and to decide in certain emergencies when joint terminal and other facilities shall be used by the carriers.

INCREASING RAILWAY WAGES

Director General Hines on Nov. 15 submitted to representatives of the four railway brotherhoods an increased wage scale amounting approximately to $3,000,000 a month, or $36,000,000 a year. The increase would affect trainmen, firemen, engineers, and conductors, but more particularly those employed in the slow freight train service. In making the awards the Railroad Administration set forth these facts:

The Railroad Administration in discharging its responsibility to make readjustments necessary to avoid unjust inequalities in the compensation of different classes of railroad employes has proposed to the four brotherhoods representing the train and enginemen that, in order to give an additional measure of compensation to the train service employes in the slow freight service, time and one-half will be paid for time required to make runs in excess of what would be required if an average speed of 12½ miles per hour were maintained, provided, however, that all arbitraries and special allowances now paid in various forms of freight train service are entirely eliminated for the railroads as a whole.

In discharging the responsibility which unavoidably rested upon the Railroad Administration consideration has been given to the claim that various classes of train and engine employes are relatively underpaid. In considering these claims the conclusion has been reached that the train service employes in freight train service, who are habitually averaging less than twelve and a half miles per hour, do not get an opportunity to earn a reasonable monthly wage, as compared with employes in fast freight service or employes in passenger train service, without working abnormally long hours, frequently amounting to from 275 to 300 hours or more per month, and the above method has been decided to be the best way in which to make a fair equalization of this condition.

Compromise terms with the Track Workers' Brotherhood were accepted on Nov. 24, and representatives of the other unions were in session, with every prospect of an early adjustment of remaining differences.

FOOD CONTROL REVIVED

President Wilson in a proclamation of Nov. 21 placed the Government again in control of the nation's food supply by transferring the authority of the Food Administration to Attorney General Palmer. The revival of the wartime functions of Administrator Hoover resulted directly from the Government's efforts to avert a famine in sugar, but the powers delegated to the head of the Department of Justice will be used also to help put down the ever-mounting cost of living.

Mr. Palmer's staff began immediately to build up a sugar-distributing system which should allocate all sugar stocks in the country. It aimed to provide an equitable system of distributing supplies and to defeat any concentration or hoarding. Plans tentatively decided on provide for increasing the price of all sugar except the Louisiana crop, for which a price of 17 cents already had been fixed, to 12 cents a pound wholesale.

Japan Leads in Birth Rate

DURING 1917 the population of Japan, including the colonial possessions, registered a net increase from births of 612,774. The total number of recorded births for that year is 1,843,023 and the deaths 1,230,279. The net increase by sexes is: Males, 315,643; females, 297,101. Official reports show an increased marriage rate, a lower death rate, and a decrease in divorces.

A comparison with the pre-war vital statistics issued by the respective European Governments shows that the 1917 birth rate in Japan was exceeded by only Rumania and Hungary in 1914.

During 1917 there were 545,478 recorded marriages between Japanese subjects, an increase over 1916 of 14,723. These marriages were at the rate of 7.99 per 1,000 of population, a rate exceeded in 1914 in Rumania, 8.5, and England and Wales, 8.0. In other European countries in 1914, the last year for which statistics are available, the marriage rate per 1,000 stood: Germany, 7.7; Scotland, 7.4; Hungary, 7.2; Italy, 7.1; Denmark, 6.9; Austria and the Netherlands, 6.7; Spain and Norway, 6.5; Finland and Sweden, 5.8; Ireland, 5.4, and France, 5.1.

Divorce in Japan is a very simple process, involving mainly the decision of one or the other party to the marriage to cancel it, with the sanction of the family council, but despite this there was a decrease of 4,452 in the year's divorces.

The Coal Miners' Strike

Hundreds of Thousands Walk Out Despite Injunction, Threatening a Catastrophe to Industries

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 23, 1919]

THE greatest strike in the history of the coal industry of the United States began on Nov. 1, 1919, when a call for the walkout of 600,000 miners in the bituminous coal fields, issued by the leaders of the United Mine Workers of America, went partly into effect. The demands of the miners included a six-hour day, a five-day week, and a 60 per cent. increase in wages, the most drastic proposal ever made by workmen in the history of American trade unionism, involving, if complied with, an extra tax upon industrial and domestic America of more than one billion dollars annually.

These terms had been unconditionally rejected by the mine operators, who called on the miners to live up to their existing contracts. The miners replied that on the date set the workers of their organization would begin the projected strike. All propositions submitted by Secretary of Labor Wilson in an earnest effort to effect an agreement were rejected. Secretary Wilson then appealed to the President to intervene in a situation which threatened consequences of the gravest concern to the whole nation. From his sickbed President Wilson dictated a letter, in which he proposed: (1) That the representatives of the miners and operators resume negotiations in an effort to reach a peaceful settlement. (2) That, if the miners and operators failed to agree, the matters in dispute be referred to a board of arbitration. (3) That pending the decision of the board the strike be called off, and the operation of the mines be continued without interruption.

Secretary Wilson at once called representatives of the miners and operators together, and communicated to them the President's letter. The President's proposals were accepted by the operators, but were rejected by the miners after failure to obtain guarantees that the suggested conferences would insure the fulfillment of the miners' demands. Secretary Wilson, finding himself unable to shake their decision, adjourned the meeting sine die.

THE PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT

The President, however, after receiving information of the miners' unpromising attitude, on the following day (Oct. 25) issued a statement in which he denounced the proposed strike as not only unjustifiable, but unlawful, and requested the officers and members of the coal unions to recall the strike order, so that production might not be interrupted, and again to seek to arbitrate their differences. He denounced the strike as an attack upon the rights of society and the welfare of the country, and declared that the law would be enforced. The President's statement was as follows:

White House, Washington, Oct. 25, 1919.

On Sept. 23, 1919, the convention of the United Mine Workers of America at Cleveland, Ohio, adopted a proposal declaring that all contracts in the bituminous field shall be declared as having automatically expired Nov. 1, 1919, and making various demands, including a 60 per cent. increase in wages and the adoption of a six-hour workday and a five-day week, and providing that, in the event a satisfactory wage agreement should not be secured for the central competitive field before Nov. 1, 1919, the national officials should be authorized and instructed to call a general strike of all bituminous miners and mine workers throughout the United States, effective Nov. 1, 1919.

Pursuant to these instructions, the officers of the organization have issued a call to make the strike effective Nov. 1. This is one of the gravest steps ever proposed in this country, affecting the economic welfare and the domestic comfort and health of the people. It is proposed to abrogate an agreement as to wages which was made with the sanction of the United States Fuel Administration and which was to run during the continuance of the war, but not beyond April 1, 1920.

This strike is proposed at a time when the Government is making the most earnest effort to reduce the cost of living and has appealed with success to other classes of workers to postpone similar disputes until a reasonable opportunity has been afforded for dealing with the cost of living. It is recognized that the strike would practically shut off the country's supply of its principal fuel at a time when interference with that supply is calculated to create a disastrous fuel famine. All interests would be affected alike by a strike of this character, and its victims would be not the rich only, but the poor and the needy as well, those least able to provide in advance a fuel supply for domestic use. It would involve the shutting down of countless industries and the throwing out of employment of a large part of the workers of the country. It would involve stopping the operation of railroads, electric light and gas plants, street railway lines and other public utilities, and the shipping to and from this country, thus preventing our giving aid to the allied countries with supplies which they so seriously need.

The country is confronted with this prospect at a time when the war itself is still a fact, when the world is still in suspense as to negotiations for peace, when our troops are still being transported, and when their means of transport is in urgent need of fuel.

From whatever angle the subject may be viewed it is apparent that such a strike in such circumstances would be the most far-reaching plan ever presented in this country to limit the facilities of production and distribution of a necessity of life and thus indirectly to restrict the production and distribution of all the necessities of life. A strike under these circumstances is not only unjustifiable, it is unlawful.

The action proposed has apparently been taken without any vote upon the specific proposition by the individual members of the United Mine Workers of America throughout the United States, an almost unprecedented proceeding. I cannot believe that any right of any American worker needs for its protection the taking of this extraordinary step, and I am convinced that, when the time and manner are considered, it constitutes a fundamental attack, which is wrong both morally and legally, upon the rights of society and upon the welfare of our country. I feel convinced that individual members of the United Mine Workers would not vote, upon full consideration, in favor of such a strike under these conditions.

When a movement reaches the point where it appears to involve practically the entire productive capacity of the country with respect to one of the most vital necessities of daily domestic and industrial life, and when the movement is asserted in the circumstances I have stated and at a time and in a manner calculated to involve the maximum of danger to the public welfare in this critical hour of our country's life, the public interest becomes the paramount consideration.

In these circumstances I solemnly request both the national and the local officers and also the individual members of the United Mine Workers of America to recall all orders looking to a strike on Nov. 1, and to take whatever steps may be necessary to prevent any stoppage of work.

It is time for plain speaking. These matters with which we now deal touch not only the welfare of a class, but vitally concern the well-being, the comfort, and the very life of all the people. I feel it my duty in the public interest to declare that any attempt to carry out the purposes of this strike and thus to paralyze the industry of the country, with the consequent suffering and distress of all our people, must be considered a grave moral and legal wrong against the Government and the people of the United States. I can do nothing less than to say that the law will be enforced, and means will be found to protect the interests of the nation in any emergency that may arise out of this unhappy business.

I express no opinion on the merits of the controversy. I have already suggested a plan by which a settlement may be reached, and I hold myself in readiness at the request of either or both sides to appoint at once a tribunal to investigate all the facts with a view to aiding in the earliest possible orderly settlement of the question at issue between the coal operators and the coal miners, to the end that the just rights, not only of those interested but also of the general public, may be fully protected.

MINERS DEFIANT

John F. Lewis, Acting President of the United Mine Workers of America, replying on Oct. 26 to the President's statement, declared that the status quo still obtained. Meanwhile the Federal Government discussed the taking of Governmental action under the Lever food control law, and resolutions were offered in both houses of Congress condemning the miners' attitude and declaring that any action which the Government might take to prevent the strike would be supported by Congress. On the following day President Lewis, just before his departure for Indianapolis to take active charge of the threatened strike, declared that the strike order was still in effect, and that the 600,000 miners would walk out to a man unless the operators made concessions.

By telegraph the same night Lewis invited twenty-five district Presidents of unions in coal-producing States and members of the Miners' Scale Committee to meet with the International Board, to discuss the President's statement, which Lewis characterized as "astounding," "without precedent" and "without warrant of law." Had President Wilson not upheld the decision of Dr. H. A. Garfield, as United States Fuel Administrator, a year before, said Lewis, in refusing an advance of wages, the present crisis would never have occurred.

Judge Joseph Buffington, senior Judge of the United States Circuit Court, through which thousands of foreign-born miners had been naturalized in Pennsylvania, on Oct. 27 issued an appeal to the miners to uphold the President. This appeal was sent to all foreign-language newspapers in the United States, and distributed in all communities where foreign-born citizens resided. On the following day many miners in the Eastern Ohio bituminous fields announced that if the Government took over the operation of the soft-coal mines they were ready to continue work under adequate military protection.

THE GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE

Meanwhile Attorney General Palmer declared that the strike was a challenge to the law, that the nation's life was attacked, that the mines would be protected by the Government, and that the Department of Justice was preparing to take vigorous steps against all who conspired to restrict the supply or distribution of the nation's fuel supply. All the resources of the Government would be used, said Attorney General Palmer, to prevent the national disaster involved by the threatened strike.

The miners themselves on Oct. 29, after a meeting of the union officials, issued a statement in which they said that "a canvass of the entire situation showed that a strike of bituminous miners could not be avoided," and placed the blame for the strike upon the operators. The dissatisfaction of the miners for the last two years with the pay they were receiving was set forth; they were determined to discontinue the operation of the mines unless a new agreement should be signed.

PREPARATIONS FOR STRIKE

The operators held a meeting in Cleveland on Oct. 30 to consider problems arising from the expected strike. No hope of averting it was entertained. The Southwest Coal Operators, however, agreed to a proposal made by Governor Allen to negotiate a new contract and wage scale for the Kansas district, independent of other districts, on condition that the men remain at work, while Governor Cornwall of West Virginia, after the receipt of definite warnings of threatened disorders, issued a proclamation saying that any miners engaging in an armed uprising and invasion of any parts of the State would be treated as insurrectionists. The situation in Indianapolis was so threatening that the citizens asked the Governor's permission to arm themselves for their own protection.

The Federal Government, meanwhile, took measures to insure the protection of all workers by the armed forces of the United States, and the re-establishment of the old maximum coal prices of the Fuel Administration was approved by the President. On the same date the Senate, after four hours' debate, and with but one dissenting vote—that of Senator Fall—voted to assure the President of the support of Congress in maintaining order during the "present industrial emergency." This Senate resolution of support was adopted by the House on Oct. 31 without a dissenting vote.

President Lewis sent a message to Secretary Wilson at this time in which he denounced President Wilson and the Cabinet as the allies of "sinister financial interests." This communication was sent as a telegram in response to a previous telegram sent by Secretary Wilson, which was read before the strike executive council of the union on the day before, but which Lewis declined to make public. The labor reply, which was approved by the Executive Council, declared that the President's statement had "done more to prevent a satisfactory settlement than any other element which has entered into the situation." The reply said further:

The President of the United States is the servant, and not the master, of the Constitution. Yet his statement of Oct. 25 threatens the mine workers with a sanctified peonage, demands that they perform involuntary service, proclaims a refusal to work to be a crime when no such crime exists, nor can such a crime be defined under the Constitution.

JUDGE ANDERSON'S INJUNCTION

The next important development came on Oct. 31, when Judge Albert Anderson of the Federal District Court at Indianapolis issued a temporary injunction restraining John L. Lewis and other officials of the United Mine Workers of America from taking any further steps in directing the coal strike called for the following day. Attorney General Palmer at the same time declared that the United States, exercising its authority through the Department of Justice, was prepared to use every power of the Federal Government in compelling obedience to the mandate of the court.

The granting of this injunction came as a shock to the labor leaders, though the taking of such an action had been more or less anticipated. Soon after the news reached Washington, Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, with other leaders, hurried to the Department of Justice to confer with Attorney General Palmer. The conference was long, and the leaders bitterly protested against the action taken by the Government. On their return to the American Federation of Labor Building, they issued a joint statement, in which they asserted that the injunction would result in the creation of "new and disturbing issues," and adding that these "may not be confined solely to the miners."

LABOR LEADERS' STATEMENT

The text of this statement is given herewith:

Throughout the period of the war and during the nation's time of stress the miners of America labored patiently, patriotically, and arduously in order that the principles of freedom and democracy might triumph over the forces of arbitrary authority, dictatorship, and despotism.

When armed hostilities ceased last November the miners found themselves in the paradoxical position where their intensive labors were being used to further enrich the owners of coal mines and merchants dealing in coal by the immediate reduction of the mining of the coal. Of course the mine owners readily conceived than an overabundance of mined coal would seriously disturb the high prices of coal and endanger their large margin of profits.

On the other hand, the miners found that with the constantly rising cost of necessities of life and with their income reduced over 50 per cent. because of idleness they had reached the limit of human endurance.

Orderly and improved processes were invoked to negotiate a new understanding with the mine owners, and which would enable the miners to work at least five days during each week throughout the entire year and allow them a wage sufficient to enable them to live in decency and free from any of the pressing uncertainties of life.

In attempting to negotiate this new understanding and relation the miners found that their plea for continuous employment would destroy the mine owners' arrangement to curtail the mining of coal so as to continue exploiting the public with high and exorbitant prices.

The mine owners very clearly met the issue by appearing willing and anxious to negotiate, but only if the miners would first throw aside the only power at their command to gain a respectful hearing and fair consideration—the decision to strike whenever it was demonstrated fair dealings did not prevail.

We are now faced with a coal strike of vast magnitude. The Government now proposes to intervene because of a possible coal shortage. Apparently the Government is not concerned with the manipulation by the mine owners which has made for present coal shortage and undue unemployment of the miners for the past eleven months. Instead of dealing with those responsible for this grave menace to the public welfare it now proposes to punish those who by force of circumstances have been the victims of the coal barons' exploitations. The miners are now told the war is not over and that all war legislation is still in force, and if reports received here are correct the Government intends to apply existing war measures, not against the owners of the coal mines, but against the coal miners. The Government has taken steps to enforce war measures by an injunction and it has restrained the officials of the United Mine Workers from counseling, aiding, or in any way assisting the members of this organization for relief against grievous conditions of life and employment.

It is almost inconceivable that a Government which is proud of its participation in a great war to liberate suppressed peoples should now undertake to suppress the legitimate aims, hopes, and aspirations of a group of its own people. It is still more strange that a nation which may justly be proud of its Abraham Lincoln should now reverse the application of the great truth he enunciated when he said that as between capital and labor, labor should receive first and foremost consideration.

The injunction against the United Mine Workers bodes for ill. An injunction of this nature will not prevent the strike, it will not fill the empty stomachs of the miners, it may restrain sane leadership, but will give added strength to unwise counsel and increase bitterness and friction.

This injunction can only result in creating new and more disturbing issues which may not be confined solely to the miners. These views were presented to Attorney General Palmer in a conference this afternoon, lasting nearly two hours, by President Gompers, Secretary Morrison, and Vice President Woll of the American Federation of Labor.

MINERS QUIT WORK

At midnight in the last day of October a large proportion of the bituminous coal miners quit work, despite the fact that their leaders had been silenced and prohibited from further activity in promoting the strike. Many of the workers went out at the end of their day's work. Shortly after being served with the injunction, President Lewis had issued the following comment:

I regard the issuance of this injunction as the most sweeping abrogation of the rights of citizens guaranteed under the Constitution and defined by statutory law that has ever been issued by any Federal court.

This instrument will not avert the strike by bituminous mine workers and will not settle the strike after it occurs. The injunction only complicates to a further degree the problems involved in an adjustment of the controversy.

Mr. Lewis had been busy all day sending telegrams to local unions and preparing to carry the strike into effect, but ceased his activities after receiving the injunction. The temporary restraining order had been issued on a petition filed in behalf of the United States Government against Frank J. Hayes, President of the mine workers, and eighty-three other national and district officers by the Assistant Attorney General. The hearing of the case was set for Saturday, Nov. 8. The Federal authorities asked that at the final hearing the strike order be recalled. Meanwhile the operators declared that they would keep the Central Field mines open.

FIRST DAY OF STRIKE

On Nov. 1, the first day of the strike, the union leaders declared that some 394,600 miners had gone out. The reports showed also that the soft-coal workers in some cases were ignoring the injunction. Mines in Western and Central States, Ohio, and Maryland, had been paralyzed. The non-union miners, representing the product of 175,000,000 tons of coal, continued work, and the operators asserted that 66 per cent. of Pennsylvania's and all West Virginia's mines were in operation.

Meanwhile the Government's measures to insure the workers protection began to operate; additional troops were moved to West Virginia, Wyoming, Utah, and New Mexico. The union leaders remained quiet at their headquarters at Indianapolis, though it was stated that counsel for the unions were completing plans to resist the issuance of a permanent injunction. At this time the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen issued a statement of sympathy. The Attorney General instructed the Federal Attorneys to give notice immediately of any violation of the injunction. All strikers were being watched. Measures were taken also to prevent profiteering in coal, and the Railway Administration perfected plans for the transportation and distribution of the coal supplies already at hand.

On Nov. 3 the situation remained essentially the same, though Washington was more hopeful after a conference held by Secretary Wilson with members of the Government Division of Labor for Strike Conciliation. At this time there were signs of a break in the labor ranks, especially perceptible in West Virginia, where fifteen union mines in the northern fields resumed operations. The labor union members were already looking to Washington in the expectation of a call to confer. A definite public pronouncement against the injunction was issued by Samuel Gompers on Nov. 4 in Washington. He said in part:

If the injunction were vacated, and the Department of Labor invited the operators and the representatives of the United Mine Workers to a further conference, I have an abiding faith that a mutually honorable adjustment can be negotiated and effected whereby the coal strike can be brought to an end.

FIGHTING THE INJUNCTION

This proposal was heartily indorsed by President Lewis, who stated that the miners would be willing to resume negotiations with the operators immediately if the injunction were vacated. Mr. Lewis declared that the machinery of joint bargaining was still intact, and could be brought quickly into operation. Meantime Attorney General Palmer declared that the Government would accept no compromise and would continue all efforts to make the temporary injunction permanent.

The officials of the United Mine Workers of America made their first active move on Nov. 6 by filing in the Federal Court at Indianapolis a motion to dissolve Judge Anderson's restraining order. This motion held that the Government had no right to interfere in the controversy between the miners and operators, and declared that it was without "equity and clean hands" in the prosecution of the suit. It further contended that the Fuel Administration was dissolved at the end of the war, and that it should not have been re-established. It also charged that the Government's action had brought about confusion and disorder, and that its real purpose in the suit was to extricate the Administration from the "unfortunate state of disorder in which it had involved itself."

At this time reports were coming in that coal production was gaining in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, New Mexico, Alabama, Wyoming and Colorado. To conserve available coal supplies, all oceangoing steamships under foreign flags were refused bunker coal.

THE INJUNCTION UPHELD

After three separate conferences with the Attorney General on Nov. 7 Mr. Gompers submitted a proposal to settle the strike. The injunction case, however, was not deferred, and on Nov. 8 Judge Anderson ruled that the bituminous coal strike was a defiance of the Fuel Control act, almost equivalent to rebellion, refused to listen to the miners' representatives who sought to demonstrate the miners' right to strike, and issued an order to the United Mine Workers to recall the strike order before Nov. 11.

The counsel for the miners stated after the hearing that President Lewis would obey the mandate, but declined to speak for the other leaders. Gompers and other labor chiefs were visibly surprised and disconcerted by the failure of their case at Indianapolis, and implied that officials of the Federation of Labor might be called to conference preparatory to the making of an appeal to President Wilson. Later, however, they expressed defiance, and on Nov. 9 the Executive Committee of the Federation of Labor, at a meeting held in Washington, issued a statement denouncing the Government's injunction against the coal strike as "so autocratic as to stagger the human mind," pledging the support of the federation to the continuance of the strike, and calling on all organized labor in the country to aid the strikers, and to support "the men engaged in this momentous struggle."

In reply Attorney General Palmer, with the full approval of the President, issued a statement which reiterated the charge that the strike was a violation of the laws of the United States, and the Government's determination to enforce its own interpretation. The United States, this statement said, refused to "surrender to the dictation of any group, and it proposes to assert its power to protect itself and the people." Mr. Gompers made rebuttal in a speech delivered at a dinner given to the delegates of the International Labor Conference on Nov. 10, in which he declared that President Wilson did not fully understand the strike situation, and maintained the workers' right to obtain freedom and justice, "which must prevail over any temporary administration."

AN ALL-NIGHT SESSION

The momentous question of whether the miners would comply with Judge Anderson's mandate to rescind the strike call was thrashed out in an exhaustive discussion of the United Mine Workers' Executive Committee, which met at Indianapolis on Nov. 11. This conference was in session all day and far into the night. Fierce debate characterized the session, with the radical element very much in evidence, and lasted all through the night. Many fell asleep in their chairs after seventeen hours of deliberation. No restriction was placed on the length or the number of speeches. It was a bitter fight to the end between the counsels of the reckless and the sane, between defiance and obedience to the order of the court, and the conservatives ultimately won the hard-fought battle. At 4:10 o'clock in the morning the decision to rescind the strike order was reached, and the exhausted members of the committee adjourned.

In accordance with this decision, the strike order was recalled. The labor leaders, however, denounced the injunction and announced their intention of appealing the case to the highest tribunal. The statement issued subsequently said in part:

When the officials of the United Mine Workers of America announced that they would comply with the order of the United States Court and obey its mandate they simply followed the union's historic policy of patriotic devotion to the Government and American ideals and institutions. The United Mine Workers will not fight the Government. It is their Government just as it is the Government of every other citizen. It is their Government just as it is the Government of the coal operators.

Immediately following the recall of the strike order, the Federal Government took prompt action to bring together the coal miners and operators for a settlement of their differences. After a meeting of the Cabinet, Secretary of Labor Wilson called both sides to the controversy to meet at Washington on Friday, Nov. 14. Meanwhile the recall of the strike order was issued. Seven mines were reopened in West Virginia, but in many fields the miners awaited the receipt of the official notification before returning to the collieries, and the coal situation grew steadily worse as day by day went by and the operators and miners failed to reach an agreement.

JOINT CONFERENCE BEGINS

On Nov. 14 the joint conference of the miners and operators began in Washington. A conciliatory attitude was developed by the opening address of Secretary Wilson, who warned both the miners and the operators that they must drop their uncompromising attitude, and urged compromise for the sake of the public, which would have to bear the burden of any increase in coal prices. The demands made by the miners for a six-hour day and a five-day week, and for a 60 per cent. increase in wages, the Secretary told the miners plainly, were impossible. President Lewis spoke in reply. Both the operators and the miners admitted that the conference should not come to a close without an agreement.

At the session of Nov. 15 an agreement was reached that the immediate negotiations should be restricted to the central competitive district, covering the great coal fields of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Western Pennsylvania. This restriction, which was in accordance with a custom that had been followed for many years in strike negotiations, was accepted by the miners after refusal by the operators to discuss a nation-wide contract. The miners then presented a draft of their original demands, which Secretary Wilson had declared "impossible." At the close of the session the operators declared that a 60 per cent. increase in wages could not be granted, and promised to submit a draft of counterproposals. No action, however, was taken, and on Nov. 18 the miners declared that discussion was being held up by the secret meetings of the operators, who apparently could not agree among themselves.

DR. GARFIELD'S ACTION

At this point Dr. Garfield, clothed with all his wartime powers as Fuel Administrator, and acting by direct authority from the President's Cabinet, called on Nov. 19 a joint meeting of the conflicting parties, on whom he served formal notice that mining operations on a large scale must be resumed, and that coal must be produced at a reasonable price. As ground for the urgency of agreement, the situation in the coal fields generally was pointed out. Dr. Garfield cited the drastic action of the State Governments of North Dakota and Kansas in taking over the coal pits to operate them under State authority. (Later a court decision handed back the North Dakota mines to the operators.) He also cited the reports from the Central Competitive Fields, embracing the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Western Pennsylvania, strongholds of the United Mine Workers of America, which showed all mines shut down and not enough coal coming from non-union plants in other States to meet the normal demand by several million tons.

The operators and miners met in a committee of sixteen; no definite proposals were offered by the former, but both sides were hopeful after the session. One point discussed was whether the operators' taxes should be included in the price to the public, which the Government had disputed. President Lewis charged the operators with receiving 125 per cent. more profit for coal in 1919 than in 1914, while the miners' wages showed an increase of only a little more than 37 per cent., as against an increase of 110 per cent. in the cost of living.

Discussion was resumed on Nov. 20, and ended in a deadlock. The operators made a proposal of an increase of 15 cents per ton to pick and machine miners, a 20 per cent. increase for day labor, and the same working hours that had previously obtained. They also proposed that the new contract should extend to March 31, 1922, thus obviating the danger of another strike in the Fall, the Mine Workers' Association to be responsible for the fulfillment of the contract, and a penalty clause for unauthorized strikes to be included in the contract. The representatives of the miners rejected these counterproposals unconditionally as "preposterous and ridiculous," while the operators declared that they represented the utmost concessions which could be made.

The committee recommended the creation of a National Industrial Board with powers of compulsory investigation, mediation, and recommendation. It recommended also an Americanization bill to be passed by Congress for the education of foreigners in the principles of our Government; also that workmen in industrial districts be provided with their own homes, that no one be naturalized who is unable to speak the English language, and that an effective law be passed to deal with anarchists and revolutionists.

NEARING A COMPROMISE

With the threat of Governmental intervention hanging over their heads, the operators and miners on Nov. 21 struggled for several hours to reach an agreement. After four hours of fruitless argument Secretary of Labor Wilson was called in at 6 o'clock in the evening, and a stormy session followed for two hours longer, with the result that the miners abandoned their demand for a thirty-hour week; no basis for settlement, however, was reached. On the following day the uncompromising attitude of the operators continued. Secretary Wilson's proposal of a 31 per cent. increase of wages was rejected, and the operators demanded that the Fuel Administration assume responsibility for the added burden on the public involved in the previous offer of a 15-cent increase and 20 per cent. to day labor before they again submitted it. The workers on their part accepted the Secretary's proposal, but held out for a seven-hour day.

At this juncture the operators turned to the Government for a solution, asking the President's Cabinet for instructions as to whether or not they must accept Secretary Wilson's proposal. On Nov. 23 Dr. Garfield, Director General of Railways Hines, and Attorney General Palmer conferred and an early decision was expected.

Other Phases of Labor Unrest

The Steel Strike Fails

THE strike in the iron and steel industries of the United States proved a failure. The leaders themselves admitted the fact on Nov. 23, 1919. When the call had been issued Sept. 22, 162,474 workmen out of 228,430 in the Pittsburgh district alone went out or were forced out; of the 162,474, over 60 per cent., or 109,455, were back at work Nov. 23, and the plants were running about 100 per cent. full on Nov. 25. In the Wheeling district, which held out longest, the strikers voted to return to work. It was estimated in the last week in November that the steel industry was working over 90 per cent., and could have been operating on a 100 per cent. basis but for the coal strike. The payroll loss to the strikers in the Pittsburgh district alone had been $29,604,064. The Senate Committee which investigated the strike said in its report on Nov. 8:

The committee is of the opinion that the American Federation of Labor has made a serious mistake, and has lost much favorable public opinion which otherwise they would possess, by permitting the leadership of this strike movement to pass into the hands of some who heretofore have entertained most radical and dangerous doctrines. If labor is to retain the confidence of that large element of our population which affiliates neither with labor organizations nor capital, it must keep men who entertain and formulate un-American doctrines out of its ranks and join with the employers of labor in eliminating this element from the industrial life of our nation.

Unquestionably the United States Steel Corporation has had the support of a larger and of a wider circle in the country during the strike because of the character of some of the strike leadership. Labor organizations should not place the workman in the position of any sympathy with un-American doctrines or make them followers of any such leadership. Such practice will result in defeating the accomplishment of their demands.

The Senate committee severely criticised William Z. Foster, Secretary to the committee which managed the strike, for his radical sentiments, and held that he had hurt the cause he was trying to assist. The committee censured other strike leaders, among them President Gompers of the Federation of Labor, for their failure to postpone the strike when called upon to do so by the President. It also censured Judge Gary for not heeding the request of the President to confer with Gompers and other union labor officials in an effort to prevent the walk-out.

Concerning hours of labor and collective bargaining, the committee found that the laborers in the steel mills had a just complaint relative to the long hours of service on the part of some of them and the right to have that complaint heard by the company, and that they had the right to have the representatives of their own choosing present grievances to the employers.

The eight-hour day [says the report] is involved in the solution of this question. These non-English-speaking aliens must be Americanized and must learn our language, so the question of a reasonable working day is involved in the question of Americanization. Men cannot work ten and twelve hours per day and attend classes at night school.

It is the general consensus of opinion of the best economic writers and thinkers that the establishment of eight-hour-day systems does not diminish production. Nor do we think the claim made that an eight-hour day is impossible because the workmen cannot be secured for three shifts is tenable. An eight-hour day with a living wage that will enable men to support their families and bring up their children according to the standards of American life ought to be a cardinal part of our industrial policy, and the sooner the principle is recognized the better it will be for the entire country.

The public also has an interest in the problem of an eight-hour day. Fatigue in humankind is a breeder of unrest and dissatisfaction.

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE SETTLED

The strike of the longshoremen, which almost completely tied up New York Harbor and put on embargo practically on all exports, was ended Nov. 4 by a compromise, the men receding from their extravagant demands; an award of an increase of 22½ per cent. was given them on Nov. 22 by the National Adjustment

Committee of the United States Shipping Board, the rate of wages to run to Oct. 1, 1920; the men receive 80 cents an hour, $1.20 for overtime; they had demanded $1 an hour and $2 for overtime. At one time there were 70,000 men out and 495 ships, aggregating 1,693,700 tons, were tied up in New York Harbor.

The strike in the printing trade in New York growing out of a controversy between the unions was settled Nov. 25 by the printers and pressmen returning to work under orders of their international officers at an increase of $6 a week; they had demanded $14 and refused to arbitrate a demand for a 44-hour week. The strike tied up fifty periodicals, some of which missed their November issues, and many of which were printed in other cities. CURRENT HISTORY MAGAZINE appeared in November by resorting to the rotogravure presses of THE NEW YORK TIMES; two-thirds of the December issue also is etched in rotogravure; the strike ended in time for the first sixty-four pages of this issue to be printed on ordinary rotary presses.

The plea of the Boston police who sought restoration to the positions from which they were removed for striking was denied by the Massachusetts Supreme Court Nov. 7; 600 new policemen had been installed by Nov. 10, and it was expected to have a new force entirely recruited soon thereafter.

Dealing With Anarchist Agitators

Evidence of Worldwide Conspiracy

ACCUMULATING evidence of Bolshevik and anarchist agitation throughout the United States stirred the Government to action in the Autumn of 1919. As early as August the President asked Congress to continue the passport law for a year after the formal proclamation of peace, in view of the receipt of information that many undesirable persons of anarchistic proclivities were seeking to enter the United States from abroad. Toward the end of October, Representative Albert Johnson proposed a bill in the House to fulfill the President's request, and gave new reasons why the passing of this measure was necessary.

Disclosures of radical activities in Gary, Ind., during the steel strike roused public concern; they showed a widespread agitation to overthrow the United States Government. An Americanization bill was reported in the Senate on Oct. 27, which proposed fines and imprisonment for exhibiting a red flag or advocating the Government's overthrow. Further plots were revealed in Cleveland and elsewhere, and fifteen arrests were made in connection with a bomb plot to be carried out next May. The success of Governor Coolidge of Massachusetts in obtaining re-election on the issue of the Boston police strike was taken by the President and others as a good omen in showing the attitude of the general public.

The Lusk Investigating Committee, acting under the New York State Government, raided the Russian People's House in New York City on Nov. 9; taking thirty-five men and two women to Ellis Island for deportation; about 150 other men were subsequently released for lack of evidence. In all some seventy-three Red centres were raided at this time by a force of 700 policemen, and tons of seditious literature were seized. More than 200 persons were to be deported. Some sixty more were seized at Bridgeport. At the same time news came that Brazil was conducting a similar campaign, and on Oct. 31 had sent sixteen anarchists back to Europe.

Examination of the literature seized in New York showed an organized effort to overthrow the Government after the declaring of a general strike, to nationalize all industries, to blow up barracks, to shoot the police, to put an end to religion, and to set free all criminals. On Nov. 10 some 391 alien Reds were under arrest, and deportation measures had been begun in a number of cities to rid the country of violent and dangerous agitators.

A great sensation was roused in the State of Washington on Nov. 11, when an armistice parade of American Legion soldiers at Centralia was fired upon and four of the marchers were killed, two others fatally wounded, and several seriously hurt. The shots were fired by I. W. W. members from their building on one of the main streets. Subsequently a mob surrounded the Centralia jail, succeeded in seizing one of the men arrested for the outrage, and hanged him just outside the city limits. Fifty-one radicals were arrested, their literature was seized, and the Mayor of Seattle issued a warning to all agitators to keep that city "out of their future itineraries." The affair aroused great indignation in Congress, where fifty-two bills against radical agitation were pending. A few days later, on Nov. 16, a pitched battle between the authorities and I. W. W. fugitives occurred.

Another city that entered the struggle against Red propaganda was San Francisco, where the headquarters of the Radical Labor Party were raided, wrecked, and burned by former service men. Raids were also conducted in Washington and Oregon cities, and strong military measures were taken in West Virginia in connection with the coal strike.

Meanwhile bills were offered in Congress transferring from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice the enforcement of all existing deportation laws. Disclosures by Government agents of Bolshevik activities in Mexico were made on Nov. 14. Considerable distribution of Red propaganda in the United States via Mexico had been carried on by Bolsheviki whom the "ultra-modern" features of the Mexican Constitution had attracted. Attorney General Palmer on Nov. 15 asked the United States for a sedition act to apply against the Red agitators, revealing the work of the Union of Russians and the existence of 472 publications in various languages preaching the overthrow of the Government.

On Nov. 19 a New York Grand Jury began its investigation of the anarchist movement. Many subpoenas were issued, and Ludwig C. A. K. Martens, the unrecognized "Ambassador" of the Russian Soviet Republic in the United States, was summoned as a witness in spite of his protests on the ground of diplomatic immunity. Disclosure of the raising of a sum of $68,000 by the Reds in New York, and the condemning to death of three prominent officials of the department active in the suppression of seditious activities, was made on Nov. 22. At this time Byron S. Uhl, acting Commissioner of Immigration, reported that many alien anarchists sent to New York for deportation last Spring from the Northwest and Middle West had been released in this community, among them men implicated in a plot against the President; Commissioner Uhl criticised the Labor Department for the release of these men.

In Reading, Penn., on Nov. 23, a Debs amnesty meeting scheduled to be held in the Socialist-Labor Lyceum was called off by the Mayor after the gathering of a crowd of 5,000 men, mostly service men, who threatened violence if the meeting was held. An afternoon parade of the radicals had similarly been suppressed.

International Labor Conference

Steps Toward Industrial Peace

THE International Labor Conference provided for in the Treaty of Versailles opened its first session in Washington on Oct. 29, 1919. The first move of the conference was to take steps to obtain the virtual participation of the United States in its sessions, although Congress had decided against the appointment of delegates prior to ratification of the Peace Treaty. On motion of Baron Mayor des Planches, Italian Government delegate, United States employers' and workers' organizations were invited unanimously to send representatives to take part in the deliberations.

While no attempt was made to obtain the appointment of Government delegates, as such action would have been in direct conflict with the decision of Congress, the United States was represented in the conference through Secretary of Labor Wilson, who opened the first session, and continued as permanent Chairman during the major portion of its deliberations. Secretary Wilson said that he would accept the nomination in view of his interpretation that the organization of the conference cannot be completed until the League of Nations is created, and that the United States is charged by the Versailles Treaty with the organization of the conference.

Owing to the lack of time the question of the admission of German and Austrian delegates was not taken up, and probably will be the first item on the program in the next session. Delegates generally expressed agreement that the former enemy powers should be admitted without delay.

The report of the Organization Committee, submitted by Arthur Fontaine, Chairman, and provisionally adopted by the conference, outlined in detail the development of the international labor organization, and submitted the tentative program and standing orders for the conference sessions.

Interpreting the provision of the Peace Treaty providing that of the twelve members of the governing body of the conference eight should be named by the countries of chief industrial importance, the committee named nine countries, with the understanding that Germany be the last country on the list, and that Spain be dropped. The other seven nations are the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Japan, and Switzerland.

Samuel Gompers was invited to sit as unofficial representative of America. The chief discussion centred on the eight-hour day, favored as a maximum by the conference, except in certain specified industries. Compulsory employment by Governments was also discussed. Mr. Gompers, in a speech, declared that labor in the United States was bent on shortening the forty-eight-hour week.

Recognition of the principle of an eight-hour day and a forty-eight-hour week was contained in a committee report completed on Nov. 22. In almost daily sessions since the conference convened, the committee, including delegates representing Governments, employers, and labor, had arrived at an agreement by a series of compromises. An international agreement with all countries except Japan, India, and other Oriental nations was indorsed. For continuous industries a fifty-six-hour week was conceded. The report also recommended the making up of time lost on Saturdays and holidays by a distribution of extra time throughout the week, even to the extent of permitting nine-hour days until the lost time was accounted for. Maritime labor was not included in the agreement.

On Nov. 23 the conference entered upon its final week of deliberation, the decision having been taken to adjourn on Nov. 29. Besides the elimination of organization matters, election of officers, admission of delegates, and other purely functional acts, the vital problems of the conference were thoroughly discussed and debated by a series of committees, which drew up and agreed upon certain principles, completed by Nov. 23, for submission to the conference during the last week of discussion. The principles agreed upon were as follows:

(1) The adoption of the eight-hour day and forty-eight-hour week principle, with the exception that (a) where less than eight hours are worked on some days of the week the hours not worked may be redistributed on other days, but with no day to exceed nine hours, and (b) that in continuous processes the limit shall not exceed fifty-six hours a week. All overtime to be paid not less than time and a quarter. The labor employed in the devastated regions of France and Belgium is to be considered as employed under special conditions. This agreement cannot, of course, lower any higher standards already established by law or by collective agreement.

(2) The prohibition of work in industries between 10 P. M. and 5 A. M. for all women through the substitution of a modernized and enlarged convention for that adopted at Berne in 1906. The Eastern countries are prepared to adhere to the new convention.

(3) The prohibition of the employment in industry of children under 14 years of age, except that Japan has agreed and India has been asked to raise the limit in their respective countries from 9 to 12 and with 14 as the eventual standard.

(4) A special commission has dealt with the limitation of hours of work in Eastern and other special countries which were fully represented in the commission, and are recommending considerable reductions in the present hours of employment with definite limitations in each case.

(5) Special reports are to be received on unemployment, the employment of women before and after childbirth, and the employment of children at night.

The conference at this date issued an official statement in which it pointed out that its work was not purely a matter of discussion, since each of the forty countries represented had guaranteed to present the decisions of the conference to the competent legislative authority of each nation involved within one year. The widely representative nature of the conference was also emphasized; it included both highly organized industrial States and less developed States of South America, Africa, and Asia. All measures taken would protect the one group from the unfair competition of lower labor standards, and safeguard to States still in process of industrialization a more liberal system.

The organization of the conference into three groups—Governments, employers, and workers—this statement said, had brought great benefit in equalizing discussion and eliminating the possibility of any nation adopting legislation either above or below the standard set by its neighbors. One of the most important achievements of the conference was the selection of the governing body of the International Office, designed to be the permanent labor organization associated with the League of Nations. Considerable difficulty had been experienced in selecting these members, but full agreement was expected before the conference adjourned. Already many problems had been referred to it by the conference for examination.

WORKING WOMEN'S CONGRESS

The International Working Women's Congress at Washington concluded its sessions on Nov. 6. Some fifty delegates had come from foreign countries, eleven nations besides the United States being represented.

Prohibition of night work for men and women in all industries except those which are in continuous operation by reason of public necessity was discussed, delegates from the United States, France, Belgium, Norway, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, and Japan contending that this prohibition should affect men and women alike, while the British, Polish, and Italian delegations held that any international resolution to this effect should prohibit night work for women in all industries, and for men in all save continuous industries.

Discussion of a resolution providing for maternity benefits and protection was continued, the points in question being whether maternity indemnity should be granted to all women or only to women engaged in gainful occupations, and the manner in which the amount of this monetary allowance should be determined, whether it should be an adequate allowance for the mother and child, or whether the minimum wage of a country should be the basis of allotment.

The following resolution concerning the employment of women in "hazardous occupations" was adopted:

1. Prohibition of home work in such occupations.
2. No exception of small factories from the regulations governing the industry.

3. Prohibition of the employment of women in trades which cannot be made healthy for women as potential mothers.

4. An international inquiry to be instituted in order to ascertain the scope of measures which have been adopted in different countries to control dangerous occupations and publication of the result, this with the object of making clearly known which countries fall short of the standards already established in the most advanced.

5. The appointment of a committee of women under the League of Nations, international in personnel, to co-ordinate the work of national research in the dangerous trades with a view to eliminating poisonous substances through the substitution of non-poisonous, and where this is impossible to devise new and efficient methods of protection.

LABOR CONGRESS IN CHICAGO

On Nov. 22 an important Labor Congress held its opening session in Chicago. Some 1,000 delegates were present, representing State labor unions, some affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, delegates from farmers' organizations, co-operative societies, non-partisan and Plumb-plan advocates, and other workers for advanced labor and social legislation. About forty women delegates attended. The opening address of welcome was made by John Fitzpatrick, President of the Chicago Federation of Labor. A new labor party was formed, which adopted a program demanding free speech, free assemblage, and a free press. Max S. Hayes, in a keynote speech, advocated that all sources of production be thrown open to the people. The convention announced its intention not to nominate a national ticket at that time, but to issue a call for a convention to be held next Spring for that purpose.

NEW INDUSTRIAL BOARD

Undeterred by the failure of the Industrial Conference with its three separate groups, President Wilson on Nov. 20 named seventeen men for another conference on the relations of labor and capital. In his letter of invitation he said the "new representatives should have concern that our industries may be conducted with such regard for justice and fair dealing that the workman will feel himself induced to put forth his best efforts, that the employer will have an encouraging profit, and that the public will not suffer at the hands of either class."

No representatives of labor were included in the personnel, nor will there be any representatives of capital as such. Secretary of Labor Wilson heads the list, which includes three former Cabinet officers and two former Federal officials.

Visit of the Prince of Wales

Welcoming a Royal Guest

EDWARD, Prince of Wales, stepped upon the soil of the United States at Rouse's Point, N. Y., on Nov. 10, 1919. When he crossed the Canadian border he was officially greeted by Secretary of State Lansing, Major Gen. John Biddle, representing the army; Rear Admiral Albert T. Niblick, representing the navy; Major Gen. Charlton, representing the British Army; representatives of the British Embassy, and officers belonging to various staffs. He arrived at Washington the following day, where he was met by Vice President Marshall, General Pershing, the British Ambassador, General March, Secretary Daniels, and other prominent American officials. The Prince and his escort were conducted to the Perry Belmont residence, where he was quartered during his stay in Washington. The party was enthusiastically acclaimed as it proceeded through the streets of the city.

A dinner was given the Prince by the Vice President on the evening of the 11th. In proposing the health of the Prince at the dinner Vice President Marshall expressed regret that the President could not be present. After referring to the fact that one year had elapsed since the armistice was signed, Mr. Marshall remarked that he wished to express gratitude that the Allies had stood together in the great war. He continued:

The old order ceased one year ago today. The new order then began. The conflict which started at Runnymede was ended by Haig and Foch and Pershing on the fields of France. The right of men to have a Government controlled by themselves, law-encrowned, is never more to be disputed in this world of ours if those who made the fight to put down military autocracy will make the fight to put down prejudice, suspicion, and doubt among the Allies.

I cannot forget that while we hesitated, while we doubted, while we wondered whether it was any of the part of our national mission to come to the defense of stricken Belgium and devastated France, England put her back to the wall and stood upon the far-flung battle-line of Europe, making freedom and Christian civilization possible even for the American Republic.

I shall not say that it was altogether altruistic. There may have been some element of self-defense in it. But may God give us all, when the time of self-defense comes, the same high altruistic ideals of the British Empire. More and more it seems to me that the fate of the future rests on the faith and confidence of the allied nations for each other.

Proposing a toast to the Prince, the Vice President said:

So, ladies and gentlemen, to the hope that the tie that binds may never be broken by doubt, suspicion, or treachery, that it may bind all of the allied peoples for all the years to come, I propose, as the faith of the American people, long life, health, and prosperity to his Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales.

The response of the Prince was felicitous. He sympathetically referred to President Wilson and the late President Roosevelt, paid a graceful tribute to France, and alluded to his visit to Canada, reverting to the fact that no physical barriers or fortresses stood upon the boundaries between the United States and Canada. He closed by saying:

It seems to me that this example of nations living side by side in a spirit of political tolerance and human liberty is entirely incompatible with the militarism which threatened Europe in the great war, and is thus a living example of the great principles for which we gave our best in that terrible ordeal. * * * As the representative here of the British Empire, and also—I hope I may say—as a friend and great admirer of the American people, I reflect with pride that our common victory was a victory for the ideal to which we, with our institutions, and you with yours have given practical shape upon this continent for a hundred years.

He was tendered a reception at the Library of Congress on the evening of the 12th, which was attended by official Washington. On the following day he was admitted to President Wilson's bed-chamber and spent some time in friendly conversation with him. The same day he visited the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon, where he had a wreath; in a corner of the same vault stood a wreath which Edward VII., the Prince's grandfather, had left there nearly sixty years before. The young man also planted a tree in the grounds.

He left Washington Nov. 14, after three days of busy sightseeing, receptions, and entertainments, for White Sulphur Springs, Va., where he rested for three days, having previously also visited Annapolis.

The Prince arrived in New York Nov. 18 and for three days was the guest of the city, every moment of his time being taken with receptions, sightseeing tours, dinners, and functions of various sorts. The reception tendered him was whole-hearted and sincere, and he won the heart of the people by his engaging manners, his friendly, boyish, outspoken demeanor, and his tactful, democratic bearing. The freedom of the city was conferred upon him by Mayor Hylan. He was taken to all points of interest in and about the city, and wherever he appeared upon the streets or in assemblies he was acclaimed with sincere demonstrations of regard.

He visited the grave of former President Roosevelt, where he deposited a wreath; another day he inspected the Cadets at West Point. He was tendered several notable dinners, at all of which he spoke with modesty, but with tact and judgment; he was a guest at a gala performance of the Metropolitan Opera, attended several theatrical performances, participated in dances in his honor, and visited the Stock Exchange, where he won the plaudits of the men of finance.

During his stay in the city the Prince's quarters were on the British battle cruiser Renown, which was anchored in the Hudson River off Eighty-sixth Street. Here he gave dinners to his hosts, received large delegations of high school students, and in other ways showed his appreciation of the warmth of his welcome. He left New York on the Renown Nov. 22. Cablegrams of appreciation were sent by his father, King George, expressing keen pleasure over the welcome given the Prince; the British press also gave evidence of its extreme satisfaction over the success of the Prince's visit and the cordial manner in which the American people had taken him to their hearts.

The Prohibition Enforcement Law

Passed Over President's Veto

THE National Prohibition Enforcement bill, which was passed by Congress on Oct. 10, 1919, was vetoed by President Wilson on Oct. 27. The veto was based on the ground that the law, as passed, attempted to cover two different things—wartime prohibition, a temporary measure now practically ended, and the prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution, a permanent measure which goes into effect Jan. 16, 1920. The President made it clear that his objection was directed against the phase of the enforcement law applying to wartime prohibition. The bill, he said in his veto message, "has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war, and whose objects have been satisfied by the demobilization of the army and navy."

Two hours after the veto message had reached the House of Representatives that body passed the bill over the President's disapproval by a vote of 176 to 55—twenty-one more than the necessary two-thirds. The Senate followed suit the next day by passing the bill over the veto by a vote of 65 to 20—eight more than the necessary two-thirds.

The law immediately went into effect, and orders were sent out the following day by the Internal Revenue Collector to enforce it rigidly. Saloons in most of the cities of the country were immediately closed, but at many points efforts were made to evade the law, followed immediately by raids by revenue officers and the arrest of the violators, all of whom were either fined or held to court under heavy bonds. Large brewing and liquor interests in various centres took steps to test the validity of the act, and suits were filed in the Federal courts to restrain the Government from enforcing its provisions. The first decision was rendered by United States District Judge Arthur I. Brown at Providence, R. I., on Nov. 12, and a preliminary injunction against its enforcement was issued. The same day Federal Judge Evans, sitting at Louisville, Ky., announced that he would issue a similar injunction on Nov. 13. As soon as the decisions were made, saloons reopened in Louisville and in Providence. Three days later the United States Court of Appeals in Boston issued a stay to the injunction of Judge Brown, and the law was again enforced at Providence.

On Nov. 15 three Federal Judges—Hand, Knox, and Rose—handed down decisions in New York directly in conflict with Judges Brown and Evans, holding that the wartime prohibition was constitutional and that the act was a valid exercise of Congressional power. Two days later Federal Judge Carpenter at Chicago upheld the law, and the following day it was upheld by Judge Fitzhenry at Peoria, Ill. At St. Louis the court sustained a decision against the law, and the sale of 2.75 per cent. beer was resumed.

Meanwhile all efforts to fight the measure were concentrated in the legal steps taken before the United States Supreme Court to test the constitutionality of the entire prohibition law. The case was advanced by the court; the arguments were begun Nov. 20 and lasted three days; the chief counsel for the liquor interests was former Secretary of State Elihu Root; the Anti-Saloon League co-operated with the Government in presenting the case. The Supreme Court adjourned Nov. 22 for a fortnight's recess, hence no decision was looked for until after Dec. 8. President Wilson let it be known that he would issue no proclamation lifting the ban on wartime prohibition in view of the failure of the Senate to ratify the Peace Treaty, hence the sole hope of the liquor interests of obtaining a period of freedom to resume business before constitutional prohibition went into effect on Jan. 16 rested with the decision of the Supreme Court.

The Ohio election on Nov. 4 resulted in a victory for the anti-prohibitionists by a majority of less than 500 in a total vote of over 1,000,000, but the accuracy of the count was attacked by the prohibitionists; in the same election a referendum vote defeated the repeal of State prohibition by a large majority. In New Jersey a Democratic candidate for Governor, who stood on a pro-liquor platform, was elected; in Kentucky the prohibitionists carried the State by 10,717 and expressed themselves as satisfied with the results of the election generally.

The Government instituted measures to enforce the prohibition law rigidly. The country was divided into districts, and a Federal Prohibition Director was appointed to each, with numerous revenue agents under him.

There was a general observance of the law throughout the country from the start—with scattered exceptions in the larger cities—and nowhere were any disorders reported.

"Absent Without Leave"

By CRITTENDEN MARRIOTT

[LATE DIRECTOR OF ACTIVITIES, Y. M. C. A., BORDEAUX REGION, FRANCE]

ONE of the great though comparatively minor tragedies of the world war was that of the men who were lost; not lost in the sense that they were killed or captured or missing, but lost in the ordinary significance of the term. Late in 1918 it was stated semi-officially that 120,000 privates and 18,000 officers were "A. W. O. L." (absent without leave) in France. Every one, including the army authorities that made the statement, knew perfectly well that scarcely a tenth of these men were absent of their own will, and that the other nine-tenths were simply lost. In default, however, of any formal explanation of their absence, it was impossible to separate the sheep from the goats, and all had to be classed together.

It seems incredible, of course, that 120,000 men, let alone 18,000 officers, could possibly be wandering about France trying to find their "outfits" and failing to do so. Yet, not only these but thousands more had been lost, some for weeks and some for months, who had at last reached their regimental home.

Take a true case: John Jones, private, landed at Brest in November, 1917, with his battalion. He was taken ill on his arrival and sent to a hospital. Three days later he was discharged as cured and ordered to rejoin his organization. Meanwhile, however, the organization had moved away under "sealed orders." Even the Colonel in command probably did not know its ultimate destination, and not more than half a dozen men in Brest knew even its proximate destination. These were war times, and all movements of troops were carefully concealed.

John Jones applied to army headquarters in Brest and received a ticket for St. Sulpice and two days' rations; he was told to get on a certain train. Obediently, he went to the railway station. He did not speak a word of French and he found no one to point him right, but ultimately he got on a train for somewhere and finally he brought up at a place called St. Sulpice, only to find that his organization was not there, that no American troops were there, and that none had ever been there. Clearly, it was the wrong St. Sulpice.

What was he to do? He was a country boy barely 21 years old, in a foreign land, ignorant of the language. Naturally, he was panic-stricken and was wild to find his own countrymen, of any organization, wherever they might be, who would steer him to the right St. Sulpice.

The French were very kind to American soldiers; they discovered that he was lost, they fed him, and arranged for him to take the train to the nearest known American camp.

At the camp he told his story and asked to be sent on to St. Sulpice. The Adjutant had never heard of the place, but he got out his railway guide, and after a while he found the name. A clerk made out a ticket and the Adjutant called an orderly, "Take this man to Company B and tell the Sergeant to feed him and give him a place to sleep to-night and have him at the 8 o'clock train tomorrow morning," he ordered.

Jones took the train as directed, but the St. Sulpice it took him to turned out to be another wrong St. Sulpice. So did several other next choices. Finally some officer looked up the matter, and found that sixty-seven of the ninety-two "departments" in France contained a town called St. Sulpice. It was hopeless to investigate each of them in turn, (the mails and telegraphs were hopeless;) moreover, a month had passed and it was certain that Jones's outfit had moved on to somewhere else. So the officer sent him to Bourges, where the central records office of the A. E. F. was situated.

Bourges ought to have placed him right. No doubt Bourges tried. But its records were not up to date. Of course they were supposed to be, but, as a matter of fact, they were not. No records ever were up to date anywhere at any time in the war. In the very nature of things they could not be. So John Jones went wrong again and again and again.

He never did get right. I saw him eleven months after he landed at Brest, and he was still ostensibly seeking his outfit. Actually he had become a tramp, utterly worthless and utterly hopeless. Consider! For eleven long months this boy of 21 had wandered, shunted from outfit to outfit, living "on the country," with never a cent of pay. When he found American troops he was fed—and sent on. Again and again he was picked up by M. P.s, (military police,) questioned—and sent somewhere. At first he tried to go as ordered, later he simply went. I took him to the nearest Provost Marshal, who, on his own responsibility, sent him as a "replacement" to the nearest company. Here he was given food and quarters with the other men, but no pay. What became of him ultimately I do not know; perhaps he made good, but the chances were all against him, for he was worn out, hopeless, and indifferent. He had been ruined by no fault of his own.

The point of this story is that it is typical. Literally thousands of men and officers had similar experiences, varying in details, but all tending to the same conclusion. Some were patients trying to get back from hospitals, some were messengers, some were truckmen, and some were men who had fallen out on a march. Some luckier or more intelligent than the rest found their outfits; others were picked up by some officer who was willing to cut red tape and were assigned to duty, but thousands were ruined as John Jones was ruined.

Ultimately conditions got so bad that the plan of returning hospital cases to their old outfits was abandoned, and they were sent to permanent replacement camps, whence they were forwarded in squads to any regiment that called for them. This tended to destroy regimental and divisional pride, and for a time was resented by the men, but the necessities of the case were too plain to be ignored. Men assigned to new outfits were put on the rolls, retained their honorable standing, and got (or were supposed to get) pay and allowances. Men wandering about the country or taken on irregularly by chance organizations got nothing—and they stood on the rolls of their old organizations as absent without leave, as deserted, or as dead. Even today many are lost, and all will find almost endless red tape confronting them when they try to clear their names and re-establish their standing. For, of course, it must not be forgotten that many were willfully absent—and that it is still difficult to separate the sheep from the goats.

Total Cost of the War 337 Billions

ACCORDING to a volume prepared by Ernest L. Bogert, Professor of Economics, under the direction of the Carnegie Endowment for Internal Peace, all the wars of the nineteenth century from the Napoleonic down to the Balkan wars of 1912-13, show a loss of life of 4,449,300, while the known and presumed dead of the world war reached 9,998,771. The monetary value of the individuals lost to each country is estimated, the highest value on human life being given to the United States, where each individual's economic worth is placed at $4,720, with England next at $4,140; Germany third, at $3,380; France and Belgium, each $2,900; Austria-Hungary at $2,720, and Russia, Italy, Serbia, Greece, and the other countries at $2,020.

With a loss of more than 4,000,000, the estimate puts Russia in the lead in human economic loss, the total being more than $8,000,000,000; Germany is next with $6,750,000,000; France, $4,800,000,000; England, $3,500,000,000; Austria-Hungary, $3,000,000,000; Italy, $2,384,000,000; Serbia, $1,500,000,000; Turkey, almost $1,000,000,000; Rumania, $800,000,000; Belgium, almost $800,000,000; the United States slightly more than $500,000,000; Bulgaria, a little more than $200,000,000; Greece, $75,000,000; Portugal, $8,300,000, and Japan, $600,000. On this basis the total in human life lost cost the world $33,551,276,280, and the loss to the world in civilian population is placed at an equal figure.

The total property loss on land is put at $29,960,000,000, one-third of which was suffered by France alone, its loss being given as $10,000,000,000, with Belgium next at $7,000,000,000, with the other countries following in this order: Italy, $2,710,000,000; Serbia, Albania and Montenegro, $2,000,000,000; the British Empire and Germany, each $1,750,000,000; Poland, $1,500,000,000; Russia, $1,250,000,000; Rumania, $1,000,000,000, and East Prussia, Austria, and Ukraine together, the same amount.

In the property losses on sea, that is, to shipping and cargo, the report estimates that "the construction cost of the tonnage loss can scarcely be estimated at less than $200 a ton, and the monetary loss involved in the sinking of this 15,398,392 gross tons may, therefore, be placed at about $3,000,000,000." To this is added loss of cargo, which is estimated at $250 a ton, giving a cargo loss of $3,800,000,000, and a total tonnage and cargo loss of $6,800,000,000.

Among the indirect costs of the war, loss of production is placed at $45,000,000,000. In arriving at this figure an average of 20,000,000 men are counted as having been withdrawn from production during the whole period of the war, and their average yearly productive capacity is placed at $500. War relief is another indirect cost which totaled up to $1,000,000,000; and the loss to the neutral nations is given as $1,750,000,000.

With the total direct costs of the war amounting to $186,336,637,097 and the indirect costs to $151,612,542,560, the stupendous total of $337,946,179,657 is reached. Finally the report says:

The figures presented in this summary are both incomprehensible and appalling, yet even these do not take into account the effect of the war on life, human vitality, economic wellbeing, ethics, morality, or other phases of human relationships and activities which have been disorganized and injured. It is evident from the present disturbances in Europe that the real costs of the war cannot be measured by the direct money outlays of the belligerents during the five years of its duration, but that the very breakdown of modern economic society might be the price exacted.

Origin of the World War

Official Minutes of the Austro-Hungarian Council That Decided to Force War on Serbia

THE publication in Vienna of a so-called Austrian Red Book, based on materials found in the archives of the old Austro-Hungarian Foreign Office and written by a publicist named Dr. Roderich Gooss, with the approval of the present Austrian Government, created a sensation in Central Europe during the latter part of September, 1919. The book, entitled "The Vienna Cabinet and the Origin of the World War," showed that at a Ministerial Council held in Vienna on July 7, 1914, the political leaders of Austria-Hungary had deliberately decided to force war upon Serbia by means of an ultimatum in regard to the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand at Serajevo. After a thorough discussion the Ministers determined to shape the demands upon Serbia in such a way that they would cause a war, in which Serbian territory could be seized, yet the terms were not to be so drastic as to make the purpose apparent to the world.

The most important document in the Red Book is the official report of the meeting just referred to. This record, containing a summary of each Minister's remarks, shows that Count Berchtold, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, had been assured from Berlin that Kaiser Wilhelm and Chancellor Bethmann Hollweg stood ready to support Germany's ally, no matter what the demands upon Serbia might be. In other words, it furnishes official evidence that Austria-Hungary first obtained Germany's consent and backing before provoking war. The minutes also reveal the fact that Count Tisza, the Hungarian Premier, was the only member present who seemed to fear the European war which would almost certainly result from the attempt to make Serbia a dependency of Austria.

Following is the full text of the minutes of that historic meeting, as reprinted from the Red Book by the Vienna Arbeiter-Zeitung and translated from the German for CURRENT HISTORY:

Report of the Ministerial Council held in Vienna on July 7, 1914, over joint affairs, under the Presidency of Count Berchtold, Minister of the Imperial Royal House and of Foreign Affairs.

Present: Count Stuerghk, Imperial-Royal Premier; Count Tisza, Royal Hungarian Premier; Dr. von Bilinski, Imperial and Royal Joint Minister of Finance; Ordnance General von Krobotin, Imperial and Royal Minister of War; General Baron von Conrad, Imperial and Royal Chief of the General Staff, and Rear Admiral von Kailer, representing the Imperial and Royal Naval Command. Recording Secretary, Legation Councilor Count Hoyos. Subject: Bosnian affairs, the diplomatic action against Serbia.

The Chairman opened the session by remarking that the Ministerial Council had been called for the purpose of discussing the measures to be taken to remedy the evil internal conditions that had become apparent in Bosnia and Herzegovina in connection with the catastrophe of Serajevo. In his opinion there were various internal measures, the application of which to Bosnia seemed to him to be in order against the critical situation, but, first of all, clarity should be reached on the question whether the time had not come to make Serbia harmless once for all through an expression of force.

Such a decisive blow could not be struck without diplomatic preparations, so he had got in touch with the German Government. The discussions in Berlin had led to a very satisfactory result, as Kaiser Wilhelm, as well as Herr von Bethmann Hollweg, had most emphatically assured us of the unconditional support of Germany in case of a warlike complication with Serbia. Now we must still reckon with Italy and Rumania, and here he was in accord with the Berlin Cabinet in the opinion that it would be better to act and then await any possible demands for compensation.

It was plain to him that a passage at arms with Serbia could lead to a war with Russia. But at present Russia was following a policy that, taking a farsighted view, was aiming at a combination of the Balkan States, including Rumania, for the purpose of using them against the monarchy when the time seemed opportune. He was of the opinion that we must take into account the fact that our situation, as opposed by such a policy, was bound to become worse, especially as passive toleration would be sure to be construed by our South Slavs and Rumanians as a sign of weakness and would lend force to the drawing power of the two border States.

The logical conclusion to be drawn from all this would be to get ahead of our opponents and, through a timely settlement with Serbia, put a stop to the process of development already in full swing, something that might not be possible later.

COUNT TISZA'S ATTITUDE

The Royal Hungarian Premier agreed that the situation had changed during the last few days because of the facts established by the investigation, and because of the attitude of the Serbian press, and he emphasized the fact that he, too, considered the possibility of warlike action against Serbia closer at hand than he had believed immediately after the Serajevo attentat. He would never agree, however, to a surprise attack upon Serbia without preliminary diplomatic action, as seemed to be the intention, and as, unfortunately, had been discussed in Berlin through Count Hoyos, because it was his view that in such a case we would occupy a very bad position in the eyes of Europe and would very probably have to reckon with the hostility of all the Balkan States, except Bulgaria, which at present was greatly weakened and could not support us to the proper extent.

We ought first to formulate unconditional demands upon Serbia and only present an ultimatum if Serbia did not yield to them. These demands must be hard, indeed, but not impossible of fulfillment. If Serbia accepted them we would be able to show a striking diplomatic success and our prestige in the Balkans would rise. But if our demands were not accepted he, too, would be for military action, but he must emphasize beforehand that with such action we must aim at the diminution of Serbia's power but not at her complete destruction, because on the one hand Russia would never allow that without a life-and-death struggle, and on the other because he, as Premier of Hungary, would never be able to agree to the annexation of a part of Serbia by the [Austrian] monarchy.

It was not Germany's affair to determine if we should now strike Serbia or not. He personally was of the opinion that it was not unconditionally necessary at the present moment to make war. At present we must take into account the fact that there was a very strong agitation against us in Rumania; that, in view of the excited state of public opinion, we would have to reckon with a Rumanian attack, and that at all events we would have to keep a good-sized force in Transylvania in order to intimidate the Rumanians. Now that Germany has happily cleared the way for the adhesion of Bulgaria to the Triple Alliance, there is opened to us a very promising field for successful diplomatic action in the Balkans by uniting Bulgaria and Turkey and attaching them to the Triple Alliance, thus creating a counterbalance against Serbia and Rumania, and then being able to force Rumania to return to the Triple Alliance. Upon the European field it must be taken into consideration that the relation of strength between France and Germany would steadily become worse for the former, because of its low birth rate, and that in the future Germany would constantly have more troops available against Russia.

These were all considerations that must be weighed in the case of such an important decision as was to be arrived at today, and therefore he must again point out that he would not unconditionally decide for war, in spite of the crisis in Bosnia, which, furthermore, could be remedied by an energetic reform in administration; he believed, rather, that a proper diplomatic victory—one which would include a severe humbling of Serbia—would be better adapted to improve our position and to make possible a profitable Balkan policy.

BERCHTOLD FOR ACTION

The Chairman [Berchtold] remarked in answer to this that the history of recent years had shown that diplomatic victories over Serbia had, it was true, temporarily raised the prestige of the monarchy, but that the tension actually existing in our relations with Serbia had merely become greater. Neither our success in the annexation crisis nor the one connected with the creation of Albania, nor the subsequent yielding of Serbia in consequence of our ultimatum in the Fall of the preceding year, had changed anything in the actual conditions. A radical solution of the problem created by the Greater Serbia propaganda systematically carried on from Belgrade, the disintegrating effects of which upon us are noticed as far as Agram and Zara, was only possible through an energetic intervention.

Regarding the danger of a hostile attitude by Rumania mentioned by the Royal Hungarian Premier, the Chairman remarked that at present this was less to be feared than in the future, when the joint interests of Rumania and Serbia would constantly increase. Of course King Carol had occasionally expressed doubts as to his ability to fulfill his duty as an ally toward the monarchy by active military service in case it became necessary. On the other hand it was hardly to be assumed that he would allow himself to be induced to take military action against the monarchy or be unable to withstand any public sentiment for such action. For the rest there must be considered Rumania's fear of Bulgaria, which would be bound to somewhat restrain the former's freedom of movement even under the present circumstances.

So far as the Hungarian Premier's remarks regarding the comparative strength of France and Germany were concerned, he [Berchtold] believed it necessary to point out that the diminishing increase in population of France was offset by the disproportionately 'higher increase in the population of Russia, so that the assertion that Germany would in the future have more troops available against France hardly appeared to hold good.

PREMIER STUERGGH FOR WAR

The Imperial Royal Premier [Stuerghk] remarked that today's council of Ministers had really been called for the purpose of discussing the internal measures to be used in Bosnia and Herzegovina that would be calculated on the one side to make the present investigation, begun on account of the attentat, a success, and on the other to counteract the Greater Serbian movement in Bosnia. Now these questions must give place to the main question of whether we ought to settle the internal crisis in Bosnia by an expression of force against Serbia.

This main question had now become timely after two months, first of all because the commander of the provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, on the basis of his observations and his acquaintance with Bosnian conditions, proceeded on the hypothesis that no internal measures could be successful unless we decided to strike a powerful blow at Serbia on the outside. On the base of these observations of General Potiorek we must consider the question as to whether the schismatic activity proceeding from Serbia could be stopped, and whether we could even retain the two provinces if we did not proceed against the kingdom.

During the last few days the entire situation had taken on a different aspect, and there had now been created a psychological situation, which, in his opinion, was unconditionally forcing us into a war with Serbia. He agreed, indeed, with the Royal Hungarian Premier that we, and not the German Government, must decide if a war was necessary or not; but he must still remark that it was bound to exercise a very great influence upon our decision when, as we had heard, we had been assured of unconditional loyalty by the ally which we must regard as the most faithful supporter of our policy in the Triple Alliance and, furthermore, had been urged to act at once, after we had made inquiries there. Count Tisza certainly ought to attach importance to this circumstance and remember that we, through a policy of hesitation and weakness, ran the risk of no longer being so sure of this unconditional support of the German Empire at a later period. This was the second matter of weight to be considered in reaching our decision, along with the interest in restoring orderly conditions in Bosnia.

How the conflict was to be begun was a matter of detail, and if the Hungarian Government was of the opinion that a surprise attack suris crier gare, as Count Tisza had said, was not practical, then another way must be found; nevertheless, he urgently desired that, whatever might happen, quick action be taken and our national economic life be spared a long period of unrest. All these things were details alongside of the principal question as to whether it was to come unconditionally to warlike action or not, and there the interest in the prestige and the existence of the monarchy, whose South Slavic provinces he would consider lost if nothing happened, was decisive above all else.

Therefore, today it should be decided in principle that it should and will come to action. He, too, shared the opinion of the Chairman that the situation would not be bettered at all by a diplomatic victory. If, consequently, the road of preliminary diplomatic action were to be taken because of international reasons, this must be done with the firm intention that this action dare only end in a war.

DECISIVE STRUGGLE NECESSARY

The Joint Finance Minister [Billinski] observed that Count Stuerghk had referred to the fact that the commander of the provinces wanted war. General Potiorek for two years had occupied the standpoint that we would have to undergo a trial of strength with Serbia in order to retain Bosnia and Herzegovina. We ought not to forget that the provincial commander, being on the spot, was the best judge of matters. Mr. Billinski also entertained the conviction that the decisive struggle was unavoidable sooner or later. He had never doubted that Germany would stand by us in a grave case, and already in November, 1912, he had received the most positive assurances from Mr. von Tschirschky [German Ambassador at Vienna] along that line. The recent events in Bosnia had produced a very dangerous sentiment among the Serbian population, particularly because the Serbian pogrom in Serajevo had made all the Serbs very excited and embittered, and consequently one could no longer decide who among the Serbs was still loyal and who was for Greater Serbia. In the country itself this condition could never be remedied; the only way to accomplish that was by a definite decision as to whether the Greater Serbia idea had a future or not.

Although the Royal Hungarian Premier would now be content with a diplomatic victory, he [Billinski] could not be so from the standpoint of the Bosnian interests. The ultimatum that we sent to Serbia last Fall had aggravated the sentiment in Bosnia and merely increased the feeling of hatred for us. It was a current topic among all the people there that King Peter would come and free the people. The Serb only understands force; a diplomatic victory would make no impression in Bosnia, and would be more likely to do harm than good.

The Royal Hungarian Premier asserted that he, indeed, had the highest opinion of the present provincial commander as a military man; but so far as the civil administration was concerned it could not be denied that it had completely failed, and that it must be reformed unconditionally. He [Tisza] did not want to go into details about this now, especially as it was not the proper time to undertake great changes; he must point out, however, that the most indescribable condition must prevail among the police in order to have made it possible for six or seven characters known to the police to place themselves on the day of the attentat along the route of the murdered heir apparent, armed with bombs and revolvers, without a single one of them being noticed by the police and removed. He could not understand why the conditions in Bosnia could not be essentially bettered through a thorough reform.

KROBATIN FOR ATTACK

The Imperial and Royal Minister of War [Krobatin] was of the opinion that a diplomatic success was of no value. Such a success would only be interpreted as weakness. From a military standpoint he must emphasize the fact that it would be more advantageous to carry on war at once than at a later time, as in the future the comparative conditions of strength would be disproportionately shifted to our disadvantage. So far as the forms of beginning the war were concerned, he must stress the fact that the two great wars of the last few years, the Russo-Japanese and the Balkan wars, had been begun without preliminary declarations of war. It was his opinion that at first only the mobilization provided for against Serbia should be carried out, and that general mobilization should be delayed until it could be seen if Russia was going to move.

We had already let pass two opportunities to settle the Serbian question, and each time postponed the decision. If we were to do the same thing now and fail to react to this recent provocation it would be regarded in all the South Slav provinces as a sign of weakness, and we should be strengthening the agitation against us.

From a military standpoint it would be desirable if the mobilization were put into effect at once and with as much secrecy as possible, and an ultimatum were only sent to Serbia after mobilization had been accomplished. This would be an advantageous action in connection with the Russian military forces, also, as just now the ranks of the Russian frontier corps were not at full strength because of the harvest furloughs.

At this point there ensued a lengthy discussion over the objects of a warlike action against Serbia, in connection with which the view of the Royal Hungarian Premier that Serbia must, indeed, be reduced in size, but not entirely destroyed, was accepted. The Imperial Royal Premier insisted that it would be a good idea also to remove the Kara-georgevich dynasty and give the crown to a European Prince, as well as to bring about a certain relation of dependency by the diminished kingdom upon the monarchy in a military way.

EUROPEAN WAR FORESEEN

The Royal Hungarian Premier [Tisza] was still of the opinion that a successful Balkan policy for the monarchy could be effected through the adhesion of Bulgaria to the Triple Alliance, and he pointed out the fearful calamities of a European war under the present conditions. It must not be overlooked that all sorts of future eventualities were imaginable—such as the sidetracking of Russia through Asiatic complications, a war of revenge upon Serbia by a revived Bulgaria, &c.—which might make our position in regard to the Greater Serbia problem materially more favorable than was the case at present.

In this connection the Chairman [Berchtold] remarked that, of course, one could imagine various future eventualities that would make the situation favorable for us. He, however, feared that there was no time for such a development. One must reckon with the fact that from a hostile side a decisive struggle against the monarchy was being prepared and that Rumania was assisting French and Russian diplomacy. It dared not be assumed that the policy with Bulgaria could offer us a complete substitute for the loss of Rumania. But, in his opinion, Rumania was not to be won again so long as the Greater Serbia agitation existed, for this also entailed the Greater Rumania agitation, and Rumania could only proceed against this latter if it were to feel itself isolated in the Balkans by the destruction of Serbia and were to understand that it could only find support in the Triple Alliance.

Besides, one must not overlook the fact that not the first step had yet been taken toward the adhesion of Bulgaria to the Triple Alliance. We only knew that the present Bulgarian Government had expressed this wish some months ago and at that time had also been about to enter into an alliance with Turkey. Thus far the latter had not occurred, and Turkey since then had fallen rather more under French and Russian influence. Of course, the attitude of the Radoslavoff Ministry afforded no reason to doubt that it was still resolved to lend a willing ear to positive proposals that might be made by us in Sofia along the line indicated. But at present this position could not yet be regarded as a firm foundation for our Balkan policy, especially as the present Bulgarian Government rested upon a very shaky base, and, as the adhesion to the Triple Alliance might be disavowed by public opinion, always to a certain degree under Russian influence, and the Radoslavoff Ministry be turned out. It must also be remembered that Germany had only previously approved the proposed deal with Bulgaria on condition that it was not to be aimed against Rumania. It would not be easy entirely to fulfill this condition and uncertain situations might develop from it in the future.

RESULTS OF THE SESSION

Thereupon, the question of war was discussed thoroughly in a rather lengthy debate. At the conclusion of these discussions it could be stated:

1. That all those present desired the quickest possible decision of the controversy with Serbia, either in a warlike or a peaceful sense.

2. That the Council of Ministers was ready to accept the view of the Royal Hungarian Premier, according to which mobilization is to be effected only after concrete demands have been presented to Serbia and after these have been rejected and an ultimatum served.

On the other hand, all those present, with the exception of the Royal Hungarian Premier, were of the opinion that a purely diplomatic victory, even if it ended with a striking humiliation of Serbia, would be worthless, and that, consequently, such far-reaching demands must be presented to Serbia as to make their rejection foreseen, so that the way to a radical solution through a military attack would be prepared.

Count Tisza observed that he was anxious to meet the views of all those present, and consequently he would also make a concession by admitting that the demands to be sent to Serbia should be very hard, but nevertheless not of such a kind as to expose our intention of making unacceptable demands. Otherwise we would have an impossible legal ground for a declaration of war. The text of the note must be studied very closely, and in any case he would like to see the note before it was sent. He must also emphasize the fact that he, for his part, would be obliged to draw the proper conclusions if his views were not considered. At this point the session was broken off until the afternoon.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION

When the meeting of the Ministerial Council was reopened the Chief of the General Staff and the representative of the naval command were also present. At the request of the Chairman the Minister of War addressed the following questions to the Chief of the General Staff:

1. Whether it were possible first to mobilize against Serbia, and only subsequently against Russia also, if it became necessary.

2. Whether large bodies of troops could be retained in Transylvania for the purpose of intimidating Rumania.

3. Where would the struggle against Russia be begun?

In response to these questions the Chief of the General Staff gave secret explanations and consequently asked that these answers be not included in the record. On the basis of these answers there developed a long debate over the prevailing conditions of strength and the probable course of a European war: this, because of its secret character, was not adapted for putting down in this report.

At the conclusion of this debate the Royal Hungarian Premier repeated his view regarding the question of war and directed another appeal to those present to examine their decision very carefully. Thereupon were discussed the points which could be embodied in the note as demands upon Serbia. In regard to these points no definite decision was made in the Ministerial Council; they were merely taken up in order to arrive at an idea of what demands could be made.

Then the Chief of the General Staff and the representative of the naval command left the Ministerial Council, which occupied itself with the internal situation in Bosnia and the measures to be taken there. In this connection the joint Finance Minister declared that he had become convinced through conferences during the last few days with party leaders that a dissolution of the Landtag would not be advisable, because it would be linked with political losses. At present there could be no sessions held because of the universal agitation of tempers, and therefore he was for adjourning the Landtag and only calling it together for a short session in September. He hoped that it then would be possible to have the budget and the Kmeten [?] bill passed. This depended first of all upon the retention by Dimovich of the party leadership of the pro-Government Serbs—which he hoped would be the case—thus making possible the maintenance of the present Government majority. With the closing of the Landtag the salaries and the right of immunity came to an end, so that the wishes of the provincial commander and of the Minister of War in this regard would be met even if he did not dissolve the Landtag. Mr. von Bilinski then discussed a number of other measures that he considered timely, among them the dissolution of the Great Serbia Association.

The Royal Hungarian Premier did not want to propose any great changes at present. He again directed attention to the condition of the police at Serajevo and declared that the disintegration of the administrative machine in Bosnia was the direct result of the preponderant position occupied for years by the provincial commander, who, as a military man, could not possibly possess the experience in administrative affairs necessary for a good administration.

The joint Finance Minister defended the provincial commander as an administrator, but admitted that it would be desirable to have the civil administration entirely separated from the military administration and have a civil Governor appointed alongside of the army inspector, as was the case in Dalmatia.

Then upon the proposal of the Imperial and Royal Minister of War there were immediately discussed special measures which were to be applied to Bosnia.

In this discussion it became clear that it was the consensus of all present that some of the proposals of General Krobatin were to be accepted, while others went too far, but that in general it was not possible to lay down a definite program for internal administration before the main question—as to whether war was to be waged upon Serbia—had been decided.

The Chairman [Berchtold] pointed out that even though there existed a difference of opinion between Count Tisza and all the others present, they had got closer together; in all probability the proposals of the Royal Hungarian Premier would also lead to the military settlement with Serbia thought necessary by himself and the other members of the conference.

Count Berchtold informed the Minister that he intended to go to Ischl on the 8th inst. to present a report to his Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty. Count Tisza asked the Chairman also to present a most respectful report that he was to make of his view of the situation. After a communiqué for the press had been prepared, the Chairman ended the session. * * *

BERCHTOLD.

Secretary, A. HOYOS.

I have taken note of the contents of this note, Aug. 16, 1914.

FRANZ JOSEF.

The text of the communiqué to the press referred to is given as follows by the Arbeiter-Zeitung:

The joint Ministerial Council today was called for the purpose of occupying itself with the ordering of measures which are to be applied to the internal administration of Bosnia and Herzegovina. At the same time the Ministerial Council took this opportunity to discuss in advance in a general way the joint budget for next year, for which purpose the Chief of the General Staff and the representative of the naval command were called in to explain some technical questions.

An authentic account—evidently official—of the equally secret council of July 19, 1914, was printed in another Vienna, paper, the Morgen. At that session the resolutions providing for the sending of practically impossible demands to Serbia were passed unanimously. The record is as follows:

Count Berchtold opened the deliberations by announcing that a diplomatic note would be sent to Serbia on the following Thursday, July 23. The Minister of Foreign Affairs hoped that this step would remain unknown until after President Poincaré's departure from St. Petersburg, and that in any case the "considerations of courtesy" would be complied with, since the moment of his departure would have been waited for. For diplomatic reasons he insisted that there should be no delay in the action to be undertaken against Serbia, because in Berlin they were becoming intoxicated, and Rome was beginning to discover the intentions of Vienna. The council, therefore, accepted the date proposed. General Conrad de Hotzendorff, the Chief of Staff, immediately ordered the decreeing of a state of siege in all regions of the monarchy inhabited by Jugoslavs. Chevalier de Krobatin, Minister of War, then presented his report on mobilization. Everything was ready; the order would be submitted to the Emperor for his signature on July 22. Count Stuerghk, Austrian Premier, raised the question of the attitude to be taken in case of an Italian expedition to Vallona. Count Stuerghk declared such an event improbable, but added that if it should happen Austria-Hungary would take part in it as a matter of form, and would thus extricate itself from embarrassment.

Count Tisza, Hungarian Premier, laid down the condition that there should be no plan of conquest involved in the action against Serbia; the action should be confined to rectifications of frontiers made necessary by strategical considerations. Count Berchtold replied that he could accept this idea only with some reservation, for if, as he conceded, it would be well for Austria-Hungary not to take any territory from Serbia, portions as large as possible should be given to Bulgaria, Greece, and Albania. In any case Serbia should be "sufficiently reduced to be no longer dangerous."

Count Stuerghk added that if occupation of Serbian territory was excluded, one could at least take guarantees, such as the overthrow of the dynasty or a military convention. The War Minister, having finally declared himself ready to accept the provision that Austria-Hungary should limit itself to rectifications of strategical frontiers and permanent occupation of a bridgehead on the other side of the Save, the council decided unanimously that "from the beginning of the war they should declare to the foreign powers that the monarchy was not waging a war of conquest." Count Berchtold summed up the debate in the remark that the most complete harmony had happily (erfreulicherweise) been attained on all points by the members of the council.

The Vienna correspondent of the Paris Temps, in transmitting this record to his paper, compared Count Berchtold's "happily" with Emile Ollivier's remark that he went into the Franco-Prussian war with a "light heart." Ollivier's "light heart" led to Sedan, and Count Berchtold's "erfreulicherweise" led to the annihilation of the ancient monarchy of the Hapsburgs.

AMONG THE NATIONS

Survey of Important Events and Developments in Various Nations. Alphabetically Arranged

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 18, 1919]

THE BALKANS

AN important indication of commercial revival in the Balkans was announced by the Progrès of Athens and confirmed by the papers of Belgrade: The Serbian Government, acting in co-operation with the Greek, will at once begin work on a canal extending from the Danube to Saloniki, thus intercepting much of the traffic from Central Europe, via the Orient Railway to Constantinople, destined for the Eastern Mediterranean. The canal is to begin at the village of Kevevara, at the confluence of the Danube and the Morava. It will follow the course of the Morava in Serbia, then will join the valley of the Vardar near Kaprulu, following this river until in the vicinity of Saloniki. The total length of the canal will be 373 miles. The difference in elevation between Kevevara and the highest point of the canal is about 300 meters. Between this point and Saloniki the difference in elevation is practically the same. It will be necessary to construct sixty-five locks.

The Supreme Council at Paris on Oct. 24 took a leaf from the waiting Hungarian Peace Treaty and made a long step toward settling the Balkan boundaries, not mentioned in the Austrian and Bulgarian treaties, by making a partition of large regions of Hungary between Rumania and the monarchy of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (Jugoslavia). According to this protocol Rumania is to receive Transylvania, containing an area of 120,000 square kilometers (about half the size of New England), rich in minerals and containing the Cities of Oradimare and Arad on the Maros, but not the full control of the Arad-Satmar railway, as she desired. The Banat is to be divided between Rumania and Serbia, the frontier being minutely defined in a note communicated to each Government, signed by Dutasta, according to which Serbia will get most of the Comitats of Torontal, with the towns of Nagy-Kiskinda, Becskerek, Versec, and Pancsova, with two-thirds of the waterways of the Banat, and Rumania will get the Comitats of Temes and Krasso-Szöreny and the towns of Temesvar and Lugos, and the famous mines and steel works of Resicabanga.

Rumania had asked for both banks of the Maros as far as the Theiss and the City of Bekes-Csaba, and that the Hungarian frontier should be set back fourteen miles west of the railway between Arad and Satmar. The Banat, till lately part of Hungary, is bounded southwest and north by the Rivers Danube, Theiss, and Maros, and on the east by Transylvania. It is one of the most fertile districts in Europe, producing grain, wine, silk, &c., and having an abundance of mostly undeveloped mineral wealth in the shape of salt, gold, silver, iron, lead, copper and coal, and vast forests with valuable fur-bearing animals. Its population is about 3,000,000.

In the capitals of the Balkan States the publication of the terms of the Bulgarian treaty of peace brought all territorial propaganda based on nationalistic grounds to a superlative stage of vehemence. There were no new features, however, except in Athens, where an attack was made upon the alleged growing predilection of the Paris Conference to preserve the political and something of the territorial integrity of the Turkish Empire.

BULGARIA — The new Ministry formed for the express purpose of signing the Peace Treaty, mentioned in last month's CURRENT HISTORY, was completed

A LEAF FROM THE WAITING HUNGARIAN TREATY OF PEACE, SHOWING THE MAGYAR TERRITORY ALLOTTED TO RUMANIA AND JUGOSLAVIA BY THE SUPREME COUNCIL, ON OCT. 24, 1919

as follows, with the portfolios of Justice and Public Works to be given to Democrats and that of Finance to a Progressive:

Premier and Minister for War—M. STAMBOULINSKI.

Public Instruction—M. KAALOFF.

Railways—M. TORLAKOFF.

Interior—M. DIMITROFF.

Agriculture—M. DASKALOFF.

Foreign Affairs—M. MAGGIAROFF.

Commerce—M. BUROFF.

The last two named Ministers are Moderate Socialists. The four preceding them are Agrarians. A dispatch from Sofia stated that M. Theodoroff, although not belonging to the Stamboulini Cabinet, would remain President of the Bulgarian delegation at the Peace Conference.

RUMANIA—The eighteen-day Ministerial crisis in Rumania ended with the establishment of a new Cabinet, the principal portfolios being held as follows, together with MM. Inculetz and Ciugureanu of Bessarabia; M. Nistor, Bukovina, and the Voivode of Vajada, M. Goldis, and M. St. Pop, Transylvania, without portfolios:

Prime Minister and ad interim Foreign Affairs—General VAITOIANU.

Public Instruction—General LUPESCU.

Agriculture—General POPOVICI.

Industry and Trade—General J. POPESCU.

Public Works—General ST. MIHAIL.

War—General RASCANU.

Justice—M. MICLESCU.

During the crisis, M. Take Jonescu and General Averescu, the leaders of the Opposition, declared their readiness to undertake the responsibility of office and guaranteed to solve both the foreign difficulty in agreement with the Paris Conference and the question of the liberty of the elections. M. Bratiano opposing this course, the King declined to accept it. Then M. Maniu, the head of the Rumanian Government in Transylvania, offered his services. This offer was acceptable to Jonescu and Averescu, but not to Bratiano. Then the latter proposed a slate with six Generals on the active list, presided over by a personal friend who will keep the seat of Foreign Minister warm for him. This was accepted.

The new Government refused to suppress the censorship and the state of siege, so that the ensuing elections, the campaign for which was in full blast on Nov. 15, will still be amenable to the courts-martial in regard to press offenses and speeches. The elections will be a mere formality. The opposition as a body, therefore, declared that they would take no part in them. The seats contested numbered 240. For these there were as many Bratiano Liberal candidates. Other contestants numbered 867.

On Nov. 1 Rumania formally announced to the Peace Conference the annexation of Bessarabia, the status of which was described last month. On Nov. 14, the last Rumanian troops left Budapest.

THRACE—In accordance with the terms of the Bulgarian peace treaty, Bulgar troops began to evacuate Western Thrace on Oct. 20, and units of the 9th Greek Division occupied the district of Xanthi (Turkish Eskiye), seventy miles northwest of Dedeagatch. From Saloniki came reports of fresh atrocities on the part of the Bulgars on their departure.

The Mussulmans, who occupy that part of Western Thrace left by the peace treaty to Bulgaria, sent a strong protest to the Peace Conference against such decision. They were led by Ismail Hakki Bey, Deputy for Gumuldjina in the Bulgarian Parliament, and claimed a majority of the population in the Rhodope districts of Davidere, Egridere, Sulyanyeri, Pashmakli, and Kirtejali. Ismail closed a long statement covering the protest as follows:

As for the Greeks, we Mussulmans of Thrace feel that we can live with them and in perfect good fellowship, despite the difference of religion. We have more in common with the Greeks than with any hybrid international régime that may be erected in Western or Eastern Thrace, and I am confident that after the upheaval due to the gigantic world struggle has passed Mussulmans and Greeks will settle down everywhere together to a life of peace and co-operation in honest work and of material prosperity.

On Oct. 29 the Greek Delegation at,

Paris gave out for publication an elaborate summary of its reply to the recent Memorandum submitted by the Bulgarian Delegation regarding the policy of Bulgaria and her claims to Thrace. The purport of the first point was a denial with documentary evidence of the Bulgar claim that the country's anti-Allied policy was a matter of ex-King Ferdinand and the Radoslavoff Cabinet and not of the Bulgar people themselves. The Greek document then takes up the question of Thrace as follows:

In the Bulgarian memorandum on Eastern Thrace the authors, in their attempt to prove the predominance of the Bulgarian elements of the population have deemed it sufficient to quote only authorities whose Pan-Slavist tendencies are well known. The Greek reply opposes to these authorities the opinions of such ethnologists of world-wide fame as Eliade Reclus and others, and also the evidence of Bulgarian statesmen themselves, who have on various occasions admitted that the Bulgarian element in Thrace was in a minority. The Greek reply gives the figures of the populations of Thrace as following: (1) According to the Turkish census of 1894: 304,537 Greeks, 265,360 Moslems, 72,758 Bulgarians; (2) according to the census of 1912, organized by the Oecumenical Patriarchate: 393,515 Greeks, 344,011 Moslems, 67,593 Bulgarians. The Bulgarians, in short, represent in Thrace only a small minority, whereas the Greeks are from five to six times more numerous. And if we add to those parts of Thrace, the fate of which has still to be decided, the population of the district of Constantinople, the disproportion between the Greek and the Bulgarian elements will be greater still, the Greeks being ten times superior in number to the Bulgarians. This superiority of the Greeks over the Bulgarians, already proved both by Turkish and Greek statistics, is still more eloquently confirmed in the fact that the Greek-Bulgarian electoral agreement of 1912 provided for the return for Thrace of seven Greek deputies and only one Bulgarian.

After having failed to prove the historical and ethnological claims of Bulgaria to Thrace, the Bulgarian Peace Delegation falls back on economic arguments, stating that (1) Bulgaria must have Thrace in order to retain an outlet to the Aegean Sea; (2) Thrace must remain Bulgarian as it is the Bulgarian population which cultivates the soil and represents the most stable element and the principal factor of production. As regards the outlet to the Aegean Sea, the Bulgarians declare that if they are deprived of it they will be forced to use as waterways the Black Sea and the Danube, with the result that Bulgarian trade will be dependent on powers which are masters of the mouth of the above-named river and of the Dardanelles. The weakness of this argument is obvious. Compared with the conditions in which are placed several European States which have no territorial outlet to any sea, Bulgaria, with two such excellent ports as Varna and Burgas, is placed in quite a privileged position. And as the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus will be under international control, her trade is in no danger of being dependent on any other State. Besides, Greece has not only offered Bulgaria the use of one of her ports on the Aegean, but also has consented that this outlet for Bulgarian trade shall be placed under the control and the guarantee of the League of Nations.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Conditions in Czechoslovakia during October and November showed clearly a stabilizing tendency. The 3,000,000, more or less irreconcilable Germans of German Bohemia, whose protests over the allotment of their territory to the new republic had been vociferously unceasing, showed a desire for a rapprochement with President Thomas Masaryk and his Government. Bolshevism was killed by the liberal and far-sighted policy of the President, whose personal popularity was tremendous after his approval of a measure that made the 8-hour day a national law. One Muna, a Czech Bolshevik, who sought to emulate Lenin and overthrow the Government, had been promptly arrested and imprisoned, and Smeral, leader of the radical wing of the Social Democrats, had fled to Switzerland. Economically the country was rapidly reverting to normal. The port of Hamburg, the use of which, under the terms of the Peace Treaty, was given to the Czechoslovaks, had already cleared two American ships with cargoes of American goods. Raw materials were being brought in from neighboring countries to start the factories. The most important industries of Czechoslovakia, textiles and glass manufactures, were rapidly being re-established. The harvests were good, and sugar was plentiful owing to a surplus of sugar beets. All of the coal used on the Austrian railways was being supplied by Czechoslovakia.

Politically, a policy of universal conciliation toward neighboring nations was outlined by Dr. Edward Benes, the Czechoslovak Foreign Minister, in a speech delivered before the National Assembly in the first week of October.

BELGIUM, HOLLAND, LUXEMBURG

As a result of the elections held in Belgium on Nov. 16, the Cabinet, which took office under the Premiership of M. Delacroix just a year ago, resigned two days later, but was asked by King Albert to remain in office until the line-up of the new Chamber should be definitely known. According to advices received Nov. 19 no party in the new Chamber will have an absolute majority. It will consist of seventy-three members of the Catholic party, seventy Socialists, thirty-four Liberals, and five to ten members elected from the smaller political groups. The Chamber elected in 1913 was made up as follows:

Catholics	101
Liberals	35
Social Democrats	39
Christian Socialists.....	2

The Socialist gains of thirty-one and the Catholic losses of twenty-four were said to be due principally to the recent abolition of plural voting.

The receipts of the Belgian Treasury for the first seven months of 1919 totaled 421,000,000 francs, exceeding the Government's estimate by over ten million. Trains circulated all over the kingdom, eighty per cent. of the 1,100 kilometers destroyed by Germany having been repaired or diverted, or the German constructions utilized. Although Belgium suffered a destruction of rolling stock of 50 per cent., the freight tonnage in October reached 60 per cent. of the pre-war amount.

Some indications of the re-establishment of business relations between Holland and Germany were given last month—a rush on the part of the Dutchmen to get ahead of the Allies. Since then it was announced in The Hague that a group of Dutch bankers, headed by the Netherlands Handels-Maatschappij, had granted a credit of over $23,000,000 for the purchase of raw materials for German industry, especially cotton. Fifty per cent. of this raw material will be re-exported in the form of goods to pay off the credit, and the other 50 per cent. will be used for German domestic needs or uncontrolled export abroad.

All this was emphasized by M. Van Aalst, the well-known Dutch banker and President of the new Netherlands Overseas Trust, in an interview on Oct. 23, who added:

I hope that after a few months America will come to the conclusion that its urgent help not only to the allied powers with credits but also to Central Europe is to her own interests. The main idea is to give credit for raw material, which spells industry and stimulation of export trade, with which debts to other countries can be paid. The rehabilitation of Germany is in the interest of the world, and it is safe to state that most international bankers and financiers have now arrived at this conclusion.

The official figures of the Luxembourg plebiscitum, which took place on Sept. 28, were published as follows:

General elections took place in Luxembourg on Oct. 26, under the new law including the scrutin de liste with proportional representation, both sexes over the age of 21 voting for candidates of 25 years or over, with the following results:

Clericals 24
Socialists 11
Radicals 7
Independents 2
Pro-Belgians 4
Total 48

The new Chamber thus consists of 48 seats as against 53 in the old. In the old the Right—the Catholic and Agrarian Party—had 23 and put 48 candidates in the field; the Radicals, formerly the Liberals, had 8 seats and put forward 28; the Socialists, with 12, had 41 candidates, and the People's Party, with 6 seats in the old, had 19 candidates for the new. There were other small groups, and three women candidates, two of them Socialists.

FRANCE

Up to Nov. 19 the French Deputorial election, held Nov. 16, showed the following distribution of parties in comparison with the old Chamber, elected May 10, 1914:

1919.
Republican Left 123
Radicals 57
Radical Socialists 78
Republican Socialists 26
Unified Socialists 65
Dissident Socialists 6
Progressives 126
L'Action Libérale Group..... 73
Conservatives 32

1914.
Organized Radicals 136
Democratic Left 102
Organized Socialists 102
Alliance Democratique 100
Progressivists and Federated Republicans 54
Action Libérale 34
Independent Socialists 30
Right 26
Independent 18
Total..... 602

The incorporation of Alsace-Lorraine raised the number of seats from 602 to 626. Another academic feature of the election was the return to the scrutin de liste, or blanket ballot, with partial proportional representation. The contest on general lines was waged between the forces of democratic government and those of extreme socialism, or Bolshevism, the former led by Premier Clemenceau with the Bloc National, the backbone of which was the Organized Radicals or so-called Radical Socialists and the various Conservative and Republican factions, with the strength, for the time, of the old Right made up of Royalists and Clericals, who collectively took the name of Action Française. Opposed to these were the various Extremist groups led by Socialists ranging from personal enemies of Clemenceau, like Henry Franklin-Bouillon and Pierre Renaudel, to Jean Longuet, the Bolshevist.

Nearly all the Opposition leaders were defeated and nearly all the Government leaders were elected, with the result that it was estimated that the latter would control more than 500 of the 626 members of the next Chamber.

The curtain was rung down, Oct. 19, on the French war Parliament, which had sat since the Summer of 1914. The Chamber gave itself over to a patriotic demonstration. One of the last acts of the Senate was to pass the Amnesty bill, but without the clause passed by the Chamber extending amnesty to certain categories of military convicts.

According to figures presented by M. Klotz, Minister of Finance, on Oct. 21, France must borrow $400,000,000 a year in order to balance the budget. In the Chamber, however, four days before, he had presented statistics to prove that France, on account of her industries and borrowing power, was still a creditor nation, and added:

We owe abroad 30 milliards of francs, about half of which is due to the United States, but France has a very important credit balance. France was before the war and is still the greatest creditor in the world. France had before the war placed 48 milliards abroad, and she advanced during the war thirteen and a half milliards to different nations.

On Nov. 10, the linotypers and typographers of the Paris papers went on a strike, stopping the publication of all save the Socialist papers. The next day the proprietors joined forces and brought out a new paper called La Presse de Paris, which was said to have had an immense effect on cutting down the Socialist vote. The first issue of La Presse de Paris sold to the extent of 5,000,000 copies.

ITALY

The elections to the Twenty-fifth Parliament since the foundation of the Kingdom of Italy took place on Nov. 16. So far as reported up to Nov. 19, the new Chamber, compared with the old, which had been in office since 1913, had the following distribution:

Ministerialists	1919.	145
Socialists		126
Catholics		90

Constitutional Opposition	36
Nationalists	23
Republicans	16

1913.

Constitutionalists	318

Syndicalists	3
Catholics	24

Total508

For the first time the Catholics voted as an organized political party, the Italian Popular Party. Other organized parties were the Socialists and the Republicans. Other designated groups were divided on the sole question of being for or against the Nitti Government. Other features of the election included the use, as in France, of the blanket ballot, and the division of Italy into fifty-four constituencies, each returning members varying from five at Sassari to twenty at Milan, with the Roman province raised from five to fifteen. The Socialists gained in all the larger northern cities, due to the apathy of the bourgeoisie, it was said. The chief gains of the Catholics were in the southern rural districts.

The strength of the Nitti Government in the new Chamber would, it was said, depend upon his ability to gain the support on international questions of the Socialists and Catholics, to which might be added the strength of the Nationalists should he advocate the annexation of Fiume. On Oct. 31 Premier Nitti addressed a letter to his constituents in which he said:

It is deplorable that our allies do not realize that the question of Fiume has no economic value for Italy, but a moral value, being a question of national dignity and sentiment. Opposition from friendly nations will mean the creation of an intolerable internal situation for Italy, and also an uneasy international situation, the effects of which might be most injurious.

In making a report on the food situation in Italy, H. C. MacLean, U. S. Trade Commissioner at Rome, stated:

The minimum requirements of the non-producing proportion of the population are 40,000,000 quintals, of which, as has already been stated, it is hoped to obtain 20,000,000 quintals from local sources, and to import 20,000,000 from abroad.

He declared that lack of tonnage continued to be a serious obstacle to the early recovery of Italy's industrial and commercial activity. On the other hand, he wrote that the Italian coal situation was improving.

LATIN AMERICA

A group of fifty German families arrived at Buenos Aires on Oct. 30, and were assigned to land in the Argentine territory of Misiones. Four hundred more were expected. The concessions consist of 25, 50, or 100 hectares, according to the size of the family.

The convention of the Socialist Party of Argentina adopted a resolution on Nov. 12, protesting against the allied blockade of Bolshevik Russia.

Domingo Salaberry, Argentine Minister of Finance, negotiated a loan with the Bank of Spain at Madrid. The sum under consideration was 500,000,000 pesetas, or about $100,000,000.

On Oct. 19 the Brazilian Chamber defeated a proposal to reduce obligatory military service from two to one year. The vote was 75 to 49.

A vast scheme for the irrigation of semi-arid territory in Brazil was considered by the Congress. It was reported that since 1877 more than a million inhabitants of Northeastern Brazil had perished from famine and its consequences. A study of the rainfall in the State of Ceara, the least favored, showed an annual precipitation of 80,000,000,000 cubic meters, 16,000,000,000 of which could be collected and be made to irrigate about a million hectares or 2,400,000 acres. The project called for an annual outlay of 40,000 contos ($11,000,000) up to 200,000 contos ($55,000,000), and included reservoirs, dams and canals.

On Oct. 20 it was announced from the City of Mexico that steps had been taken to irrigate 200,000 hectares of land in the Fuerte River valley, State of Sinaloa, where German immigrants were expected to buy tracts on the twenty-year-payment plan. According to the official publication of the Mexican Department of Industry, Commerce and Colonization, the scheme which provided for an annual inflow of 45,000 Germans, had its origin last March. A bulletin issued in November showed the concessions made to Germans close to Carranza during the year to have been as follows: J. Meakany, 494,209 acres; M. Coltz, 370,650; E. Müller, 247,100; von Magnus, 591,685; to four others, 1,073,635 acres.

NEW ZEALAND

The High Commissioner for New Zealand at London received a dispatch from his Government on Oct. 25 giving the slate of the reconstructed New Zealand Cabinet as follows:

Prime Minister—Mr. W. F. MASSEY.
 Defense and Finance—Sir JAMES ALLEN.
 Native Affairs and Customs—Mr. W. H. HERRIES.
 Public Works—Sir WILLIAM FRASER.
 Attorney General and Education—Sir F. H. D. BELL.
 Lands—Mr. D. H. GUTHRIE.
 Internal Affairs—Mr. J. B. HINE.
 Agriculture — Mr. WILLIAM NOS-WORTHY.
 Justice and Postmaster General—Mr. J. G. COATES.
 Member of the Executive Council Representing the Native Race—Dr. M. POMARE.

PERSIA

Ayn-Lam-Ber, acting for the National Party of Persia, said to have been first organized by the American W. Morgan Shuster when he was Treasurer General at Teheran in 1911-12, sent out an appeal against the Anglo-Persian treaty on the ground that it is the first step toward annexation and contrary to the terms of the Persian Constitution. The document also declared that in the light of the following facts the treaty had not the approval of the Persian people:

1. After our revolution of 1906 the Anglo-Russian diplomacy aimed several times at our rights. She never got from us willingly what she wanted. Every time she had to make use of ultimatums and even play at invading the country. Meanwhile the supremacy of right over force had not yet been proclaimed as a dogma. Persia could not rely on any guarantee protecting the life of the weaker. Nevertheless, she firmly stood up for her independence.

Is it comprehensible that now—at the dawn of an era of justice, after all the assurances given by the Entente about the free disposition of nations, after the expounding of the Wilsonian principles, at the very moment when small nations recover their long-lost independence—Persia hands over of her own free will her army, her police, her finances, and her economic resources to a foreign power? And all this in exchange for a loan of two million pounds sterling at 7%, to be paid monthly.

2. The head of the present Government, appointed to his post during the dissolution of Parliament, was forced on the Shah by Great Britain. In spite of possible official disproof which may be issued against this the truth of it can easily be proved.

3. The negotiations that brought about the present agreement have lasted nine months! Such length of time is significant. It was not the result of the British Imperialists' hesitating before the tempting morsel, but due to the Persian Government's fear of a revolution. The latter wanted time enough to gather sufficient strength to force the fateful act upon the people.

4. These coercive forces, organized, supervised, and paid by the British, are now fulfilling their office. They rage against the people in revolt. They arrest patriots. They forbid manifestations. They deport former Ministers.

Today it is the goal; tomorrow—the gallows!

These facts which, if wanted, could be verified by impartial investigation, show that the agreement of Aug. 9, the work of the Cabinet appointed by Britain under threat of British bayonets, is very far indeed from being approved by the Persian people.

SCANDINAVIA

According to the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, within ten days after the treaty has been put in operation, the people in the zones of Schleswig are to decide their Danish or German nationality by a plebiscite. The manner in which this will be done will be found in the text under the accompanying map.

It was said to be certain that the voters in the First Zone would vote solid for Denmark. The important port of Flensburg comes within the Second Zone, and, though this town was entirely Danish at the time of the war of 1866, the German Government, in pursuance of the same policy which it adopted in Prussian Poland and Alsace, sought to Germanize Schleswig as much as possible, with the result that there is a considerable German population now in the town. The International Commission, however, of which Sir Charles Marling, British Minister at Copenhagen, is Chairman, is not compelled to stand by the result of the plebiscite.

It will be remembered that the Peace

Schleswig-Holstein as far south as the Kiel Canal. In the first zone the inhabitants vote en bloc for or against reunion with Denmark at the latest twenty-one days after the German military and civil authorities have evacuated. In the second zone voting is by municipalities not later than five weeks after the voting in the first zone. According to official Danish wishes, no plebiscite will be taken in Zone III.

Conference originally decided to have plebiscites in three zones, but no plebiscite will be taken in the Third Zone in deference to the wish expressed by the Danish Government.

Norman Hapgood, United States Minister to Denmark, sent some excerpts from two proposed Danish industrial laws, one of which placed all industries under public control by means of a business council composed of sixteen members, four of whom are to be appointed by the Rigsdag eleven by the Minister of the Interior, and one, the Chairman, by the Government, and the other gave employees participation in all business enterprises employing five or more adult workmen. An extract from the first reads:

All concerns which are believed to be operating on too large a profit, or whose activities are suspected of being otherwise against the interests of the community, the Business Council may place under its own direct supervision. Such firms will be required to submit their annual accounts to the Council, and to give the Council any other information which may be required to enable it to ascertain the exact status of the industry, including the conditions relative to production and sale of the commodity being marketed. But no firm may be required to divulge secret processes of a technical nature. Refusal to give any other relevant information upon demand of the Council is made a police offense, and is punishable by a fine of 50 to 1,000 crowns ($13.40 to $268) per day. In enforcing its decisions the Business Council may appropriate the services of State and municipal authorities.

The second law covers specifically "industries and crafts," but professional concerns may be included by the consent of the Business Council:

It is proposed by this law that the details of participation shall be a matter of agreement between the Danish Employers' Association and the Federation of Trade Unions of Denmark; but that such agreement shall assure the employees the right of participation in the control of the observance of work agreements and of decisions relative to workmen's safety legislation; in the matter of the employment and discharge of workmen and of their nearest foremen; and in the preparation of the annual income report of the enterprise. * * *

Violations of the covenants of this law are punishable by a fine of 10 to 2,000 crowns ($2.68 to $536). All enterprises employing five or more adult workmen and coming under the classification of industries and crafts are subject to the provisions of the law, whether represented in the Danish Employers' Association or not.

SPAIN

A labor crisis and a political crisis occurred in Spain. Owing to the strictness of the censorship the outside world learned little about either. According to the censored dispatches the Congress of Spanish Employers, sitting at Barcelona, declared a lockout on Oct. 26, to take effect throughout Spain on Nov. 4, affecting over one million workers, and closing all the principal industries, trades and professions, even schools and public works. The lockout went into effect. It was stated on Nov. 13 that the opposing organizations had come to terms, but two days later the rupture was renewed by strikes succeeding the general lockout.

Meanwhile, a political crisis arose through the vain efforts of the Minister of the Interior to meet the situation, which, if prolonged, threatened the life of the country, the Government, and even of the dynasty itself. The Minister of the Interior, Señor Burgos, tried to resign, but the King induced him to remain. On Nov. 11 there was the report that a new Conservative Government would be formed with Señor Dato as Premier; two days later it was announced that the Liberals had rallied to the side of Melquiades Alvarez, the Reformist and anti-German leader, who, with the help of Count Romanones, then in London, would form a stalwart, progressive Government. In a statement to the London press Count Romanones subsequently threw light on the entire situation. He said:

The main task of the Spanish Government is the same as that of all other Governments, not only in Europe but in the world—to combat Syndicalism, not only Syndicalism among the industrial workers, but Syndicalism among State officials. In this task it will have the support of all parties which are opposed to the forces of disruption.

Mail advices from Madrid showed that the action of the Congress of Spanish Employers was aimed at the mighty Confederacion General del Trabajo, which Frank A. Vanderlip had described before the Economy Club in New York on May 26, as a perfect laboratory of Bolshevism, "an organization that was the most mysterious, the most terrifying of any organization that I ever encountered. * * * It is secret to the extent that the members themselves do not know who guides it. It calls general strikes merely for gymnastic exercises. It rules by assassination."

The effective, comprehensive organization of the Confederacion General del Trabajo—the General Federation of Labor—with its headquarters at Barcelona, is a relic of German Kultur receiving its vital force from the late German Ambassador, Prince von Ratibor, and his able lieutenant in propaganda, Dr. von Stohrer. It is non-political, and its membership embraces nearly all forms of employment capable of being organized in the interests of an entirely industrial régime. Opposing employers, whether individuals, corporations, or officials, are "removed."

Following its decision for a lockout the Congress of Spanish Employers issued a note to the Minister of the Interior explaining its drastic action as follows:

Our decision is due to the pernicious influence of a certain part—albeit a small one—of the proletariat, which renders all useful work impossible. The employers attribute the present state of affairs to the action of a certain group of miners which has as its object the destruction of the social edifice in Spain, which renders all useful work impossible. The employers therefore appeal to the working classes to rally around them, repudiating those who are trying to ruin national industry.

Meanwhile, we do not see any better or more radical way to put an end to this pernicious influence than by declaring a lockout, by which the working classes, who are the first victims of the Syndicalist endeavors, may be made aware of the errors into which they have been induced.

TURKEY

Major Gen. James G. Harbord and the members of his mission to Turkey reached Paris, where they began to prepare their formal report, which will have a measurable influence in determining the status, not only of Armenia, but the Turkish Empire—at least as far as the United States is concerned.

Conflicting views as to the status of Kemal Pasha and the Nationalist Army come from two sources—one describing them as patriots not opposed to any rational decree of the Peace Conference, and the other designating them as opposed to any political or territorial change in the empire. The same conflicting statements were made in regard to the new Cabinet organized by General Ali Riza Pasha on Oct. 4, after the Sultan had received an ultimatum from Kemal Pasha to dismiss the pro-Conference Damad Ferid Pasha Government.

UNITED KINGDOM

The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in the House of Commons on Oct. 27 that the railway strike, which began Sept. 27 and ended Oct. 6, had cost the Treasury nearly $50,000,000, one item of which, amounting to nearly $160,000, was for publicity. The cost to the National Union of Railwaymen had already been estimated at over $10,000,000.

On the same day a White Paper was issued, showing an estimated deficit of over $2,000,000,000, with large items of assets postponed for payment, including nearly $100,000,000 repayments for the maintenance of Australian troops, and $345,000,000 repayment by Germany for the cost of the Army of Occupation. Other war assets due amount to about $13,130,000,000, but to be deducted from this sum is the American liability of $4,210,000,000. It was estimated that the expenditures for 1919-20 would be about $2,365,000,000 and the revenue about $4,030,000,000.

On Oct. 27 the Cabinet was also reduced in number and reconstructed as follows, the exchange of portfolios of Earl Curzon and A. J. Balfour being the chief items of interest, with the Prime Minister, Lloyd George, still as First Lord of the Treasury:

Lord Privy Seal—Mr. BONAR LAW.
 Lord President of Council—Mr. A. J. BALFOUR.
 Chancellor of Exchequer—Mr. A. CHAMBERLAIN.
 Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—Mr. G. N. BARNES, or Viscount FRENCH.
 Chief Secretary—Mr. MACPHERSON.
 Lord Chancellor—Lord BIRKENHEAD.
 Secretary of State for Home Department—Mr. SHORTT.
 Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—EARL CURZON.
 Secretary of State for Colonies—Viscount MILNER.

Secretary of State for War and Air—
Mr. CHURCHILL.

Secretary of State for India—Mr. MON-TAGU.

First Lord of Admiralty—Mr. LONG.

Secretary for Scotland—Mr. MUNRO.

President of Board of Trade—Sir AUCK-LAND GEDDES.

Minister of Health—Dr. ADDISON.

President of Board of Agriculture and Fisheries—Lord LEE of Fareham.

President of Board of Education—Mr.
FISHER.

Minister of Labor—Sir R. S. HORNE.

Minister of Transport—Sir ERIC GEDDES.

Viscountess Astor having accepted the invitation of the Unionist Association at Plymouth to stand for the seat in the House of Commons vacated by her husband (son of the late William Waldorf Astor of New York) upon his accession to the Peerage, the bye-election took place on Nov. 15 and it was reported that Viscountess Astor had been seated by a plurality of 5,000 votes.

Great excitement, particularly in the French press, was caused on Nov. 8, when the Prime Minister, speaking at the Lord Mayor's banquet, on which occasion the policy of the Government is usually outlined, referred to the vain attempt to obtain peace in Russia last spring, and added: "I hope the time is not distant when the powers will be able to renew that attempt with better prospects of success." This was qualified two days later by Mr. Bonar Law, the Government leader, who assured the House of Commons that the Government had no intention of opening negotiations with Bolshevik Russia until the House had had an opportunity to discuss the subject.

THE VATICAN

Although women of Italy did not take part in the election for the Twenty-fifth Parliament on Nov. 16, the Catholic Party—Partito Popolare Italiano, or Italian Popular Party—began an educational campaign by sending the leaders of several Catholic women's organizations to the polls for observation and by circulars. This organization was begun by Filippo Meda, ex-Minister of Finance, and a leader of the Catholic aristocracy, which until the removal of the Papal inhibition took no part in the national elections.

The Vatican organ, Osservatore Romano, disclaimed any intention of the Vatican to control the Popular Party and stated that it was a free Catholic organization.

These two new political features—woman suffrage and the organization of Catholic women by the Popular Party—brought to an important stage of development the problem of woman in relation to the Church. Some conservative authorities even went so far as to say that she could not vote unless certain religious restrictions had been removed. On the other hand, Pope Benedict XV. received numerous petitions for the removal of these restrictions. The most elaborate document of this nature, from both the point of view of history and of law, was entitled "Per la Riabilitazione della Donna," (For the Rehabilitation of Woman,) bearing the imprint of Pastorio of Vicenza.

In the same category was a petition from the priests of the district of Prague, urging that the Pope abolish the law prescribing celibacy for the priesthood as far as it concerned Czechoslovakia. The Papal Archbishop Ikordac excommunicated fifty-one priests there who had taken wives while continuing to exercise the duties of their office.

On Oct. 22 the Pope in answering an address presented to him by the women's union declared:

On the domestic hearth woman is queen. Changed times have given woman functions and rights which she did not possess in former ages, and have enlarged the field of her activities, but no alteration in man's opinion, no novelty of things or events can separate woman, conscious of her high mission, from the family, which is her natural centre.

On Nov. 3 the first Consistory since 1916, when the Archbishops of Rennes, Rouen and Lyons were made Cardinals, was announced for December. It was understood that the Polish Archbishops of Warsaw and Gnesen would receive the beretto.

For the first time since Italy entered the war the Pope on Nov. 8 officially received in private audience a representative of the Central Powers. He was Baron Johann von Gebsettel, Secretary of the Bavarian Legation.

Germany Again at Work

First Industrial Nation to Stop Labor Disturbances—War Guilt Investigation

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 18, 1919]

THE outstanding feature of German life in the Autumn of 1919 was the remarkable revival of industry. The German people went to work again in earnest. The renewed signs of prosperity were commented upon at length by several foreign observers, who gave facts and figures in proof of their assertions. The Government, it is true, enforced a complete cessation of passenger traffic on all the railways of the nation for ten days—Nov. 5 to 15—primarily to save coal, though the embargo was also regarded as a masterstroke of Minister of Defense Noske to reduce the risk of a Communist uprising on the first anniversary of the German revolution. The National Assembly Committee for the Investigation of War Responsibility convened in Berlin and dragged a tedious course along from day to day. Hugo Haase, the Independent Socialist leader, died of wounds inflicted by an assassin.

President Ebert's repeated warnings that only by work would it be possible for Germany to restore her shattered commercial and social fabrics began to bear fruit by the middle of September. From all parts of the country dispatches indicated a return to the national sense of order and united effort after the months of political turmoil that followed the signing of the armistice. What was especially noteworthy, in view of the conflict between capital and labor in other countries, was the workingmen's clear perception of the fundamental difficulties of the problem. They began to see that "higher wages alone would not improve living conditions owing to the increased cost of living." Further, the eight-hour day was impossible for European economy, as twenty or thirty million European workmen in their best working years were now producing nothing, owing to the war, and the strain of the war had decreased the production of others. The only road leading back to normal prosperity was that of increased production through longer working hours.

LONGER WORKING HOURS

The first sign of this realization was manifested by the Württemberg Railway employes in voluntarily deciding to work ten hours more each week to lessen the coal crisis. Coincidentally, it was remarked that the piecework system was again being adopted, and a reaction was setting in against radicalism, whereby the strike fever, spreading over Europe and America, was abating in Germany. From all districts reports presently came to hand of a general speeding up of work, especially in those industries possessing raw materials and not hampered by lack of fuel.

Thus, the beginning of October witnessed the glass industry rapidly overhauling peace time production, with porcelain, optical, musical, and toy manufactures following closely. While the dye industry was reviving more slowly, top speed had been attained in the Solingen steel industries. According to the Frankfurter Zeitung these works were flooded with orders for cutlery of all descriptions, including surgical instruments, from the United States among other foreign countries. Herein the advantage to the foreign buyer was plain. Although prices at Solingen had been raised 300 to 400 per cent., the cost of Solingen steel wares on foreign orders, owing to the depreciation of the mark, was only 8 per cent. above pre-war prices.

The cure of work, and more work, was rapidly overcoming the disease of near-chaos in Germany. The Federal Labor Ministry stated that within six months the number of unemployed in Germany had been reduced from 1,500,000 to about 500,000. After talking with officials and labor leaders a correspondent thus summed up the reasons for the favorable change:

First, employees have already gained a considerable increase in wages and other privileges all around. Second, they are tired of strikes, seeing their gains in wages swallowed by enforced idleness. One great incentive for strikes formerly was the chance of an extra holiday, but since the eight-hour day was introduced the workmen have so much leisure they actually begin to hate it. Third, the re-awakening of trade with foreign countries, which has already assumed a much larger proportion than is realized outside Germany!

Set against this hopeful view of the industrial situation in Germany there remained the two chief difficulties of shortage of raw materials and coal. The raw material problem was said to have been solved in at least one instance by the characteristically prompt enterprise of a New York merchant. He brought over his own cotton yarn, valued in Germany at 25,000,000 marks, and at once set to work thousands of men and women who made it into stockings and other tricotage.

THE RAILWAY EMBARGO

To relieve the coal stress as applied to the congestion of railroad freight, the Government ordered a suspension of all passenger trains for ten days commencing Nov. 5. In the face of much adverse criticism the Government justified its action by asserting that the lack of locomotives, together with the fact that many railroad centres were threatened with exhaustion of their coal supply, compelled immediate attention to the distribution of food and coal. A New York Times correspondent, on arriving in Berlin just as the order was going into effect, said that one almost welcomed the official ban on travel, since railroad journeys in Germany had become purgatorial. The few trains running during the last month or two had become dangerously packed. He found the food situation in the capital slightly worse than six weeks before, telephoning an almost impossible achievement, hotels so overcrowded that guests were sleeping in the bathrooms, and the mail service in confusion.

In Berlin the companies controlling the airplane services were beset by persons with urgent business in other parts of the country, but benzine was scarce and few airplanes were available. Most of them were commandeered by the Government for forwarding mails. The passenger Zeppelin Bodensee left for Friedrichshafen with two tons of mail and no passengers. No motor buses were running, and not a taxi could be hired to go beyond the city limits. A few privileged individuals who presented sufficient pleas were permitted to depart on freight trains. The stoppage of passenger traffic produced some curious results. Many concerts were abandoned, since the artists could not reach the city. In the courts accused persons could easily obtain bail without sureties because the chances of flight were infinitesimal. Profiteers were hard hit because they could not bring in their high-priced goods; but prices soared, while the value of the mark fell lower than ever before.

First results of the railroad embargo gave the satisfactory figures of 106,000 freight cars placed at the disposal of the Ruhr coal fields of West Prussia, an increase of fully 20 per cent. over the previous week; and 7,000 cars daily, an increase of 25 per cent., delivered to the Upper Silesian coal fields, more than sufficient to handle the output of those mines. Berlin advices reported, however, a tightening of the food belt within a few days to the extent of 50 per cent. of the potato supply, and a cutting down of the milk ration from a half to a quarter of a liter.

FIXING BLAME FOR WAR

An initial report of the National Assembly's sub-committee for the investigation of war responsibility was cabled on Oct. 21. The first meeting was described as possessing the solemn atmosphere of a judicial court, though there were no accused as yet before its bar, and though its power even to compel the attendance of witnesses was in doubt. Among those present for examination, however, were several notable figures of the imperial régime, including the former Ambassador to the United States, Count von Bernstorff; ex-Chancellor Dr. von Bethmann Hollweg, Dr. Helfferich, and Dr. Zimmermann.

At the second session, Oct. 22, von Bernstorff carried his testimony forward through the peace negotiations with President Wilson to the declaration of unrestricted U-boat warfare in 1917. The witness was reported as exercising greater caution in his answers, sometimes considering more than a minute before responding to questions, and often consulting State papers. Much wrangling took place over the question why definite German peace conditions were never named to President Wilson. While Bernstorff's answers did not clear up this matter, there remained the apparent fact that without such positive knowledge the President was willing to mediate. Von Bernstorff caused a sensation when he professed to have been greatly shocked by his discovery, after the revolution, of a letter from the Kaiser addressed to Herr Zimmermann among papers in the Foreign Office and dated Jan. 16, 1917. This letter read: "His Majesty instructs me to thank you for your communication. His Majesty does not care a bit about President Wilson's offer. If a breach with America cannot be prevented, it cannot be helped. Events are developing."

MILITARY FAILURE FORESEEN

The session of Nov. 5 brought out the surprising disclosure from official archives that the army authorities went on record in 1916 as declaring that land warfare could not win for Germany; that it must be won diplomatically and politically. Dr. Zimmermann represented American Ambassador Gerard as having stated in reply to a question as to what the result of unrestricted U-boat warfare would be in the United States: "I don't know what they want in Washington. You may be right in the action you are taking." The Ambassador, according to Zimmermann, promised to use his influence to keep America neutral, and was again quoted by the witness as having said: "I shall do my best to avoid further friction."

With reference to the number of U-boats constructed by Germany, the former Minister of Marine, Vice Admiral Eduard von Capelle, stated that "810 submarines were built before and during the war. Of these 45 were constructed before the war, 186 were built during the administration of Admiral von Tirpitz, and 579 were built by me in the two and a half years I was in office."

HINDENBURG AND ROYALISTS

When Field Marshal von Hindenburg arrived in Berlin to testify before the investigating commission he suddenly became the centre of embarrassing attentions on the part of the Pan-Germans. When he tried to enter the Reichstag building on Nov. 14 his automobile was surrounded by students, who blocked his way, crying that he must not degrade himself by appearing before the committee, and mingling shouts for the Kaiser with the singing of "Deutschland über Alles." The former Commander in Chief was finally compelled to order his chauffeur to return home; however, he appeared before the committee four days later.

Hindenburg's presence in Berlin caused a marked upflaring of Junker and reactionary sentiment, which took the form of demonstrations before his door and elsewhere. Through the press he issued a request on the 15th that the public refrain from further manifestations in his honor, as he did not desire to be the cause of any disorder. The Government, while posting sentries of honor before Helfferich's house, where the Field Marshal was staying, took the precaution on Nov. 16 of stringing barbed wire barricades across Wilhelmstrasse and other important thoroughfares to prevent further reactionary demonstrations. It was remarked that while this step had been taken frequently against the Spartacans, it was the first occasion when it had seemed necessary against the monarchists.

Field Marshal von Hindenburg appeared before the committee on Nov. 18 and made important statements in reply to six questions which had been submitted to him in writing. "I know with absolute certainty," he said, "that neither the people, the Kaiser, nor the Government desired war, for the Government knew better than others Germany's tremendously difficult position in a war against the Entente." He added that if there had been united co-operation between the army and the homeland Germany would have won. Internal agitation, he said, had broken the will to victory. He and Ludendorff had been in entire accord throughout the war. Both had favored unrestricted U-boat warfare. "When 1917 came," he continued, "we could no longer permit our gallant soldiers to be bombarded with American ammunition and their wives and children to be starved by the blockade. The U-boat war was the only means to oppose those conditions."

The second of the six questions submitted to Hindenburg asked whether the army leaders knew of the warnings of Under Secretaries Haniel and Albert regarding the probable effects of submarine warfare upon America, and, if so, why they had no longer considered those warnings sound. Herr Haniel's report was read. It had informed the German Government that America, despite its English and French ties, would go to war with Germany if the submarine methods were continued, whereas, if the U-boat activities ceased, it would compel the British blockade to be lifted. Any relaxation of Germany's promises made in 1916 meant war with Germany.

Under Secretary Heinrich F. Albert, formerly Commercial Attaché in the German Embassy at Washington, had made this still more emphatic statement on Nov. 6, 1916:

If Germany can beat England, then war with America will make no difference. But thus far our boats have been unable to sink the large British armed merchantmen. The blockade of England would have to last a long time and be supported loyally, and if Japan can be induced by England to keep its fleet at home America has the possibility of sending its ships to European waters.

America can raise at least several army corps, and strengthening of the Entente forces would result. It would be most important in economic questions and would energetically support its allies, with no telling what huge loans, under the influence of the enthusiasm in America. Witness the Americans who came to France and created the Lafayette Flying Squadron. That dangerous branch of warfare would be surely vastly strengthened.

America's transportation without doubt would be efficient and capable of increase, and if America feels safe from Japan she will throw all her ammunition to France, not to forget the wonderful American automobile industry, the giant Ford factories, and other machines which would help in winning the war.

Neutrals would side with America. The psychological effect would be felt at once. It would be a national misfortune, and, at the end, Germany would be sure to be defeated.

General Ludendorff's testimony, which followed, included an attack upon von Bernstorff for not having furnished correct information from Washington. Count von Bernstorff said this was renewed proof that the German Embassy at Washington had been unpopular with the naval and military leaders, who would not believe its representations regarding America.

ATTACKS ON NOSKE

During the latter part of September, Minister of Defense Noske was the object of attacks both from within and from without his own party. Ex-Premier Philipp Scheidemann returned from his vacation to denounce Colonel Reinhard as a national danger and Noske as a tool of the military reactionaries. Noske issued a defense of his position in maintaining order, and warned the Allies that if compelled to fulfill that part of the Peace Treaty which enforced a reduction of the German Army to 100,000 he would not have a single intact battalion to confront the most threatening period of reconstruction. That the incident left Noske as securely seated in the saddle as before was indicated by the severe measures he was able to adopt in preventing the general strike set for Nov. 5 in support of the metal workers' walkout. The Berlin headquarters of the Independent Socialists were occupied, a meeting of street railway employes was dissolved, the Executive Council of Workmen's Delegates dispersed, and the thoroughfares of the city paraded by formidable military patrols.

According to reports reaching the American authorities at Coblenz, the passenger embargo held a master stroke concealed within the ostensible reason of necessary coal distribution. Minister of Defense Noske, it was declared, was determined to eliminate as far as possible the threatened danger of a repetition of the events of the year before, when the revolutionists used trains out of Kiel and other places to travel quickly to places where outbreaks were planned.

DEATH OF HUGO HAASE

Hugo Haase, President of the Independent Socialist Party, died on Nov. 7, at the age of 56, from the effects of shot wounds received from an Austrian, Johann Voss, while entering the Reichstag Building on Oct. 8. Haase was prosecuting Voss on a charge of extortion, and, it was alleged, the assault was committed from personal motives, though a political cause was sought. Haase was about to attack the Government severely, charging it with fostering sinister actions against the radicals through "murder bureaux."

Hugo Haase was one of the most notable figures of the German revolution, and personally a man of high integrity. He served several terms in the Imperial Reichstag, and was President of the German Social Democratic Party. He opposed the war, but served for a time at the front. When the Imperial Government fell in November, 1918, Haase entered the first Coalition Cabinet, but shortly retired after disagreement with his colleagues. Thereafter he waged a strenuous political fight against the Ebert Government.

While preparations went forward to house the ex-Kaiser in his recently purchased mansion at Doorn, Holland, it was said he had secured several villas in the neighborhood for the large personnel with which he intended to surround himself. The first authentic photographs of the former Emperor and Empress since taking up their residence at Amerongen were obtained in October by a photographer concealed in a hay wagon; one of them, showing the Kaiser's changed appearance, is reproduced in the portrait section of this magazine.

With reference to questions asked in the British Parliament as to what measures had been taken by the Dutch Government to prevent the ex-Kaiser and ex-Crown Prince from leaving Holland, it was stated officially at The Hague on Oct. 29 that no measures had been taken to that end, as these two personages were considered entirely free to leave when they chose to do so. Any measures taken in guarding them, it was added, were only with a view to their personal safety and were paid for by them.

The former Crown Prince continued to reside on Wieringen Island. Frequent visits of important personages between Germany, Amerongen and Wieringen were noted and held to portend renewed activity among the German monarchist parties.

The Most Famous German Prisoner

Field Marshal von Mackensen's Release

THE Supreme Council of the Paris Peace Conference decided on Nov.

10, 1919, that Field Marshal von Mackensen, one of Germany's most famous Commanders on the Eastern front and the only one of his rank to become a prisoner of the Allies, should be permitted, in view of his advanced years and poor health, to return to Germany from Saloniki, where he had been interned since Oct. 8.

This decision recalled one of the interesting and dramatic episodes of the war. When hostilities ceased in November, 1918, von Mackensen was in command of the German troops in Rumania. Menaced on his line of retreat by French and Serbian divisions on the Danube, he decided to abandon Rumania and to march back into Germany at the head of his soldiers. With difficulty he made his way through the passes of the Carpathians, through which he had made a triumphal passage a few months before, and came down in good order toward the Hungarian plain. Meanwhile, however, the French General Henrys had signed at Belgrade with Count Karolyi, then Hungarian Premier, an armistice agreement which stipulated that the German Army in Rumania, together with its leader, should be disarmed and interned in Hungary.

Checked in his retreat, von Mackensen sought to attain by strategy what he could not gain by force. First of all, he declared that he could not be responsible if his soldiers, who, being "very undisciplined," (as a matter of fact they were highly disciplined,) refused to obey his orders. When asked to give his word of honor that he would not try to escape, his answers were ambiguous. His army, numbering some 80,000 men, rapidly melted away; the soldiers, profiting by the difficulties in the way of disarming and interning so large a force, departed bag and baggage on their own trains.

Then came news that von Mackensen himself, who was residing at the Château de Foth, the property of Count Karolyi, near Budapest, was preparing for flight. Colonel Vix, who commanded the French Mission at Budapest, on hearing these tidings toward the end of December, at once asked permission from Belgrade to detain him, as the armistice had stipulated, and asked for troops to effect his arrest. From Belgrade General Henrys ordered four squadrons of spahis in the Temesvar to proceed at once to Foth. Soon afterward special trains bore the spahis, under the command of Colonel Guesperau, to their destination. Meanwhile the surveillance of the château, which had been intrusted to Lieutenant Genevrier, was drawn closer; but von Mackensen's baggage had already been sent ahead, while his own departure was fixed at 5 o'clock in the morning. There was not a moment to be lost.

Lieutenant Genevrier left Budapest by automobile Dec. 30 at 10 o'clock in the evening. Arriving at 11, he posted his agents in the shrubbery around the castle and cut all the telephone wires that connected von Mackensen with his headquarters in Budapest. According to the schedule communicated to him, the spahis were due to reach Budapest at midnight. Through poor railway service they did not arrive until 4 or 5 in the morning. In an hour the two divisions that had reached the Hungarian capital marched to Foth. Meanwhile the long delay had upset all the calculations of Genevrier, who with intense expectation watched all night for the spahis to appear. Hiding under a balcony, Genevrier heard one of von Mackensen's officers attempt to ring up Budapest three times, curse the telephone girl when he received no answer, and strike the telephone—whose wires had been cut—with his fist.

Genevrier's situation became embarrassing and delicate. Fearing that von Mackensen's Hungarian guard might detect his presence and give the alarm to the prisoner, who would at once take flight by motor car, he conceived the bold plan of seeking out that guard himself, allaying their suspicions, and holding them in converse until the arrival of the expected troops. This project met with complete success. Representing himself as a French officer charged with a mission at Vacs, a small town not far from Foth, he explained in very decent German that his automobile had broken down, and asked the guard to send some men to aid his chauffeur—who was in the secret—to find the imaginary trouble. Meanwhile he kept the Hungarian officer diverted and amused by his conversation until about a quarter after 8.

Hearing at last the sound of hoofbeats, for which his strained ears had so long been listening, he rose, smiled to his host, and said: "Lieutenant, I thank you for your hospitality. I am off now. My mission has been fulfilled." "Where are you going?" asked the Hungarian officer. Lieutenant Genevrier opened the door and showed the Hungarian officer the spahis already posted in the park. He then left the astounded officer and went to Colonel Guesperau to report to him that von Mackensen was still in the château.

Guesperau at once demanded to see the German Field Marshal. Furious, von Mackensen refused to see him. Guespereau insisted. Von Mackensen sent word that he was a prisoner of the Hungarian Government, and that he recognized no other authority. Guespereau still insisted, and refused an offer to speak with one of von Mackensen's officers. "I have orders to see Marshal von Mackensen," he replied inflexibly, "and I will see him, with or without his will." At last von Mackensen gave way. Seated at his table in an apartment on the first floor, he growled surlily when Guespereau appeared on the threshold: "Bonjour, Monsieur!" Guespereau answered him, then immediately withdrew and posted his spahis in an iron ring around the château; a French officer was placed in the room adjoining that of von Mackensen to watch his every movement.

A few days later, on Jan. 6, 1919, a special train bore the German Field Marshal to the château of Count Chotek, (brother of the wife of the Austrian Archduke Ferdinand, assassinated at Serajevo in 1914,) in the surroundings of Temesvar. According to the terms of the armistice the Marshal could be interned only on Hungarian territory. Until early in October von Mackensen remained at this place. He was then transferred to Sa'oniki, where he and his officers were installed in a large and comfortable house opposite the French aviation field and overlooking the Aegean Sea. None of the allied officers or troops saluted him when he walked along the streets. Finally, on Nov. 10, the Supreme Council at Paris released him, a disillusioned and broken man of 70, who had ended a brilliant military career ingloriously. [See illustration, Page 443.]

Terrible Privations in Central Europe

By H. N. BRAILSFORD

[CORRESPONDENT OF THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN]

This brief account of one British observer's impressions was written in October, 1919, and covers four months of the Summer and Autumn. The further privations of the Winter were still to come.

THE most convincing accounts of the distress in Central Europe have come from travelers who went out deliberately to report upon it. I, on the other hand, in a sojourn of nearly four months, saw only so much of the misery as forced itself on my notice. After spending two days of my first week in visiting the poorer quarters of Vienna, I confess that I consciously fled from any further evidence of the efficacy of our blockade. The political and intellectual consequences of war and famine were for me absorbingly interesting, and in sheer cowardice I turned away my eyes from the unbearable physical misery which I should have witnessed if I had continued those first visits to soup kitchens, working-class schools, and hospitals.

One might flee from these sights, but none the less they lay in wait daily, almost hourly, for any traveler with eyes and ears. What impressed me most was not the misery of those who had gone under, but the signs of poverty and decayed vitality among people who normally are comfortable. I frequented in Vienna a pleasant but rather cheap and homely restaurant near several big Government offices. Many of its habitués were Foreign Office clerks. After two or three visits the atmosphere began to depress me. I was almost the only guest who sat alone; the others were all in groups of two or three. And yet the room was nearly silent, and no one stayed very long. One day I was so impressed that I had the curiosity to watch narrowly for an hour. I was literally the only guest who took more than one dish, and during that hour I neither heard a ripple of laughter in a big full room nor saw a smile. This was among middle-class people, mostly young, in what used to be the gayest city of the Continent. I read next day a documented article in the Arbeiter Zeitung on "The Misery of the Intellectual Proletariat." The plain fact was that these officials were all of them half-starved, and literally so poor that they could not afford to buy a bare sufficiency of food.

A similar impression came to me one day in Lodz. I was taken to see a model school, with a kindergarten, subsidized by the wife of a multi-millionaire mill-owner. The children were those of foremen, engineers, and managers. My guide took me to it as one of the few happy and creditable sights in that starving and workless town. The children, who were washed in the school, were spotlessly clean (only the well-to-do can be clean where soap is almost unobtainable), and many of them were pretty. They sang for me, but I noticed that after the first few bars most of them fell silent. It was an action song. Healthy children make vigorous movements, and usually overdo them. These children, with the wan, pinched faces, and the voices that died away to a whisper, faintly agitated their hands in the symbol or reminiscence of a movement. Hunger and fatigue had taught them to economize energy.

Every one knows by now that the working classes in Vienna are three-quarters starved, and would have starved completely but for the admirable organization of soup kitchens by that most humane and kindly city. There was much more food in Warsaw and Lodz when I was there, but also there was much less efficient relief. The glimpse that I had in two days of two industrial towns in Saxony suggested that they were only a little less poverty-stricken than Vienna. What few seem to realize, however, is that the rural districts are also in acute distress. In the Polish countryside, for example, there was a sufficiency of bread and potatoes, but even when the peasants owned a cow or a pig their children never tasted milk or bacon. The reason was obvious when I discovered that the average money wage of an adult laborer for a whole year would just have sufficed, at the prices then ruling, to buy two coarse shirts or one pair of rough boots. The children in these villages, even in cold weather, were only half clothed, and the bedding in most of the cottages consisted largely of sacking.

Vienna was a nightmare. It was pitiable to see the swarms of half-naked children who waited outside the city for the trains coming from Hungary (at that time Hungary had food), and ran beside them along the line for hundreds of yards, crying "Bitte, ein Stück Brod." Nor shall I ever forget the sight of women during a Communist riot, gathering actually under rifle-fire, the coal from an overturned cart, while others cut a policeman's horse, that had been shot, into butcher's meat in the middle of the Ring.

But Vienna was not the worst. The eastern border zone of Poland, which the Cossacks burned and devastated as they retreated in 1915, was in the grip of literal famine.

Almost every shop in Pinsk was closed when I was there in March; there was nothing to sell. I went into the one co-operative store which remained open out of five, to discover what stock it had. It was selling salt, and absolutely nothing else. For days the orphanage and the almshouse had been without bread or fuel. When I pointed to the distant woods and asked why no one fetched fuel from them, the answer came that the horses had all been eaten up, and the two or three still left were too weak to walk. Most of the poorer families were living on potatoes, carrots, or chestnuts. Typhus was raging in the town, and still more severely in the villages. It was no uncommon thing for the poor to fall dead in the street from mere exhaustion as they staggered round to beg; I saw two such cases myself in one morning.

The villages were in worse case than the towns, and peasants, in groups of ten or twenty, would journey a hundred miles and back to buy flour. That is no guess estimate. I met such a party myself. The worst part of the case was that only a limited use could be made of the dilapidated railway to pour in supplies, for all its rolling stock was needed for the insensate war against the Bolsheviks.

Desperate Conditions in Austria

Personnel of the New Cabinet

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 18, 1919]

THE makeup of the reorganized Austrian Cabinet, the acceptance of which by the National Assembly was noted in a Vienna cablegram of Oct. 17, was given as follows by the Neue Freie Presse:

Chancellor and Foreign Minister—Dr. KARL RENNER.

Vice Chancellor—JODOK FINK.

Secretary of the Interior—MATTHIAS ELDERSCH.

Minister of Justice—Dr. RUDOLF RAMEK.

Secretary of Military Affairs—Dr. JULIUS DEUTSCH.

Minister of Finance—Dr. RICHARD REISCH.

Secretary of Agriculture—JOSEF STOCKLER.

Secretary of Commerce—JOHANN ZERDIK.

Secretary of Transportation—LUDWIG PAUL.

Secretary for Social Administration—FERDINAND HANUSCH.

Secretary of Food Supplies—Dr. JOHANN LOEWENFELD-RUSS.

Secretary for Constitutional and Administrative Reforms—Prof. Dr. MICHAEL MAYR.

Under Secretary of Education—OTTO GLOCKEL.

Under Secretary for Cults—WILHELM MIKLAS.

Under Secretary for Justice—Dr. ARNOLD EISLER.

Under Secretary for Military Affairs—Dr. ERWIN WAISS.

Under Secretary for Social Administration—JOSEF RESCH.

Under Secretary of Commerce—Dr. WILHELM ELLENBOGEN.

Under Secretary for Health—Dr. JULIUS TANDLER.

By the end of October all reports from Austria pronounced the situation well-nigh desperate. It threatened the existence of the Government. The former Austrian Empire, now confined within the narrow boundaries of one of its shorn provinces, was dependent for food and coal upon none too friendly neighboring countries, and drifted helplessly toward bankruptcy. The war appeared to have shattered Austria beyond repair.

"Vienna is a changed city," wrote a correspondent from that capital. "The outer shell remains as beautiful as ever, the Stefansturm still raises its proud head as heretofore, the palaces still gleam in the sunshine, the Danube is still blue; but the old gayety is gone, the Ringstrasse lacks its old-time animation, the children seem to have forgotten how to laugh and play, and poverty and want haunt the streets. Demobilized soldiers in rags tramp the thoroughfares, pictures of misery, begging as they go." The correspondent added that there remained practically no coal, and quoted food prices as having reached staggering figures. With Bolshevism fostered by the distress and unrest among the masses, those still hoping for a rehabilitation of the country could see no other means but a union with Germany, a step banned by Versailles.

Meantime, the Government proceeded from one temporary or dubious expedient to another in attempts to pacify the discontented. On Sept. 13 an order was issued expelling 130,000 war refugees, mostly Galician Jews. These unfortunate people were unable to return to their devastated homes. On the same date the Government refused to accede to Hungary's demand for the extradition of Bela Kun, the former Communist dictator of Budapest. A message of the 29th stated that the famous Skoda arms and munition works had been nationalized, and a new council of six Czechs and three Frenchmen had been named to conduct the factory.

The fiscal year which ended Oct. 1 disclosed that the Government had spent 8,441,000,000 kronen, while its total income was 3,444,000,000. The deficit was met by printing paper money, so that the krone sold for 1 cent American money, though normally worth 20 cents. Driven by the prospect of widespread starvation in the capital during the coming Winter, the City Council passed a resolution on Oct. 17 appealing to America for assistance. Further urgent appeals were dispatched by Dr. Adolph Lorenz, the famous surgeon, and Mrs. Albert Halstead, wife of the American Commissioner. Mrs. Halstead wrote on Nov. 14 that 2,500,000 persons were in sore straits, and that death from cold faced the children unless warm clothing was provided. On Oct. 25 the announcement was made that Dr. Giest, organizer of the American work for children's relief in Vienna, had been appointed food dictator for the Winter months. Over a million inhabitants of Vienna would thus come under his care. By Nov. 12 conditions had become so much worse that deaths of new-born infants and their mothers, from too low a temperature even in the hospitals, had become distressing.

The Government was rumored to be contemplating the desperate experiment of a dissolution of the Austrian Republic, whereupon each constituent province would proclaim its union with Germany. It was said the People's Guards, as the new Austrian Army was termed, would support the upheaval, since the various allied commissions, except those engaged in purely charitable work, had done nothing but draft reports and waste public funds, which irritated the Viennese in the face of onswEEPing bankruptcy and beggary. At celebrations of the anniversary of the founding of the Austrian Republic at Vienna on Oct. 14 gloomy speeches predicting a collapse were delivered. The Burgomaster of Gratz declared "German-Austrian workmen will never abate their demand for union with Germany." Two merchants of Vienna, J. Henry Kuhn and John L. Geggenhofer, who had arrived in New York with passports numbered one and two, confirmed, on Nov. 16, the serious conditions in Austria as due mainly to lack of coal, food, and raw materials. Mr. Kuhn said the Hungarians had spent millions of crowns in vain propaganda to "bolshevise" the Austrian farmers and workmen. He added that since the regions of Austria's former food supply were now cut off, and her farmers could produce only enough for three months' consumption, the majority of his countrymen would like Austria to become an American province.

Poland's War With the Bolsheviks

Protests Against Treaty Articles

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 15, 1919]

IN a long statement before the Polish Diet on Nov. 13 M. Paderewski, discussing the war against the Bolsheviks, said that Poland's sacrifices had been heavy, but that the effort was indispensable for the security of the present and future generations. It was impossible, he declared, to make peace with the Bolsheviks. He was loudly acclaimed when he thanked the countries which had assured Poland's independence—France, England, Italy, the United States and Japan—and paid tribute to the patriotic spirit of the Poles in America for the aid which they had sent the new republic.

Important manifestations occurred shortly before Oct. 8 at Lemberg in favor of the absolute reunion of all Eastern Galicia to Poland, and against the establishment of any Provisional Government of any kind. The division of Galicia into east and west, it was declared by prominent Poles at this time, was purely artificial, devised by the Austrian Government to foster antagonism between the Poles and the Ruthenians. Ruined financially and economically, Eastern Galicia could not exist independently, and must be annexed to a neighboring State. But annexation to any other State but Poland, it was alleged, would mean the strengthening of German influence and the weakening of Poland, which was Germany's main aim.

Municipal elections in Upper Silesia on Nov. 12 were watched with keen interest because of their bearing on the coming plebiscite. The returns indicated that the Poles had obtained 75 per cent. of the votes cast. The Pan-German organ of Upper Silesia, the Kastowitz Zeitung, declared: "Upper Silesia is lost to us." Polish organs held that a plebiscite was now unnecessary. On Nov. 13, however, the Supreme Council, after discussing these elections, drew up a note advising Germany to disregard them and to carry out the original plan of a plebiscite.

The main provisions of the arrangement concluded between Germany and Poland for the exchange of prisoners taken in connection with the insurrection in Galicia were as follows:

All prisoners taken by the Germans as a result of the revolt in Upper Silesia are to be released, and all sentences passed on such persons to be annulled. The Poles are to set free all German prisoners of war. Further, nobody is to be punished for military, political, or national action within the territories assigned to Poland or in those districts in which a plebiscite is to be held, when such action took place before the present agreement became binding. Persons released under this agreement are to be at liberty to return to the place where they formerly lived, and will not there be subject to any restrictions. The appointment of a joint commission to superintend the carrying into effect of the agreement is also provided for.

In an open letter addressed to the allied nations by leading citizens in Poland, a detailed statement of wrongs done Poland under the peace settlement and by hostile foreign opinion, especially in regard to the charges of Jewish massacres, was made for the world's judgment. This letter, which reflects Polish public opinion and is a review of Poland's whole case, protests against the loss of Danzig, the taking of a plebiscite in purely Polish districts, or in districts like Upper Silesia, where the majority element was Polish; the internationalization of the Vistula, which irrigates almost half of the territory of the Polish State; the atrocities of Galician Ukrainians against Polish nationals, and the widely advertised charge that Poland has tolerated Jewish massacres. The thirty-four Jewish people killed at Lemberg, the letter states, were, according to verified reports, caught shooting at the Polish troops. Other stories of Jewish pogroms in Poland were invented by the Germans and other enemies of Poland. The statement concludes with an expression of deep gratitude to the allied nations for all that they have done for Poland, and an appeal to their good faith in repudiating false information circulated by Poland's worst enemies—Jews, Ukrainians, Germans, Bolsheviki, and others.

Prince Casimir Lubomirski, first diplomatic envoy from the new republic to the United States, arrived in New York on Oct. 10 with his family and legation staff. Discussing affairs in Poland, he said:

Food conditions are better in Poland, but we need wheat and raw materials, especially cotton and wool, so that the idle men can be put to work. It is also of vital importance that the Entente Allies send a strong neutral force into the countries where the people are to vote on which nation they shall be joined to, so that the vote shall be fairly conducted without pressure from the German element.

In Upper Silesia 75 per cent. of the people are unskilled and uneducated Polish workmen who are powerless to assert their rights because the land owners, mine owners, Magistrates, school teachers, and owners of all factories and industries are Germans. If a man were known to vote against them he and his family would be turned out of their home. Each day of delay in the ratification of the Peace Treaty by America is a day lost to the interests of Poland in these territories, and a day's gain by Germany.

When I left Poland the Constitution was being drawn up. When it is completed a Freemant will be elected and a government formed on a stable basis. I do not understand why any one should believe that the Jewish population, which forms about 11 per cent. of the total, will not have equal rights and liberties with the Polish people.

The Allies should establish a strong line through neutral territory from the Baltic to the Black Sea to keep out the Bolsheviki. We have about six millions of Poles in that country between the Rivers Dniester and Dvina, and have an army there to fight the Bolsheviki and assist the Allies. My sister hid in swamps and forests fourteen months after being driven from her home by the Bolsheviki, and her three sons were captured and have not been heard of since.

Germans in the Baltic States

How von der Goltz and Bermondts Gained a Foothold in Russia, and How They Were Driven Back

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 20, 1919]

THE attack upon Riga by the pro-German Russian commander, Colonel Avalov-Bermondts, on Oct. 8, and the establishment by him of a dictatorship at Mitau on behalf of a "General Russian Government," gave rise to a mass of comment in the foreign press concerning the origins of the movement initiated by him in Latvia and the manner in which the roots of the German military power, of which Avalov-Bermondts's force is said to be but a ramification, were implanted in the Baltic territory.

From the confused mass of comment and explanation certain things are clear. The formation of General von der Goltz's "Iron Division," which participated with Avalov-Bermondts in the assault on Riga, was practically the creation of a German official named Winnig, a Social Democratic Army Commissioner representing the Berlin Revolutionary Government, who was sent to the Baltic soon after the armistice to reorganize the German Eighth Army, which was already breaking up in confusion. The commander of this army, von Kalthen, was persuaded by Winnig to form a complete division of 6,000 men to fight the Bolsheviks. For this venture, however, only 600 volunteered. Appeals made by Winnig to the Prussian War Minister for reinforcements in the Baltic proved vain. Winnig then induced the Lettish Government, by working on its fears of the Bolshevik peril, to issue a charter conferring Lettish citizenship and full political rights on every German soldier who agreed to fight for a month on the Letts' behalf against the Bolsheviks. This charter occupies a very important position in the present developments in the Baltic. [For the text of this charter, see the November CURRENT HISTORY, Page 304.]

Five days after this document was signed, on Feb. 3, 1919, the Bolsheviks occupied Riga. Armed with his charter, Winnig returned to Berlin and opened recruiting offices there while the German revolution was in full blast. His agents—though Winnig now asserts without his authority—told all prospective recruits that not only would they receive from the Lettish Government full rights of citizenship, as provided in the charter, but also inalienable grants of land for homestead construction, of which the charter made no mention. The rebellious soldiers in the army under von der Goltz subsequently based their refusal to evacuate Courland on these promises, which were not fulfilled.

ARMY UNDER VON DER GOLTZ

Winnig's volunteers soon mounted up into the hundreds, and were sent off in large batches to Courland, where they were put under command of General von der Goltz, who had just come from Finland. At the end of January he found himself at the head of a small but ever-growing army, which was receiving, as it has received ever since, all the supplies it needed direct from Germany. Winnig was promoted to the post of "Imperial Army Commissioner for the East" and left the further development of the Baltic Province forces to others. He subsequently became Governor of East Prussia, in succession to the former Food Dictator, von Botocki.

After Winnig's departure, this Baltic army grew rapidly in size, and was splendidly armed and equipped. It was openly stated in Vorwärts, one of the pro-Government organs of Berlin, that the maintenance of von der Goltz's army was costing the Government 800,000 marks a day. After the armistice the allied Governments themselves asked von der Goltz to remain with his troops in the occupied territory for the sake of stabilizing the conditions there. Subsequently, after reports of their high-handed and arbitrary actions in connection with the Letts, whom they attacked, reached the Entente's ears, Germany was summoned to withdraw these troops. Ostensibly Germany endeavored to do this, but von der Goltz professed powerlessness to enforce evacuation, on the score of the promises of land grants previously made, and remained for many weeks with his forces in the occupied territory, despite the demands of the Entente and of his own Government. Many of the German soldiers, especially Bavarians, joined the pro-German Russian formations of Colonel Avalov-Bermond, thus escaping from German jurisdiction. Meanwhile both the pay of von der Goltz's soldiers and full food supplies for his combined forces continued to arrive from Germany until the Entente menace of a renewal of the blockade brought Berlin to a realization of the seriousness of the situation created by the rebellious German Baltic troops.

GERMANY'S APPEAL

Following the receipt of the first ultimatum, sent by the Paris Supreme Council on Sept. 28 (the text of which was printed on Page 304 of CURRENT HISTORY for November), the German Government made public on Oct. 3, through the Wolff Telegraph Bureau, the following appeal to the troops of General von der Goltz:

Soldiers! You have read the last note of the Entente in respect to the evacuation of the Baltic States. The Entente threatens us with the resumption of the blockade, with the stoppage of credits, and with the refusal of the supply of raw materials. The Entente military authorities insist on a further advance into German territory, including the occupation of Frankfurt.

The Government appeals for the last time to the conscience and patriotism of the German soldiers in the Baltic States. The Government has never denied that the German soldiers have been recruited under conditions which were not kept. We have not failed to explain to the Entente that for this reason unrest and indignation prevail among the German soldiers in the Baltic Provinces. But now a great deal is at stake. The nation will starve and national property will be lost if the German troops do not evacuate the Baltic States during this month. Those who do not want to be guilty of contributing to the ruin of their own nation must bow before the stern necessity of the situation, and obey the order of the Government to evacuate the Baltic States.

The Government, in the interests of Germany, must not leave any doubt that it has used all the means at its disposal to enforce the evacuation. But it hopes that this appeal will suffice to convince the German soldiers that this is a case in which the interest of the whole nation is involved. Our opponents have raised the blockade, and it is for you to secure that this weapon of warfare which wrought more deadly havoc among our ranks than any other shall not be used again. Obey the order for evacuation.

REPLY TO ENTENTE NOTE

The next day the following note was handed to General Nudant, the head of the Interallied Mission in Berlin, for transmission to the Supreme Council:

In answer to the note of Sept. 28, the German Government attaches the greatest importance to demonstrating the fact that it has been continually making the most energetic efforts to withdraw the troops from the Baltic district and Lithuania.

For that purpose it ordered, among other things, on Sept. 25, that such detachments of troops as might not obey the order to withdraw would be deprived of their pay, as well as of any claim to supplies in the future. And in order to prevent any possible sending of reinforcements the German frontier bordering on Courland was closed, and an order was given to fire upon the troops who might try to cross that line. Any dispatch of munitions was also strictly forbidden. General Count von der Goltz has been recalled from the east. In his place, until the complete execution of the return of the troops, General von Eberhardt has taken over the command of all the troops east of the German border. Finally, the German Government issued an appeal to the troops reminding them of their duty and impressively pointing out to them what incalculable dangers and sufferings they are bringing upon the heads of their fellow-nationals if they continue their disobedience.

All these measures should have protected the German Government, even in the judgment of the allied and associated Governments, from the unjustified reproach of employing the insubordination of the German troops as a pretext for letting its obligations as to the evacuation of the former Russian territory go unfulfilled. The allied and associated Governments are sufficiently informed regarding the condition created in Germany by the Peace Treaty to be bound to admit that the German Government has no further military means of compulsion at its command.

So far as the entry of German troops into Russian formations is concerned, the German Government is decidedly opposed to such action. And it has repeatedly made its opinion known to those concerned in no uncertain terms. It has never granted permission for such entries. The German Government has the firm desire to do all in its power to fulfill the obligation of evacuation. On the other hand, it is obliged to make a very sharp protest against the fact that the note of Marshal Foch contains threats regarding measures of compulsion calculated to cut off Germany's imports of foodstuffs through a renewal of the blockade. The allied and associated Governments can hardly have forgotten that it was the hunger blockade that was responsible, not only for the death of hundreds of thousands of women, children, and ill persons, but also, through the weakening of the ability to work because of chronic undernourishment, for no small part of the manifestations of disintegration under which Germany suffers so greatly at present. The German Government voices, rather, the confident expectation that the allied and associated Governments will recognize its good-will and therefore will refrain from using inhuman war measures against the German civilian population, which surely is not responsible for the conduct of the troops in the east.

REGION BETWEEN MITAU AND RIGA.
WHERE GERMANS ARE ATTEMPTING TO RETAIN HOLD ON BALTIC STATES

But in order to give an opportunity to the allied and associated Governments to convince themselves of the extreme earnestness of its conduct the German Government asks them to enter into a consultation with it on the necessary measures. For this purpose it proposes the immediate formation of a commission made up of German representatives on the one side and representatives of the allied and associated Governments on the other. It is the opinion of the German Government that this commission, after an examination of the situation, should have the task of working out measures and seeing to it that they are put into effect. The German Government begs that a commission about this matter be sent to it at once.

BISCHOFF'S PROCLAMATION

How little effect the German Government's appeal to its soldiers in the Baltic region had upon General von der Goltz's subordinates was indicated in the following proclamation by Major Bischoff, commander of the "Iron Division," made public in Mitau on Oct. 5:

Soldiers of the Iron Division!

The Entente has threatened the German Government with a renewal of the blockade of Germany if you do not evacuate Latvia. The Government calls to you, "Lay down your arms," as in November, 1918. Just as you were then deceived, so you are again being deceived.

In April you raised your voices before me against the shameful and annihilating peace. But it is only now that you see for the first time that the peace is intended to destroy the German people, not only economically and politically, but also physically. This peace treaty has a thousand paragraphs, and not one of them is capable of being carried out! Not a single one! Just as it today seizes upon Paragraph 202, tomorrow the Entente will seize upon another as a pretext to throttle the German people. Therefore, this threat of the Entente must not be allowed to frighten us, either. Compliance by us would not help our homeland, anyway. In a few days the same game would be begun again. Everything said by the Entente is a lie. The only time it does not lie is when it openly declares that it is striving to extirpate the German people with every means, even the most immoral.

In April the American Military Mission here in Mitau made it clear to me that the Iron Division ought to take Riga. At that time peace was established, even though not yet ratified. I ask the whole world, so far as it in general still possesses a spark of morality not suffocated by lies, whether, then, the Entente still has a right to use Paragraph 202 of the Peace Treaty against us. Nevertheless, it does so. So we wish to deprive it of the formal right to apply force to our Government and our home on our account.

We want to put the land that we, and we alone, conquered, under the Russian flag. We want to help the Russians liberate their home from the scourge of humanity. You know that I am German and that I shall remain German to the last drop of my blood, so you will believe me when I say that you can follow me in this course without hesitation, and that I wish to work for Germany here, too, while helping our friends.

Side by side with the corps of Count Keller we wish to defend our rights, and, if it must be so, to win them again by fighting. If the Entente hinders us in doing this, too, it is merely looking for an excuse to strike the German people. So stand fast, soldiers of the Iron Division! And if the Englishman incites Letts and Estonians against us, then we will show that we are worthy of our name.

BISCHOFF,

Commander of the Iron Division.

On learning of this proclamation, Gustav Noske, German Minister of Defense, told the National Assembly on Oct. 7 that Major Bischoff would be court-martialed for having defied the Government.

ALLIED ULTIMATUM

As there was no indication that the German forces in the Baltic region had taken the Government's appeal seriously, and as, in the meantime, the German-Russian troops of Colonel Avalov-Bermond, including the Iron Division, began an assault upon Riga, the Supreme Council, after a week's deliberation, dispatched the following note to Berlin:

The allied and associated Governments have noted the intention formally expressed by the German Government in its note of Oct. 3 to undertake and to continue in the most energetic manner the withdrawal of its troops from the Baltic and Lithuanian regions. They also appreciate the nature of the measures taken to this effect by the German Government. When, however, the German Government affirms that the measures taken by it must absolve it from the accusation of having neglected to fulfill its obligations in honor bound, as fixed by the armistice clauses, it must be pointed out that, notwithstanding the repeated requests and remonstrances of the allied and associated Governments, the orders of the German Government were so long deferred that the said Government now declares that it is practically impossible for it to cause them to be carried out.

It is difficult not to believe that this delay was deliberately arranged to give the results which the German Government now affects to deplore. It would appear to be really impossible to explain in any other manner its refusal to recall General von der Goltz, who was its official agent in the matter of creating the present situation—a situation characterized by overt resistance to the legitimate behests of the allied and associated Governments. Why was the recall of the General refused, although asked for three times? Having been called to Berlin not more than a day or two ago, why was he purposely sent back to his theatre of operations if not to complete (thanks to the authority of his official command) that organization which now allows the German Government to plead that the troops which have hitherto been paid, clothed, and transported by that Government, have now freed themselves from its authority?

Has General von der Goltz acted contrary to his instructions? If so, why was not his insubordination punished either by formal dismissal or by some other means? Unless the German Government furnishes more satisfactory explanations regarding this question than it has hitherto done, the allied and associated Governments will be unable to admit that the German Government has, in accordance with its affirmation, done all in its power to withdraw the German troops from the Baltic States. It has, moreover, transpired, from the latest news received from Latvia, that the situation has suddenly changed for the worse owing to the offensive undertaken by the Germans on Oct. 8, when they violated the German-Lettish zone, bombarded the Lettish positions with armored trains, airplanes, and asphyxiating (gas) shells, threatened the town of Riga, and brought about the formation in Courland of a German-Russian Government opposed to the established local Government.

In view of this state of affairs, the allied and associated Governments uphold the principle of the German Government's entire responsibility regarding the carrying out of the evacuation and intend to maintain, in their entirety, all the coercive measures announced by their telegram of Sept. 27, so long as the evacuation shall not have been finally undertaken and carried through with all desirable speed.

With the object, however, of assisting the execution of this operation and of assisting the German Government, the allied and associated Governments agree to send out allied representatives whose mission shall be: (a) To take cognizance of the measures decided on by the German Government for the purpose of regulating the conditions of evacuation, as also to suggest to it such measures as they may consider to be necessary. (b)

To exercise on the spot and with entire liberty of action an effective control over the execution of such measures. A general officer appointed by the allied and associated Governments will preside over the allied commission.

The suspension of the measures referred to in the telegram of Sept. 27 cannot be considered before such a general officer shall have informed the Supreme Council of the allied and associated Governments that the evacuation operations are proceeding normally. The German Government is requested to make its reply known as soon as possible. It is informed that the allied and associated Governments hold it responsible for any act of hostility against their representatives in the Baltic Provinces on the part of German troops.

GERMANY'S REPLY

The German Government's reply to this uncompromising communication was received by the representative of Marshal Foch on Oct. 16. It read as follows:

The allied and associated Governments for the first time on June 18 requested the German Government to evacuate the Baltic Provinces and Lithuania, while in May they had demanded, and, in spite of the German protest, insisted that the German troops should not be withdrawn from these regions.

The German Government has since done all in its power to carry out the withdrawal of the troops and to overcome the opposition of the troops who have been promised Lettish citizenship by the Lettish Government.

The German Government has withheld pay, food, and other supplies from the subordinate troops, and, further, has taken all necessary measures to prevent any munitions or reinforcements crossing the German frontier to the troops.

The German Government has not declined to recall Count von der Goltz, but only pointed out that this was a matter which concerned German internal affairs. As a matter of fact, Count von der Goltz was recalled, and it was only after a mutiny had broken out in the Iron Division soon after his departure that he decided to return to Mitau on his own responsibility. His return temporarily was tolerated by the German Government only because von der Goltz appeared to have sufficient authority with the mutinous troops to make them obey the Government's withdrawal order. He actually succeeded in inducing some of the troops to obey the order. But as his further endeavors were a failure, he was definitely recalled and ordered to come to Berlin.

Meanwhile General von Eberhardt took over the command as his successor.

The German Government has not recognized any new Government in the Baltic regions nor has it had any relations with such. It has strictly forbidden German soldiers to enlist in Russian formations, and broke up all connection with those who did so. There is not a single soldier among the Russian troops in the Baltic Provinces over whom the German Government has any power of command. In General Avalov-Bermond's recent offensive no troops under German command participated.

General Avalov-Bermond's political and military designs are not in any way approved by the German Government.

Germany has no warlike designs whatever either against the Lettish or Russian peoples.

The German Government takes note that the allied and associated Governments intend to send an interallied mission to the Baltic States, and requests that this mission may be dispatched as soon as possible, and that it may make a brief stay at Berlin for an interview with the German authorities there.

The mission will, on its own judgment, surely come to the conviction that the reproaches made against the German Government are not justified.

BERMOND'T THANKS GERMANS

Meanwhile Colonel Avalov-Bermond't, after establishing himself firmly in Mitau, announced his intention of restoring order in the parts of Western Russia freed of Bolshevism in the name of Great Russia. On Oct. 7 he transmitted to the German representative at Mitau the following note, embodying high tribute to the services of the German troops against the Bolsheviks:

To the National German Government:

Supported by the Central Council for West Russia, organized Oct. 7, I have, in the name of Great Russia, taken over the task of restoring legal authority and discipline in the parts of West Russia freed of Bolshevism.

As the representative of the executive power of the Russian State, I do not wish to overlook this opportunity to express Russia's thanks to the National German Government for the memorable services performed by the German troops in saving the Russian border provinces from Bolshevism. Following the withdrawal of the German troops I shall take over the protection of the territory occupied by my troops. I shall give special attention to insuring the transportation from here of the German troops.

I have every confidence that, in the work of crushing Bolshevism and its widespread disintegrating influence in the Russian State, I shall find in all nations the comprehension necessary to wipe out this menace to the world and to insure peace and development in freedom to all states.

AVALOV-BERMONDT, Colonel.

Senator PAHLEN, President of the Central Council for West Russia.

LETTS DRIVE BACK INVADERS

Bermond's projects, however, built on the possession of a military base, were embarrassed by the Letts' obstinate resistance at Riga, their refusal to accept an armistice, and the receipt of a wireless ultimatum from the British naval commander at Libau to evacuate Thorenberg, the village west of Riga where he had established himself. In reply he said that, after successfully safeguarding a strategic base for an offensive against the Bolsheviks, he had offered the Letts an armistice on Oct. 10, and requested support for its acceptance to avoid further bloodshed. Premier Ullman, however, head of the Lettish Government, complained on Oct. 22 that German troops in regular regimental formation were being allowed to cross the frontier and participate in hostilities against the Lettish Army. Major Bischoff, he asserted categorically, was in charge of the offensive against Riga.

At this time the Letts were resisting the German attacks successfully. Up to Oct. 27 the Germans had not succeeded in crossing the Dvina, and held only two out of the ten districts of Courland. An attack on the northern defenses of Riga was repulsed on Nov. 8, and the Letts, advancing under cover of a bombardment, drove the troops of Bermond from the immediate suburbs of Riga. In an offensive which continued four days the Lettish troops pushed back these forces several miles along the entire line, freeing Riga completely from the menace of the invading forces.

Shortly afterward (Nov. 15) it was reported by the Lokal-Anzeiger's Königsberg (East Prussia) correspondent that Avalov-Bermond's troops were retiring on Mitau, and that his so-called Western Central Council and headquarters staff were preparing to evacuate Mitau and retire to Shavle. The Lettish troops were encircling Mitau. On Nov. 19 it was announced semi-officially at Berlin that General von Eberhardt, in Mitau, was arranging for the immediate return of the troops from the Baltic States to Germany by rail.

The Red Terror in Kiev

One of the Blackest Chapters in Bolshevik History—Seven Months of Rule by Murder and Torture

WHEN one of General Denikin's armies drove the Bolshevik forces from Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, in the first days of September, 1919, the world learned for the first time of the horrors which the inhabitants had suffered under a small group of murderous Red leaders. The Bolsheviks had regained control of Kiev in January, and had terrorized the whole population for about 200 days. On every one of those 200 days of Bolshevik occupation there were executions under the orders of the Chresvechayna (commissions for combating the counter-revolution). When a London Times correspondent reached the city by airplane from Warsaw on Sept. 17 he found it a place of horrors.

"I do not know," he wrote, "of any other town in which the Bolsheviks have left such ghastly traces of their fiendish work as they have here. No one knows how many persons perished, but reckoning by the number of bodies which have been found (buried or unburied), there must have been at least 2,000 victims. The anatomical theatre of the university was used as a mortuary for the executed dead, and the volunteer army when they entered the city found about 200 corpses lying there in a state of horrible putrefaction. In a room in a private house 140 more were found, locked up and left to rot.

"Even today, a fortnight after the delivery, a terrible odor, which chloride only partially stifles, invades one's nostrils continually in certain parts of the town. Among the 'sights' of Kiev are the houses where the two Chresvechaynas, the one for Kiev, the other for the Ukraine, held their sittings and tortured their victims, either to wring information from them or, as it appears in many cases, simply from a fiendish pleasure in human suffering.

"The Kiev Chresvechayna, which was accounted the most cruel, sat in a house in the street of Sadovaia, a gloomy by-road, darkened by the thick foliage of horse chestnut trees. Behind it is a small garden, in which is a shallow pit not five feet deep. From this were taken the bodies of 124 persons, who were murdered a few days before Kiev was captured—one night's work. Many of the bodies were mutilated by having pieces of skin in the shape of epaulets cut from their shoulders and strips from the thighs in imitation of the stripes on an officer's trousers.

"At one side of the garden is a garage or coachhouse. This was used as the place of execution. The walls are pitted with revolver bullets and splashed with red stains; the floor is still glutinous; the smell makes one turn away sickened after a very short inspection. An English governess, Miss Billingsley, who lives in this street, has told me of the awful shrieks which could be heard coming from this house night after night. The house itself is littered with an almost comic collection of objects, apparently looted by members of the committee from private houses. There are furniture of all kinds, clocks, toys, a bird cage, photographs, gramophones, books, heaped together anyhow. The first volume picked at hazard from a big pile proved to be a Tauchnitz copy of Mark Twain's 'The Innocents Abroad.'

"The house of the Ukraine Committee has a similar slaughterhouse, also a garage. This is, if anything, worse than the other. There is an inspection pit, which was used as a drain; from it there comes up the horrible reek of blood. A common chopping block beside it is soaked in it. An old bayonet lies on the floor near by. Twelve bodies were found in the garden here, stuffed anyhow into a pit and barely covered with earth."

The strangest part of the Kiev episode is the fact that a handful of soldiers—perhaps 5,000 in all—and about 200 men, none of them educated, and almost all newcomers to the city, the majority of them dissipated and diseased, were able to hold for seven months a population of 200,000 in slavish subjection. One reason was that on entering the city the Bolsheviks searched every drawer, cupboard, and cranny for firearms; another was that the people were constantly in a state of semi-starvation. A Kiev journalist, Jean Kalinnikov, who has long studied Bolshevik methods, adds the further explanation that the Moscow Government has worked out a deliberate system of rendering a population supine by terror.

A special correspondent of The London Morning Post, who visited Kiev, wrote on Sept. 19:

LATSIS AT WORK

"In Kiev the man who performed this all-vital work for Lenin and Trotzky was a brother-in-law of the notorious Peters of Petrograd. His name was Latsis, and he is a Lett by birth. Soon after the Bolshevik occupation in January he was sent on from Moscow to become chief of the Commission for the Suppression of Counter-revolution in Kiev—the Kiev Chresvechayna. Concerning the man's earlier antecedents I was not able to get any exact information, except that he was a Jew and had been identified with the Bolshevik movement from the beginning. However, I have a photograph of Latsis, seated in the middle of a group of all the members of the Kiev Counter-revolution Commission. Short, dark, untidily dressed, his countenance seems to express a kind of cheery confidence, the expression of a man on the crest of the wave and sure of himself. His eyes have in them a quality of rat-like intelligence, and Latsis was intelligent; at least, he was intelligent enough to have contributed an analytical article to the Bolshevik publication, the Red Knife, on the subject of tortures. At any rate, it was Latsis who was the real power in the Bolshevik control of Kiev, and it was he who manufactured the Red Terror for the city's 200,000 people.

"Latsis's system forbade a beginning of his operations until about nightfall. At the end of the day he would gather around him, generally at No. 5 Sadovaia—a great, gloomy house that had once been a private residence, and is set darkly within the shade of a dense bank of horse chestnut trees—the other members of the Kiev Commission, and there plan out the evening's work. I was told that there was always much immoderate drinking at these sessions, and in poking about the premises I came upon several barrels filled with empty wine and vodka bottles. Latsis himself, however, had the reputation of being temperate. It would be about 10 o'clock, or a little later, when four or five automobiles would set out from the Sadovaia establishment, scattering in several directions, and roaring through the streets on a round of visits to search homes for concealed firearms or food, to drag back some so-called suspect for examination, or to make one of Latsis's arbitrary 'arrests,' which were reckoned equivalent to a death sentence.

"A woman in Kiev, who lived near the house in Sadovaia, told me that night after night for nearly seven months she turned positively ill at the sound of those Chresvechayna motors. The searches, under Latsis's handling, contributed not a little to the creation of the terror. Very skillfully he endowed them with the element of surprise. For instance, in Kiev all through the Bolshevik régime there were Dr. Lipinsky, Professor of Neurology in Kiev University, and his family. Lipinsky was a man whom the Bolsheviks, on account of his private wealth, his well-appointed home, his prestige, his position, and influence, would have liked to do away with. There were elements of danger in Dr. Lipinsky. But Latsis could not quite bring himself to arrest and accuse the professor. Lipinsky maintained a hospital, of which he was the chief physician. It was the best conducted institution of its kind in the city—a fact which Latsis was entirely capable of realizing. * * *

TRIALS AND EXECUTIONS

"Nothing could have been more disgraceful than the so-called 'examinations' conducted by Latsis and his underlings at the house in Sadovaia. A 'suspect,' torn from his bed in the middle of the night, attired without dignity, would be dragged there to the principal room of the dwelling. Perhaps six or eight of the Chresvechayna would be ranged at one side of a long, plain board table; not infrequently some were intoxicated, some under the influence of drugs, some throughout the proceedings fondling a woman of his fancy as lewd as himself. Latsis, always, it appears, quite collected, would preside. From such a tribunal none expected justice; life seemed to depend upon the whim of some distorted, irresponsible brain; an 'examination' was, as Latsis desired it should be, a first-class torture in itself. Frequently 'suspects' were freed, sometimes they were tortured, not infrequently they were taken to the stable in the rear and summarily executed. Once within the Sadovaia portals there was nought one could do but pray; there was no guessing one's fate. All the city knew this, and a summons in the night—thousands of examinations were made—brought all the terror of a death decree.

ROSA SCHWARTZ'S CRIME

"There was one episode at the Sadovaia place that contributed not a little to Kiev's paralysis of fear. Among the number of celebrated scholars included in the Faculty of the University of Kiev was Dr. Florinsky, one of the greatest of all authorities on Slavic history and law. The city was very proud of Dr. Florinsky, and he enjoyed enormous respect and influence there. At the time of the coming of the Bolsheviks, Dr. Florinsky, like a great number of the other professors in the university, did not flee, because it was reported then, and generally believed, that Lenin and Trotzky had abandoned their policy of attempting to exterminate the intellectuals, and were, on the contrary, trying to coax them into the movement. He stayed on. During the early days of the occupation the Florinskys underwent the 'search,' but nothing worse. However, upon a night in June, a Chresvechayna motor stopped before the professor's home, and a young man routed him from his bed.

"The doctor insisted upon dressing carefully, and that irritated the youthful agent of Latsis. About 2 in the morning they reached the house in Sadovaia, where Florinsky was to be 'examined.' The usual gathering was there, including, as usual, Rosa Schwartz, a Kiev prostitute, who was used as an agent by Latsis, and was in effect an unofficial member of the Chresvechayna. Dr. Florinsky entered—a tall, grave, white-haired figure.

"The doctor was a man of a ripeness and dignity not easily to be exaggerated. Schwartz, a dark, impudent type of woman, bedecked with diamonds, for she always wore much jewelry, demanded the privilege of examining the professor. Latsis agreed. At length she put a certain question; I did not learn what the question was, but at it Florinsky stiffened and drew erect. The situation is readily conceived; the embodiment of all that is noble in the world on the grill before all that is ignoble in the world, the prostitute harrying the saint. The historian's reply was slow in coming. At Schwartz's elbow lay a small revolver which she invariably kept by her. In a sudden spasm of emotion she fired, and Florinsky was dead, and within a few moments his body had been cast into the dark garden behind. Mme. Florinsky subsequently recovered the body by making a payment of 25,000 rubles.

"The news of Florinsky's death staggered Kiev. If they would kill him none could be immune! Would the Schwartz woman suffer? Not at all! To the Chresvechayna life was less than nothing. To enter the house in Sadovaia was death. Thus went the talk after the shooting of Professor Florinsky, which Latsis made not the smallest effort to excuse or conceal. The episode and the reaction it produced were all in accordance with the plan which he had been sent from Moscow to carry out. It intensified the enslaving fear of the Red Terror in Kiev."

METHODS OF TORTURE

There were many forms of torture used in Kiev, but in a rough way they are divisible into three classes. First, beatings were employed. Second, there were decrees of executions, some of which the Chresvechayna intended eventually to carry out, and did carry out, some of which were merely threats to terrify. Third, there were what may be most conveniently termed the "confinement" tortures. Of these The Morning Post correspondent wrote:

"In this group of cases the underlying idea was to imprison a person, who was entirely uncertain whether he or she was later to be killed, with the bodies of others who had already met death. Frequently, as in the case of Mme. Vasilyra, the subject of the torture was compelled to witness the execution of the persons with whose lifeless, often mutilated, bodies he or she was later to be confined. The imprisonment was sometimes made in a tiny room—always the room where the execution had occurred. Some of these rooms I have visited—at the houses in Sadovaia Institutskaia. These were windowless holes with spattered walls, and floors still glistening, despite heavy overlays of chloride of lime, with blood, and none too sure to the foot by reason of human particles as yet unrecovered. The mind recoils from the thought of what those rooms must have been on a hot Russian night, when powder smoke still clung heavily in the air, and the very rafters still echoed with dying screams.

"But not always were the imprisonments made in these rooms. Latsis, in creating the Terror, had variety. And a Chresvechayna device was to imprison a person condemned to the 'confinement' torture in a coffin with the corpses of those whom he or she had a few moments before seen die. These imprisonments would last from twenty-four to ninety-six hours. Dr. Kraynsky, Professor of Psychology in Kiev University, who heads a committee appointed by the Faculty of the university to investigate the entire subject of tortures and executions carried out by the Bolsheviki, told me, and Countess Natalie Medivedieff, a Russian Red Cross sister, confirmed his statement as he made it, that he knew of more than thirty cases of insanity in Kiev as a result of the 'confinement' tortures.

EXECUTIONS

"Actual execution, however, was the great weapon of the Terror. Apparently executions were carried out in two ways. Upon occasions victims were struck over the head with a heavy, sharp instrument that caused profuse bleeding and also instant death, but more frequently simple shooting was employed. Most of the executions were carried out by Chinese troops, but not all.

"There are aspects of the Red Terror in Kiev which I have ignored. For example, a great number of bodies were thrown by the Chresvechayna into the operating theatre of the medical school of Kiev University; every one in the city knew the bodies were there; boys used to lift each other up to look through the iron palings at the gruesomeness within. Soon after the day when the Bolsheviki arrived until the day they left the anatomical room of the university was a known horror pit.

"The entire story seems horribly unreal. One has a sense that none of the chapter I have recorded could possibly have happened in our day. But it did happen. Professor Lipinsky has declared to me that it happened. Dr. Dietrichs, the Professor of Surgery in Kiev University, has affirmed it; so, too, has Professor Kraynsky, the psychologist, and the very cool-eyed Countess Medivedieff of the Russian Red Cross. There were others, including General Bredov, Denikin's representative in Kiev. I could go on at much greater length, but it is not necessary. The case is this: A handful of alien commissaries, with only a most slender garrison at their command, held the 200,000 people of Kiev in utter subjugation for seven months. They did it by propagating fear, by scientifically creating, with methods in large degree indicated from Moscow, a Red Terror.

NO RUSSIAN LEADERS

"Who are the Bolsheviki of today? That was a question to which by many means, direct and roundabout, I tried to find an answer. In the first place, as Kiev knew the Bolsheviki, they are utter aliens—Letts, Finns, internationalized Jews, Rumanians, anything except actual Russians. Rokowsky, the nominal head of the Bolshevik Government in Kiev, was a Jew, born a Bulgarian, naturalized as a Rumanian; Latsis, head of the Extraordinary Commission for the Suppression of Counter-Revolution in Kiev, and in reality the master of the city, was a Lett—a Lettish Jew—and there were a few Jews in the movement who had been in America long enough to obtain citizenship.

"In the leadership of Bolshevism in Kiev there was not a single bona fide Russian, not a single man who had ever been known of or heard of in the city before the occupation. It was an alien invasion, a crowd of strangers, who came in to strangle the town. And it was aliens whom the Rokowsky-Latsis gang used for the chief work of the terrorization that paralyzed and atrophied the population—that is to say, Chinese mercenaries. Kiev for seven months was under the domination of a group of complete strangers. The workmen of Kiev, the thousands employed in the foundries and sugar refineries were, practically speaking, entirely dissociated from the Bolshevik movement.

"At the beginning, in January, 1919, many of the workers seemed to see a possibility that through Bolshevism they might obtain easier hours and a larger remuneration than they had been receiving. Essentially their attitude was for a time noncommittal and neutral. But this period soon passed. The factories closed; food rose to impossible prices; horrors began to become commonplaces. 'We thought we saw through to the light,' said a petition presented by 30,000 workmen to General Bredov, Denikin's representative, when he entered the city, 'but we did not see then the hand that was holding the light.' However, there was an element in Kiev that did join up with the Bolsheviks. Professor Kraynsky told me that about 200 strangers came into the city to enforce the communistic order, that these aliens had about 5,000 troops at their command, and that they could incidentally call upon something like 500 other persons in Kiev.

"These other persons were not laboring people at all, nor were they persons with any definite trade. In the main, they were shop assistants, economic ne'er-do-wells, rolling stones of industry, who saw in the Bolshevik invasion a chance that the normal ways of life did not offer. Latsis used them, but precisely in so far as they served his ends. They were, according to all testimony, unwitting dupes of the movement, and the only actual Kiev residents in the smallest way involved.

"Three professors of the university escaped with their lives because they were medical men. I have it upon the testimony of all three of these: First, that with the exception of a very few of the prime leaders, like Latsis, those who exercised control in Kiev were syphilitic; second, that a considerable number were addicted to the use of drugs; third, that they were alcoholic. In short, there is responsible testimony that there was very little normality in the entire Bolshevik Government of Kiev. The head of the Government, Rokowsky, was a fop and a fool and a laughing stock."

TWO IRISHWOMEN'S STORY

Miss Eva and Miss Eileen Healy, daughters of the former member of Parliament, Thomas Healy, were among the forty or so British residents of Kiev during these six months of Bolshevism. They gave the following statement to a Reuter correspondent:

Our first experience of Bolshevik liberty was at Kiev in 1918, when over 3,000 officers were shot only for the crime of defending their country against the Germans. We saw long rows of corpses clad in underlinen in the square before the palace, inside of which drunken "comrades" were dancing and capering about the place. There were more rows of corpses in the public gardens of all ages, from mere boys to old men of seventy.

The last six months, when the majority of the members of the Kiev Chreavechayna were always under the influence of drink and drugs, transcended all conceivable awfulness. At every Chreavechayna huge heaps of empty spirit and wine bottles and scores of morphine and cocaine bottles were found. The members sat before a cage with wooden bars reaching to the ceiling. The prisoners were marched through the cage to be reviled and sentenced to death. Afterward they were stripped naked and carted off to the slaughterhouse.

Among the exhumed bodies was that of a young woman with a child of 2 or 3 years old closely tied to her. Both had been shot through the head. The Sister of Mercy, Sister Martinova, who was accused of sheltering officers, was violated, and her breasts were cut off before she was killed. A lady of over 60 years of age was taken out on several successive nights and placed against a wall and shots were fired all around her head. This was done to extract information as to the whereabouts of an officer's son whom she did not know. She also was finally murdered. Other barbarities, including the crucifixion of a priest, could be enumerated. The Bolsheviks explained that all such deeds were committed "for strategic purposes."

The chief guilt for Russia's bloody era falls on the trio Lenin, Trotzky, and Peters.

The Reuter correspondent who transmitted this statement estimated the total number of Bolshevik victims in Kiev at more than 4,000.

Russian Factions in Death Grapple

Bolsheviki Drive Back Yudenitch—Omsk Evacuated by Kolchak—Soviet Peace Offers

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 15, 1919]

THE desperate and sanguinary conflict of opposing forces in Russia continued through the months of October and November. After virtually reaching the City of Petrograd, the Northwestern Army led by General Yudenitch was driven back to its original starting point at Yamburg by large Bolshevik reinforcements. The Estonian and other Baltic Governments subsequently planned to resume peace negotiations with the Bolshevik Government and a conference of the representatives of the Baltic States began at Dorpat on Nov. 9.

The Bolshevik Armies advanced so close to Omsk that the Kolchak Government removed its offices to Irkutsk and the former capital was evacuated by civilians, hospital and interallied units. On Nov. 15 a Moscow wireless reported its capture and the withdrawal of the Kolchak forces to the east. The successes of Denikin in the south continued, but toward the middle of November the Bolsheviki were progressing also in this theatre, and Denikin, who was holding a front of 1,300 miles with a comparatively small army, and who was much harassed by marauding bandits, was advancing his offensive toward Tula, the Bethlehem of Russia and the key to Moscow. On Nov. 15 it was reported that the whole eastern coast of the Black Sea had been seized by a large insurgent army operating in Denikin's rear.

Soviet Russia during this period suffered much from cold and famine, but the Bolshevik's confidence apparently suffered no abatement, though they reiterated their readiness to make peace with the Allies whenever terms might be arranged. The formal blockade of the Entente and the virtual blockade by the United States continued. Germany, to United States continued. Germany, after long consideration of the subject, finally returned a definite refusal to the request that she associate herself with the interallied blockade of Petrograd.

ON THE NORTHERN FRONT

After the departure of the British and other allied troops from Archangel little fighting occurred between the Russian forces and the Bolsheviki. Where fighting occurred the North Russians gave a good account of themselves. About Oct. 25 the Russian forces repulsed a Bolshevik attack on Povenietz and inflicted great loss upon the enemy, who were driven thirty-three miles from Onega. Several villages were captured. The important railroad junction of Plessetskaya, with an armored train and many prisoners and guns, was also taken. The Archangel newspapers regarded the capture of Plessetskaya as a notable success, and rejoiced at the unaided achievements of the North Russian Army, declaring that its position was better at that time than it had been before the departure of the Allies, who, they asserted, had underestimated the North Russian strength.

A further advance of the North Russians occurred shortly before the end of October. The anti-Bolshevist forces had reached Birumshev, 150 versts south of Onega, where they had formed a junction with the forces operating on the railway front. In the Onega sector the capture of 2,000,000 cartridges and 1,000 shells was reported. The road along the Onega River was found strewn with the bodies of soldiers and horses, and with vehicles which had been mired and abandoned by the Bolsheviki.

THE PETROGRAD FRONT

The offensive begun by General Yudenitch on Oct. 10 brought the forces of the Northwestern Government virtually within the suburbs of Petrograd by Oct.

18. Gatchina, twenty-five miles south of Petrograd, was captured from the Bolsheviks on Oct. 17, while the Esthonians, acting in conjunction with Yudenitch, had arrived within four miles of Krasnaya Gorka, facing Kronstadt. Reports that Kronstadt had surrendered proved untrue. Yudenitch also established himself at Krasnoé Selo and Ligovo, twelve miles from Petrograd, but only after hard fighting. Strong resistance was encountered at Pulgovo, about seven miles south of Petrograd, compelling General Yudenitch to halt his advance and concentrate his forces while awaiting reinforcements and heavy artillery. Bolshevik forces concentrated at Gdov, on Lake Peipus, and, threatening the rear, were dispersed. Fighting still proceeded six miles north of Krasnoé Selo, and along the Windau Railway, while the Bolsheviks and the forces of General Yudenitch kept up a heavy bombardment.

SCENE OF YUDENITCH'S ATTEMPT TO TAKE PETROGRAD

Already at this time the stiffening defense of the Soviet Army showed the effect of the heavy reinforcements which the Reds had drawn from the northern front, and fears of the Bolshevik advance which occurred soon thereafter drove long processions of peasant-folk, with their carts of household effects, along the road toward Gatchina, which General Yudenitch had made his base. A slight advance had been made to a point just short of Tsarskoe Selo, in the face of an obstinate Bolshevik resistance.

YUDENITCH DRIVEN BACK

The threatened advance of the Bolsheviks began to be fulfilled about Oct. 24 with an offensive against Pavlovsk and Tsarskoe Selo, in which the forces of Yudenitch were driven back. Their left flank was under fire from a Bolshevik dreadnought lying in the Neva. On Oct. 25 Yudenitch announced that his cavalry had pushed forward to Tosno, a few miles southeast of Tsarskoe Selo and twenty-five miles east of Gatchina, but admitted that his forces had been repulsed at other points. By Oct. 27 the success of the Bolshevik counteroffensive was clearly outlined. The Bolsheviks, after taking Tsarskoe Selo, had moved on Krasnoé Selo and thrust the Yudenitch line back south of this place, and to the west six miles from Gatchina. At this date Yudenitch was daily losing ground, and complained bitterly of the refusal of Colonel Avalov-Bermond, the pro-German Russian commander, whose forces had attacked Riga, and who had been nominally under his command, to aid him in his offensive against Petrograd.

Meanwhile the Bolsheviks were making a wing movement in an attempt to cut off Gatchina and reach the railroad. Stubborn fighting was proceeding, while the Bolsheviks were daily growing stronger. Sporadic offensives of Yudenitch proved fruitless, and by Oct. 29 he was falling back along his entire line, being compelled to abandon Gatchina and to remove his staff headquarters to Yamburg, sixty-eight miles from Petrograd on the road to Reval. In an official communication to an Estonian paper General Yudenitch admitted that his offensive on Petrograd had failed "because of lack of assistance." On Nov. 1 Trotzky declared officially that the danger of Petrograd's capture had been definitely removed.

BOLSHEVIST ADVANCE

Meanwhile fierce fighting was continuing in the Finnish Gulf region, and the Bolsheviks had advanced all along the line against the retreating forces of Yudenitch. The occupation of many villages in the Luga-Gdov sector, to the east of Lake Peipus, was claimed by Bolshevik dispatches. Gdov had been captured by Nov. 8, and the anti-Bolshevik troops driven fifteen miles south of Yamburg. The Bolshevik pressure was increasing hourly from the north and south, despite heroic resistance offered by the personnel of the armored trains to check the Soviet advance. The forces of Yudenitch lacked both food and munitions. A Bolshevik wireless stated that the pursuit of General Yudenitch's retreating forces was continuing along the whole front. The Soviet troops had advanced to within twenty-five versts southeast of Yamburg, and were driving the enemy northwest of Gdov.

At this time all hopes entertained by anti-Bolshevik sympathizers of the success of General Yudenitch's offensive had vanished, though on Nov. 11 he announced the recapture of Gdov, and though officials of the Northwestern Government stated on Nov. 13 that plans were being made for a new campaign.

APPEAL TO FINLAND

Strong pressure was brought by the Northwestern Government on Finland to persuade that country to throw its strength into the balance against the Bolsheviks. With this object Stefan Lianosov, head of the Northwestern Government, proceeded to Helsingfors from Reval on a British torpedo boat destroyer to conduct negotiations. On Oct. 31 M. Lianosov declared that Petrograd could be taken in three days with the help of the Finns, who had an army of 35,000 men, of whom some 15,000 were stationed on the Russian frontier. The Finns, he said, would aid in the struggle if the Allies consented to finance them, and give them guarantees of Finland's future independence. The situation at the front, he said, was critical, as the Bolsheviks numbered from 50,000 to 60,000 men, and were fighting desperately: they had led eighteen successive attacks on Tsarskoe Selo before they had captured it. The assistance of Finland, he declared, would turn the scale in favor of Yudenitch.

Both Lianosov and Margulies had been cordially received by a Finnish conference consisting of President Stahlberg, Prime Minister Dr. Holsti and the Chief of Staff. The President, said M. Margulies, though not in favor of official intervention, was well disposed to the suggestion that Finland should send troops to assist in the taking of Petrograd. On Oct. 31 the question came up in the Finnish Parliament in the form of an interpellation relative to Finland's future policy; in his reply the Premier stated that Finland would co-operate with the Allies and the Baltic States in opposing Bolshevism. After an all-night debate, forty-four members of the Diet voted the statement unsatisfactory, and moved to refer the matter to the Foreign Relations Committee for further investigation. The answer was considered satisfactory by seventy members—seventy-five Socialists abstained from voting.

Meanwhile, on Nov. 2, General Justus Mannerheim, the former Finnish Premier, addressed an open letter to President Stahlberg demanding Finland's immediate intervention in the campaign against Petrograd, which, he declared, "the whole world is urging." On Nov. 4, however, it was stated from Helsingfors that the Finnish Government had informed General Yudenitch that it was unable to co-operate with him for the deliverance of Petrograd. The reply set forth that it was impossible to accede to General Yudenitch's appeal owing to Finland's internal political situation, her weak finances, the uncertainty of obtaining war materials, and the fact that the Entente had not guaranteed that future Russian Governments would recognize Finland's independence. Soon after this the offensive of General Yudenitch collapsed.

THE DORPAT CONFERENCE

An attempt to arrange a conference of the Baltic States to bring about peace with the Bolsheviks had been begun by Esthonia in Pskov before the Yudenitch offensive. With the collapse of this offensive the plan was pushed more energetically, and on Nov. 6, seven representatives of Esthonia left for Dorpat, the place chosen for the conference.

THEATRE OF THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN THE REDS AND GENERAL DENIKIN'S FORCES SOUTHEAST OF MOSCOW.

Here they were joined by delegates from Lettland, Lithuania, Poland, Finland, and the Ukraine, the three last named being unofficial delegations. Informal discussions were held on the 7th, 8th, and 9th, and the first general meeting of the conference took place on Nov. 10. White Russia also was represented. M. Piip, Estonian Foreign Minister and head of the Estonian delegation, had sent a preliminary dispatch to Moscow expressing a desire to confer with the Soviet delegates regarding the liberation of prisoners and the cessation of hostilities. Esthonia's attitude was further stated by Premier Strandemann as follows:

For Esthonia it is not a question of peace with the Bolsheviks, but of a cessation of hostilities in order to save our existence. We cannot fight indefinitely: our financial and economic condition will not permit this. Our military supplies are exhausted, those from England having ceased, and Esthonia and the other border States have no reason to fight longer . . . It is too early to speak about terms. I think, however, it would be possible to bring about an armed truce, somewhat like the state of things existing between the Bolsheviks and Finland. . . . As for Esthonia's sacrifice, the occupation by the Germans stripped the country of foodstuffs, horses, machinery, and other necessities. In November, 1918, came the Bolshevik invasion, which we have documents to prove was instigated by the Germans. The Bolsheviks overran three-quarters of Esthonia, committing wholesale murders and atrocities. Last June the offensive by the German General von der Goltz began. As a result of the wastage in the years of fighting, the country is worn out.

So far, the Estonian Premier said, the allied Governments had offered no objection to the Baltic League project and the suggested peace with the Bolshevik Government.

M. Tchitcherin, the Soviet Foreign Minister, sent a radiotelegram to the Estonian Premier on Nov. 13, demanding guarantees of safety for the Bolshevik representatives at the Dorpat conference. M. Piip replied assuring Tchitcherin of safe conduct and immunity from arrest for the delegates. On the afternoon of Nov. 16 the little Estonian city observed with keen interest the arrival of four Bolshevik representatives, headed by Maxim Litvinov, former Soviet ambassador to England. The conference was still in session when this issue of CURRENT HISTORY went to press.

[For the struggle of the pro-German Russian commander, Colonel Bermond, for possession of Riga, and the problem of getting the German troops of von der Goltz out of the Baltic territory, see page 483.]

THE SOUTHERN FRONT

After the capture of Orel in the middle of October, with 3,500 prisoners, Denikin's forces seized Chernigov, southwest of Moscow, and recaptured a junction town north of Voronezh. Heavy Bolshevik attacks southwest and east of Orel were repulsed with heavy losses to the enemy. The Don Army was kept busy meanwhile in defense operations against cavalry attacks led by the Bolshevik General Budenny, following the raids of the Cossack leader Mamontov, along the Don. Kiev was temporarily occupied by the Bolsheviks on Oct. 15, but they were finally driven out; the city was still held by Denikin's forces on Oct. 27, though the anti-Bolshevik troops had been compelled to withdraw at some points south of the city.

By Oct. 20 Denikin's battleline extended from Kiev to Kharkov, and along the Don to Tsaritsin. Pressure was being exerted by his army at various points, despite the handicap of insufficient munitions. Denikin's objective at this time could be drawn by a line bisecting Saratov, Penza, and Tula (120 miles south of Moscow), as the three main points of a triangle whose apex pointed straight at Moscow, and whose base controlled the Ural region. In this base sector, on Oct. 22, the Bolshevik forces were thrown back near Kamyshin, sustaining a loss of 3,000 prisoners and many machine guns. The Bolshevik authorities at Tula, at the apex of the triangle, after a visit from Trotsky in his armored train, began fortification work in anticipation of an advance of Denikin's army as far as this city.

NEW BOLSHEVIST OFFENSIVE

Spurred by the increasing menace of Denikin's steady advance, the Bolshevik forces began a general attack along a 700-mile front from Tsaritsin to Kiev. They scored successes at Voronezh and Orel, which they recaptured, but were unable to check Denikin, who by Oct. 25 had advanced from forty to forty-five miles on a 120-mile front, taking many prisoners and much material. Yelets, midway between Voronezh and Tula, and 230 miles southeast of Moscow, was also captured. Harold Williams, a correspondent with Denikin's armies, admitted, however, on Oct. 28, that the resistance of the Bolsheviks was stubborn in the extreme. The Bolshevik commanders, some of whom were formerly Generals in the army of the Czar, were exerting all their strategical and tactical resources to avert disaster.

Despite the loss of Voronezh and Orel, the anti-Bolsheviks held Yelets, a most advantageous position, and won a great improvement on their flanks; Tsaritsin had been held against desperate attacks by General Wrangel and the Bolsheviks driven northward toward Kamyshin; this success, combined with a northeasterly drive of the Don Cossacks from the Middle Don, had removed the Bolshevik menace to Denikin's eastern flank, which had impeded his operations in the centre.

In the alternating battle for supremacy Orel again changed hands (Oct. 30), and General Denikin resumed his advance on Moscow. The Reds had brought up a large number of troops and were exerting pressure on both sides of the Orel salient in an attempt to relieve the central advances on Moscow. Some successes were won by Denikin at this time, including the capture of a Soviet division of 3,300 men, on the Khoper River, the capture of Bobrov, southeast of Voronezh, and the capture of another town with 1,000 men.

For nearly a fortnight no news of importance came from Denikin, but on Nov. 12, a communiqué was given out by him admitting the loss of Alexandrovsk, and the abandonment of Dmitrievka. The Reds declared that in taking the latter town they had inflicted a severe defeat on Denikin's army, and asserted further that Denikin's front had been broken over an extent of forty-seven miles, that Denikin had suffered heavy losses, and that the Bolshevik Cossack division had advanced 105 miles in three days.

DENIKIN'S TROUBLES

A constant handicap under which General Denikin had to struggle was the disturbance to his rear by the hostile attitude of unfriendly populations, replete with propaganda to attain some national aim. Under this category came the hostility of General Petlura, the peasant Ukrainian leader, between whom and Denikin a state of war had been declared. But Petlura was far from being Denikin's only opposer in South Russia. Three Ukrainian bands had been operating for some time behind his lines, robbing stragglers and holding up trains. Of these, the most formidable was the band of Makhno, in the Province of Ekaterinoslav, which was anti-Semitic, and the band of Shubé, which attacked trains between Kiev and Poltava. The inhabitants of the Kuban district, also, gave Denikin considerable trouble, until he entered into an agreement with them which relieved the situation. The district of Astrakhan, on the Black Sea at the mouth of the Volga, had fallen under Bolshevik control.

Petlura saw in Denikin the representative of reactionary monarchism; Denikin refused to encourage the separatist tendency embodied by Petlura and the Ukrainian Government. There were also intimations that Petlura was conducting his campaigns with the aid of German money. This charge was confirmed in an official report made by General Edgar Jadwin, member of the Morgenthau Jewish Commission and one of the ranking officers of the American Army, who, in company with an Intelligence officer, traveled for three weeks through the Ukraine, visited Denikin, and also Petlura, and saw much of the latter's army. Petlura's source of supplies was frankly and avowedly German, General Jadwin reported, and Petlura's justification was that only the Germans would help him. General Jadwin described Petlura as a man of considerable intelligence, and much determination to maintain Ukraine's absolute independence. His civil Government scarcely deserved the name of Government at all; and his army was a mere aggregation of scattered guerrilla units; there was little discipline or co-ordination, the various leaders making war on the Bolsheviks or upon General Denikin's forces as they saw fit.

FIGHTING A BANDIT FORCE

About the middle of October, after Petlura's declaration of war on Denikin, he was joined by the bandit leader, Makhno, who, after having been defeated north of Odessa, had returned to his old haunts, the eastern side of the Dnieper and the region north of the Sea of Azov, and had raided several towns in Daghestan, in Northeastern Caucasus, where an insurrection movement had begun. Denikin had dispatched troops to this spot to put down the insurrection and capture the bandit leader. On Oct. 29 a Moscow wireless reported that large bodies of both Petlura's and Makhno's forces were joining the Red Army. Several towns along the Dnieper had been taken by the insurgents southeast of Kiev, while Makhno had captured Alexandrovsk and was besieging Elizabetgrad. On Nov. 15 it was reported that a number of important towns on the eastern coast of the Black Sea from Eilershik to Sochy had been taken by a large insurgent army operating in Denikin's rear.

Severe fighting occurred between Petlura's forces and those of Denikin on Oct. 30, and the Petlura troops were driven from several villages. On Nov. 4 Denikin concluded an armistice with Petlura, by the terms of which Denikin was to evacuate the Ukraine, but after a lull of a few days the battle was renewed. An Ukrainian dispatch of Nov. 9 said that Denikin had been driven across the Bug River, leaving many prisoners and much booty and war material in the hands of the Ukrainians. A later dispatch from Denikin, however, said that 30,000 Galicians had joined the volunteer army and taken Petlura's army in the rear, and that the Ukrainians, in consequence, intended to lay down their arms.

At this date General Denikin sent a telegram to the Paris headquarters of the American Red Cross, thanking that organization for the assistance which the populations of Southern Russia had received from it. This telegram was as follows:

In these epoch-making days, which demand superhuman effort and self-sacrifice from every true Russian, the American Nation has once more proved the depth of its historical devotion to real liberty and progress by stretching out its hand to Russia in an effort to save world civilization from the corruption of the Bolsheviks.

I beg you to accept my profound thanks for the numerous gifts of the American Red Cross through its commission to South Russia and for assistance given soldiers and wretched populations, and express to you and the American people the deeply felt gratitude of the Russian people, who will always remember these acts of generosity.

THE SIBERIAN FRONT

A summary of military events on the Siberian front given out Oct. 12 showed that at this time the right flank of the Kolchak armies had passed Tobolsk and was driving toward Tumen; the centre was advancing slowly eighteen miles west of Yalutorovsk, the left wing was within thirty miles of Kustany, and in the south the fight had been carried to within three miles of Orenburg. Ural Cossacks were driving the Reds before them seven miles from Uralsk. Then the tide turned. Petropavlovsk, 166 miles from Omsk, was captured from Kolchak at the end of October, with 1,500 prisoners. The rapid progress of the Red forces was indicated on Nov. 12, when a Moscow wireless announced that the Bolsheviks had taken Ishim and occupied Kochubayev Station, eighty versts west of Omsk. The question of whether Omsk, the Kolchak capital, should be abandoned or defended was bitterly debated; owing to a difference on this point General Diedrichs, commander of the western armies of the Omsk Government, was superseded by General Sakharov. Admiral Kolchak and the members of his Government on Oct. 31 expressed their determination to remain and defend Omsk in spite of all advice and dissuasion.

Evacuation of civilians and Government offices, however, was decided upon. A constant stream of carts and trucks took away the civilians' household goods, and in freezing weather civilians, Government aids, sick and wounded, were taken away in unheated box cars. The plans of defense were outlined by the Russkoye Dielo, which stated that a decisive battle would be fought between the Rivers Ishim and Irtysh, and that Omsk would be fortified and surrounded with trenches as a centre of defense. The newspaper Russ called upon all to rally around the Government, realizing that the situation was critical, and that an ultimate choice must be made between Lenin and Kolchak.

The allied military representatives regarded the situation as grave. All the allied missions finally left on Nov. 6, except the Japanese. The American Red Cross hospitals and the Government offices were provisionally transferred to Irkutsk. The American Vice Consul was left to maintain contact with the Kolchak Foreign Office at Novo Nikolaevsk.

A Moscow wireless on Nov. 15 asserted that Omsk had been occupied by Bolshevik forces, and that the troops of Kolchak were retreating to the east. Up to the time these pages went to press, this claim had not been confirmed.

IN EASTERN SIBERIA

General Semenov, an anti-Bolshevik leader, held up a train bearing part of a consignment of 68,000 rifles recently shipped from America to Admiral Kolchak at Chita, Trans-Baikalia, on Oct. 24, and demanded that 15,000 rifles be delivered to him by Oct. 25. The American Lieutenant who was guarding the assignment with a small force of fifty soldiers telegraphed to General Graves for instructions, and, on receiving orders on no account to surrender the guns, sent a categorical refusal to Semenov, and got through safely with his consignment.

It was stated at Vladivostok on Oct. 28 that General Rozanov, whose activities had occasioned great friction with the interallied commanders and a demand for the withdrawal of his troops from Vladivostok, had been recalled to Omsk, and that General Romanovsky, recently leader of the Russian troops in the Udinsk region, had been appointed by Admiral Kolchak to act as Governor and commander of the Russian troops in the Far Eastern provinces. A Cossack conference at Omsk issued a protest the same day against Rozanov's recall from the Far East, where his presence was considered desirable.

ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Admiral Kolchak toward the middle of October asked the allied Governments for a credit of $350,000,000 to be used for military and economic purposes. He also requested the use of additional allied troops to guard the Trans-Siberian Railroad between Irkutsk and Omsk as substitutes for Czechoslovak troops soon to return to Europe. Siberian banks, co-operating with the Government, arranged a credit of $25,000,000 with Japanese banks, at 7 per cent. interest, depositing gold bullion of an equal amount as security. It was announced in Washington on Nov. 7 that the All-Russian Government had made a deposit of $1,000,000 in gold bullion at Omsk as a guarantee that it would meet its obligations for the purchase of war material from the American Government. This bullion was safely received at San Francisco, and subsequently deposited in the United States Treasury.

Not having received a reply from the Japanese Government to a communication sent in September concerning co-operation in the administration of the Trans-Siberian Railway, the United States on Oct. 18 dispatched a second note on the subject to Japan. The Japanese reply, finally received in Washington on Nov. 2, signified Japan's readiness to protect the road to the best of its ability; constant efforts to do so had been made, and reports that it had not done so were based on misunderstanding. The note, however, declined in diplomatic but firm language to submit the Japanese troops in Siberia to the authority of the Allied Railway Board under John W. Stevens and defended the Japanese policy of non-participation in individual disputes.

IN SOVIET RUSSIA

The psychology of Leon Trotzky, the Bolshevik Minister of War, who went to Petrograd to direct that city's defense against Yudenitch, and whose energetic measures led to the final driving back of the Yudenitch forces below Yamburg, was brought out in a Moscow wireless of Oct. 18 which reported Trotzky's views on the Baltic situation in the following terms:

A pack of bourgeois curs is worrying the body of Soviet Russia on all sides. Polish Knights are gnashing their teeth. The German General von der Goltz, under instructions by the Stock Exchange and the off-scourings of all lands, is seizing the Baltic country with the help of monarchist hands in order to attack Moscow from there.

In the northwest, the blood-drunken trio, Yudenitch, Balakovitch and Rodzianko, are advancing on Petrograd. The Estonian peace negotiations served as a means to lull the Red Petrograd troops and as a soporific.

The army defending the approaches to Petrograd failed to withstand the first blow, and danger has again come to Petrograd. The English and French radio stations announce with joy the fact of our failures on the road to Petrograd. The Stock Exchange and the press of the whole world are sharing the joy and predicting the speedy fall of Petrograd. But they are wrong this time. Petrograd will not fall. It will stand. We shall not surrender Petrograd.

For the defense of the first town of the proletarian revolutions sufficient strength will be found in the peasants and the workers of the land. Yudenitch's successes are those of a cavalry raid. Troops are being sent to the assistance of Petrograd and the Petrograd workers who rose first of all. We must break the skulls of Yudenitch's bands and the Anglo-French Imperialists.

Other proclamations issued by Trotzky and addressed to the Red Army attacked the English bitterly, and called on the Red troops to harry the forces of Yudenitch unceasingly. Observers in Petrograd, at this time described the situation of the former capital as tragic; many people both in this city and Moscow were perishing of cold and hunger. On Oct. 22 Tchitcherin notified the German Government that participation by Germany in the proposed interallied blockade of Soviet Russia would be regarded as a deliberate act of hostility. Strong opposition to Germany's joining the blockade was expressed by the Berlin press.

Despite the beating back of the Yudenitch offensive, and the favorable position of the Red Army on other fronts, the Soviet authorities still maintained their readiness to make peace with the allied nations—on Lenin's terms. On Nov. 6 The Daily Herald, the London labor organ, published a draft of the Bolshevik peace conditions; they had been brought from Moscow by Lieut. Col. Lestrangle Malone, Liberal member of Parliament, who had interviewed both Lenin and Trotsky.

These terms briefly were a peace conference in a neutral country, an armistice on all fronts, the removal of the blockade, the re-establishment of free communication over all parts of Russia and Finland, the withdrawal of all allied troops from Russia, and the discontinuance of all aid to Soviet Russia's enemies. The former debts of the Russian Empire were to be accepted. The draft concluded with an implied threat to enter into an alliance with Germany in case the Entente rejected the Soviet terms.

Similar offers were made in public statements attributed to Tchitcherin and Lenin at this time. As far as Germany was concerned, Herr Müller, German Minister of Foreign Affairs, declared before the National Assembly on Oct. 24 that so long as the Bolsheviks were interfering in Germany's internal affairs and preaching world revolution any agreement with Soviet Russia would be impossible. The ex-Danish Consul General at Moscow, Baron Haxthausen, declared in Paris on Oct. 23 that the program of the Bolshevik Government, as given to him in full by Karl Radek, Lenin's right-hand man, was based wholly on the overthrow of all existing "capitalistic" Governments. For this and other reasons, Great Britain, France and the United States refused to take the Soviet offers of peace at their face value.

AMERICA'S BLOCKADE

In specific application to the United States, Assistant Secretary Phillips, in a letter made public on Nov. 4 at the State Department in Washington, in explaining the reasons why the United States had not formally joined in the blockade against Soviet Russia, said that the American policy of non-intercourse was based on the following considerations:

(1) It was the declared purpose of the Bolsheviks of Russia to carry revolution throughout the world, and they had availed themselves of every opportunity to conduct propaganda in the United States aimed to bring about the forcible overthrow of the American form of government.

(2) The opening of commercial relations would mean the bringing into the United States of large supplies of gold, some of it the expropriated property of the Rumanian Government, for the purpose of carrying on this anarchistic propaganda.

(3) By the nationalization scheme of the Bolshevik authorities a program of political oppression was being maintained in the apportionment of food supplies among the various classes, and it was inadmissible that American food should be sent for the perpetuation of such a system. If food could be sent without concurring in this system, the United States would consider it. Far-reaching measures had been taken for the relief of all peoples in areas freed from Bolshevik control. The American Relief Commission had sent food stores to Viborg sufficient to support Petrograd for a month, and they would be delivered whenever that city came under the control of authorities with whom it was possible to deal.

On Nov. 13 Premier Lloyd George announced in the House of Commons that he proposed to call at an early date an international conference at which the Ministers of the allied powers might consider, among other questions left unsettled, the vexing problem of Russia.

Yudenitch and Northwestern Russia

Plans of New Government

[SEE PORTRAIT, PAGE 440]

GENERAL NICHOLAS YUDENITCH, whose offensive against the Bolsheviks brought him within a few miles of Petrograd in October, 1919, first came into prominence in 1914 as a military commander of note. A graduate of the Military School of Moscow and the Military Academy of Petrograd, he had seen considerable service in Turkestan, and was made a Colonel at the age of 33. He was subsequently made a Major General for his record in the Russo-Japanese war, in the course of which he had been severely wounded, and five years later received the epaulets of a Lieutenant General and the appointment of Chief of Staff in the Caucasus. It was in this region that he first came into the limelight. Grand Duke Nicholas had been removed by the Czar from his command as head of the Western front, and transferred to the Caucasus, where the Turks were active. When Turkey entered the war, at the close of 1914, her plan of campaign included a swift invasion of the Russian Caucasus, with a drive toward Tiflis, its capital. The battles of Sarikamysis and Ardahan, and above all of Erzerum, where Yudenitch led the troops of the Czar, broke up this movement of invasion and put the Turks on the defensive.

In the four years following, during which the Russian Revolution and the establishment of the Bolshevik régime occurred, little was heard of Yudenitch. But about a year ago it became known that he, with a small group of Russian officers, had organized a force of 23,000 men under the name of the Northwestern Volunteer Army, to fight against the Bolsheviks on the Petrograd front. It was stated at this time that he was acting in co-operation with the Finnish General, Mannerheim, now Premier of Finland. His first operations against the former capital were cautious, but as success met his attempts he became more aggressive, and eventually became a menace to the rule of Lenin and Trotzky. In August, 1919, in co-operation with Finnish forces, he advanced toward Petrograd along three lines in an offensive which met with considerable success, but desperate resistance by the Bolsheviks checked this movement.

NORTHWESTERN GOVERNMENT

Soon after the failure of this offensive, however, a new anti-Bolshevist Government was formed under the name of the Northwestern Government, with its seat in the Esthonian city of Reval. In the Cabinet formed, which fused all factions opposed to Bolshevism, General Yudenitch was given the position of Minister of War. The full list of the appointed members of this new Government is given herewith:

Chairman of the Council of Ministers and Minister of Foreign Affairs and Finances—C. G. LIANOZOV, (Constitutional-Democrat.)

Minister of the Interior—K. A. ALEXANDROV, (Constitutional-Democrat.)

Minister of War—General N. N. YUDENITCH, (Non-Partisan.)

Minister of Industry and Commerce, of Provisions and of Health—M. S. MARGULIES, (Radical.)

Minister of Justice—E. I. KEDRIN, (Constitutional-Democrat.)

Minister of Food—F. G. EISHINSKY, (Radical.)

Minister of the Navy—Vice Admiral V. K. PILKIN, (Non-Partisan.)

Minister of Education—F. A. ERN, (Constitutional-Democrat.)

Minister of Public Charities—A. S. PIESHKOV, (Socialist-Revolutionist.)

State Controller—V. L. GORN, (Social-Democrat.)

Minister of Agriculture—P. A. BOGDANOV, (Socialist-Revolutionist.)

Minister of Cults—I. F. EVSEIEV, (Labor Group.)

Minister of Posts and Telegraphs—M. M. PHILLIPEO, (Non-Partisan.)

Minister of Public Works—N. N. IVANOV, (Constitutional-Democrat.)

The Northwestern Government was subordinated to the All-Russian Government at Omsk. Its official program, as issued on Aug. 24, when General Yudenitch was planning his new campaign, was as follows:

In the fratricidal war brought about by the Bolsheviks. Russia is perishing in fire and blood. The young and strong are perishing in vain and without glory, and the old and weak are dying out from hunger and epidemics.

Entire cities are dying out, and mills and factories are deserted and at a standstill. The villages are put to the torch, and the fruits of the land tillers' labors are destroyed while yet in the fields; their live stock is ruined and our peasantry is reduced to the utmost degree of desolation. Masses of refugees, shelterless and hungry, are wandering in the forests of our native land.

Thus is Russia perishing under the heel of the Bolsheviks. The bottom of the dark precipice into which Russia has been hurled is already in sight. The Government of the Northwestern Provinces of Russia, having been called into life by the necessity of the immediate and decisive liberation of Russia from the Bolshevik yoke, is formed in complete harmony with the plenipotentiary representatives of the allied powers, and is united with the rest of Russia in the person of the Chief Executive, Admiral Kolchak.

It has put before the citizens of Russia the principles which it accepts as the basis of its impending activities:

(1) A firm struggle against the Bolsheviks, as well as against all those who aspire to re-establish the old régime.

(2) The equality before the law of all the citizens of the Russian State, without distinction of race, nationality, and religion.

(3) All the citizens of liberated Russia are guaranteed inviolability of person and domicile, freedom of the press, speech, association, assembly, and strikes.

(4) The All-Russian authority must be recreated on the basis of the rule of the people. To this end, immediately upon the liberation of our motherland from the tyranny of the Bolsheviks, steps must be taken for the summoning of a new All-Russian Constituent Assembly to be elected by a general, direct, equal, and secret vote.

(5) If after the liberation of the Petrograd, Pskov, and Novgorod Provinces general conditions may not yet warrant the convocation of an All-Russian Constituent Assembly, there should be summoned, for the purpose of co-ordinating conditions of local life, a Territorial Popular Assembly in Petrograd, elected on the same democratic basis by the population of the liberated provinces.

(6) The nationalities inhabiting the various territories composing the united and regenerated Russia are to decide freely for themselves their form of administration.

(7) The administration of the Russian State is to be founded on principles of wide local autonomy. The Zemstvos and municipal self-governments are to be elected upon a democratic basis.

(8) The land problem is to be solved in the Constituent Assembly, in accordance with the will of the tolling agricultural population. Until its solution by the latter body, the land should remain in the hands of the peasantry, and all transactions and alienations of lands outside of city limits are prohibited, except in cases of extraordinary importance and by special permission of the Government.

(9) The labor question is to be solved on the basis of the eight-hour day, the State control of industry, and the full protection of labor and of the working class.

Citizens of long-suffering Russia! The Government of the Northwestern Provinces of Russia, having undertaken at this critical hour of our struggle for liberation the responsibility for the present and the future of Russia, calls upon you for a final effort and for final sacrifices in the name of our motherland, our freedom, and our happiness.

TO REPRESENT ALL CLASSES

In September, 1919, on the eve of the decisive movement toward Petrograd, the Northwestern Government issued the following appeal to the a'my:

Citizen-Soldiers!

The newly formed Government of the Northwestern Territory is making this appeal to you, brave soldiers of our army, the sole support and hope of mutilated and bleeding Russia.

The Bolsheviks, as may be expected from them, will tell you that ours is a Government of capitalists and landowners or of "social traitors." Place no trust in them, for the Bolsheviks are lying and deceiving you, and they are only maintaining themselves by chicanery and lies and your credulity.

We are a Government not of capitalists and the landed gentry. Our Government is composed of men in public life, of representatives of all classes and of all the strata of the population. The régime of Czarism is as hateful to us as it is to you, and no return to it is possible.

We shall not permit that the peasants become again the hired help upon lands belonging to the gentry. The land belongs to those who toil upon it. We shall not permit that capitalists, manufacturers, and industrialists re-establish a twelve-hour working day in mills, shops, and factories. The eight-hour day must be preserved.

We shall not permit that Russian life be again placed behind a Czar's prison walls, where it has been stunted and stultified during many centuries. We shall use all our energies and apply all our efforts to the end that the people may live a free, peaceful life; that they may freely develop and make use of their abilities; that they may enjoy in the fullest measure the fruits of their labors; that our people may dwell in happiness and comfort which they so justly deserve.

But in order to establish this new, good life, we must first of all rid our country of the Bolsheviks, who have been plaguing and mutilating our unfortunate Russia for the past two years. Having usurped power by force, they are leading our motherland to perdition. They promised peace to a people weary and tired of war, and deceived them; they concluded peace with the Germans, and are now warring against their own fellow-Russians and shedding rivers of blood; they promised bread to the people and deceived them again. In place of bread, they have created in Russia a famine such as our motherland had not known in the thousand years of its existence.

The Bolsheviks have turned over to the peasants the estates of the former landowners, but they have confiscated their crops, both from their former allotments and from the lands that had belonged to the gentry, leaving for the peasants only a meagre ration of twenty pounds per soul.

They are promising freedom to all, but in reality they are filling the prisons daily and are executing hundreds of innocent people, and, without consulting the will of the people, are issuing decrees more vicious in their nature than a state of total lawlessness. They are promising a prosperous life to every one, and, meanwhile, they are destroying cities and are putting villages to the torch, confiscating bread from the peasants and fodder from their cattle.

As long as the Bolsheviks remain in Russia we shall have neither peace, nor bread, nor freedom, nor laws.

Only the army can save Russia from the Bolsheviks. We know that you are tired of campaigning and fighting; we know that you have frequently suffered from hunger and want, that you have been poorly clad and shod in the past, and that you were poorly armed. But now all this is ended. We have supplies for you in plenty, and soon bread as well as clothing and arms will be distributed among you.

Make your greatest efforts, citizen-soldiers, and your last and final sacrifice at this hour. March bravely to fight the enemies of the people and of freedom, and fulfill to the last your duty; thus winning peace and happiness for yourselves and for our unfortunate motherland.

The new offensive by General Yudenitch followed soon after the issue of this proclamation. Its results have been described in the November issue of CURRENT HISTORY. In this approach to the very gates of Petrograd General Yudenitch was nearer than ever before to attaining his desire—the capture of the Red stronghold. His forces were inadequate, however, and the Bolsheviks, by concentrating large masses of troops from other fronts, kept him from actually entering the city, and early in November had driven him back beyond Gatchina.

British Aid for Northwest Russia

The terms of an agreement between the British Government and the Northwestern Government of Russia, headed by Stefan Lianozov, were recently printed in La Feuille, a Socialist paper of Geneva. According to this agreement, Great Britain agrees:

1. To support in every way the Lianozov Government in its struggles against the Bolsheviks and especially in its efforts to occupy Petrograd.

2. To supply Lianozov with munitions and modern weapons of war, such as tanks, airplanes, &c.

3. To exercise pressure upon Germany so as to facilitate recruiting among the Russian prisoners of war in Germany.

4. To furnish supplies to the districts suffering from the effects of Bolshevik rule.

5. To grant a special credit of 1,000,000,000 rubles, after the overthrow of the Bolshevik régime, for the purchase of machinery and raw materials for the restoration of Russian industry.

The Northwestern Government agrees:

1. To recognize all Great Britain's special interests in the Baltic region.

2. To give the Baltic countries an opportunity to exercise self-determination.

3. To declare officially, after the fall of Petrograd, its disinterestedness in the Persian question.

4. To recognize all the debts of the former Government.

5. To forbear making any important purchases in Germany so long as delivery agreements based upon the credit arrangement with Great Britain exist.

How We Made the October Revolution

By LEON TROTZKY
[BOLSHEVIST MINISTER OF WAR]

(FIRST INSTALLMENT)

This narrative of the events that led to the overthrow of the Kerensky Government and the advent of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia is the official Bolshevik version of those events. It is part of a long treatise first drafted by Leon Trotsky in the intervals between the sessions of the Russo-German Peace Conference at Brest-Litovsk. In the preface, dated Feb. 25, 1918, the object of the work is declared to be "to acquaint the international proletariat with the causes, the development, and the significance of the revolution accomplished in Russia in October, 1917." It was addressed to the workers of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and all Europe." The work was published serially in French at Paris in the Summer of 1919 by the Archives de la Grande Guerre, from which the essential portions are here translated for CURRENT HISTORY and presented without comment.

THE revolution was born directly from the war, and the war became the touchstone of all the revolutionary parties and energies. The intellectual leaders were "against the war"; in the time of Czarism many of them were considered affiliated with the left wing of the Internationale and were Zimmerwaldians. But scarcely had they assumed "responsibilities" when their whole attitude changed.

To practice the policy of revolutionary socialism was, in these conditions, to break with the Russian and allied bourgeoisie. But the intellectual and semi-intellectual lower middle class sought to cover its political incapacity by an alliance with bourgeois liberalism. Hence the pitiful and really shameful rôle played by the leaders of the lower middle class in the question of the war.

Sighs, phrases, exhortations or secret pleas addressed by them to the "allied" Governments was all that they could mentally devise; but factively they continued to walk in the footsteps of the liberal upper bourgeoisie. The soldiers dying in the trenches could evidently not infer that the war, in which they had fought for nearly three years, had suddenly taken another turn through the sole fact that in Petrograd certain new personalities, calling themselves Revolutionary Socialists, or Mensheviks, had become a part of the Government.

Milyukov succeeded the official Prokrovsky, and Tereschenko succeeded Milyukov; that is, in simple words, instead of bureaucratic disloyalty, there was first the militarist imperialism of the Cadets, and then the absence of all principle, and political "complaisancy"; but there were no objective changes, and no real issue from the terrible struggles of war was shown.

DISINTEGRATION OF THE ARMY

To this, precisely, was due the gradual disintegration of the army. The agitators explained to the soldiers that the Government of the Czar sent them without rhyme or reason to be slaughtered like so many cattle. But the successors of the Czar were unable in any way to modify the character of the war, just as they were unable to pave the way for an effort to obtain peace. In the first months not a foot of advance was made, and the impatience of the army, as well as of the allied Governments, was caused thereby. This led to the offensive of June 18, [1917.] The Allies insisted on the offensive, presenting at the cashier's window, so to speak, old letters of exchange received from the Government of the Czar.

The leaders of the petite bourgeoisie, intimidated by their own impotence and the growing impatience of the masses, yielded to this demand. They began really to imagine that only a push by the Russian Army was needed to bring about peace. The offensive seemed to them to be the only way to escape from their difficulties, the solution of the problem; in short, salvation.

No more monstrous and criminal error could be conceived. At that time they spoke of the offensive as they did in the first days and the first weeks of the war; the patriotic Socialists spoke of the necessity of defending "the country," of inner peace, of the "holy union," &c. All their Zimmerwaldian and internationalist enthusiasm appeared to have been swept away.

We, who combated them uncompromisingly, were well aware that the offensive might prove a frightful peril, and might even bring about the end of the revolution. We pointed out that they should not send into battle an army which had, as it were, just awakened to consciousness, and which had been shaken by the force of events whose import it still did not understand, without previously giving it new ideas which it might consider as its own. We resorted to exhortation, demonstration, threat. But as there was no other possible solution for the factions in control, who in their turn were allied with the Russian and the allied bourgeoisie, they showed us only a hostile attitude and an implacable hatred.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST BOLSHEVIKI

The historian of the future will not read without emotion the Russian papers of May and June, 1917, period of the moral preparation of the offensive. The articles of the official and Governmental organs, almost without exception, were directed against the Bolsheviks. There was no accusation, no calumny which was not "mobilized" against us at this period. In this campaign the principal part, as was only to be expected, was played by the Cadets. Their class instinct told them that not merely the offensive, but all the subsequent developments of the revolution, and even the whole future of the State, were involved in this offensive.

The bourgeois machinery of so-called "public opinion" was then revealed in all its workings. Divers organs, divers authorities, publications, platforms, and pulpits, all were used to bring about the common objective: to make the Bolsheviks, as a political party, impossible. The tenseness and dramatic qualities of the press campaign directed against the Bolsheviks, all ready before the appointed hour had come, foreshadowed the civil war which was destined to break out in the following revolutionary phase.

This campaign of hatred and calumny was intended to excite the working masses against "cultivated society" and to divide the two radically by erecting between them a water-tight compartment. The liberal upper class understood that it could not succeed in placating the masses without the intervention and assistance of the democratic lower middle class, who held provisionally the directing power of the revolutionary organizations. The political hue and cry against the Bolsheviks had, then, as its immediate object, the stirring up of relentless hostility between our party and the deep-lying strata of "intellectual socialism," which, once isolated from the proletariat, would be bound to fall into subjection to the liberal upper class.

It was at the time of the first Congress of the Soviets of all Russia that the first muffled roar of thunder was heard presaging the terrible events which were about to occur. Our party had planned for the 10th of June an armed demonstration in the streets of Petrograd. The object of this demonstration was to act directly on the Congress of the Soviets of all Russia. "Seize the power!" the workmen of Petrograd said thereby to the social revolutionaries and the Mensheviks, who had come from all the corners of the earth: "Break with the bourgeoisie, renounce coalition with it, and seize the power!"

AN ABORTIVE DEMONSTRATION

It was manifest to us that a rupture of the Social Revolutionaries and the Mensheviks with the liberal upper bourgeoisie would force the former to seek support in the most advanced ranks of the proletariat, and that they would thus assure themselves a preponderance to the disadvantage of the upper bourgeoisie. But it was precisely this probability that frightened the leaders of the latter. When they learned the plan for a demonstration, they launched, in common with the Government, in which they had representatives, and with the liberal and counter-revolutionary bourgeoisie, a veritably insane campaign against the demonstration.

All the trumps were played. We had at this time in the Congress only an insignificant minority, and we were obliged to retreat. The demonstration did not occur. But this abortive demonstration left deep traces in the consciousness of the two parties; it accentuated contrasts, and embittered hostilities. At a special session of the presiding officers of the Congress, at which the representatives of our group were present, M. Tseretelli, who was then Minister in the Coalition Government, declared, with all the uncompromising dogmatism of the doctrinary petit bourgeois of limited horizon, that the only danger threatening the revolution came from the Bolsheviks and from the Petrograd proletariat armed by them. He concluded that men "who did not know how to use arms" should be disarmed. This applied to the workmen and to members of the Petrograd garrison who had joined our party. This disarmament, however, did not take place, for the political and psychological conditions which would justify the carrying out of such a radical measure were not at hand.

In order to offset the effect of the failure of the demonstration on the masses, the Congress of Soviets announced a general demonstration, without arms, for June 18. That day was a day of triumph for our party. The masses marched through the streets in solid columns, and though, inversely to what had taken place in our demonstration project for June 10, they had been called out by the official power of the Soviets, the workmen had inscribed on their flags and standards the rallying cries of our party: "Down with Secret Treaties!" "Down with the Policy of an Offensive!" "Hurrah for an Honorable Peace!" "All Governmental Power for the Soviets!"

Only three signs expressed confidence in the Coalition Ministry, those borne by the Cossack regiment, the Plekhanov group, and the Petrograd section of the Jewish "League," which comprised elements alien to the proletariat.

This demonstration proved not only to our enemies, but also to ourselves, that we were much stronger in Petrograd than we had supposed.

OFFENSIVE OF JUNE 18

Following this demonstration of the revolutionary masses, a Governmental crisis seemed absolutely inevitable. But news from the front that the revolutionary army had taken the offensive effaced the impression of the demonstration. The very day that the proletariat and the Petrograd garrison demanded publication of the secret documents, as well as categorical offers of peace, Kerensky launched the revolutionary army into the offensive.

This was not purely a gratuitous coincidence. The engineers of the political backstage had already prepared everything in advance, and the time of the offensive had been determined not on military but on political grounds.

On June 19 the so-called patriotic manifestation occurred in the streets of Petrograd. The Nevsky Prospekt—the principal artery of bourgeois circulation—was filled with animated groups, among whom were officers, journalists, and elegant ladies, all agitating against the Bolsheviks. The first news regarding the offensive had been favorable. The liberal press asserted that the main object was attained; that the attack of June 18, whatever its subsequent military effects might be, was a deadly blow at the revolution, for it would re-establish in the army the old system of discipline, and would assure to the liberal upper middle class the domination of the State.

We had predicted otherwise. In a special statement which we had presented to the first Soviet Congress a few days before the June offensive we said that this offensive would destroy the inner unity of the army, would bring its different branches into opposition, and would give a great preponderance to the counter-revolutionaries, for the enforcement of discipline in an army in a progressive state of demoralization and without any new moral principle to support it would lead to bitter reprisals.

In other words, we predicted in this statement the consequences which were fulfilled later on under the general name of the Kornilov affair. We pointed out that in every case the revolution was threatened by the greatest danger, whether the offensive succeeded, which we doubted, or whether it failed, which seemed to us almost inevitable. The second theory proved to be the correct one. The news of victory did not last long. Instead came the announcement of sad events, such as the refusal of numerous army corps to support the attacking units, and the killing of officers, who, in some instances, were the only attackers.

Military events were also complicated by the ever-increasing difficulties in the inner life of the country. In respect to the agrarian question, industrial organization, and national harvests, the Coalition Government made absolutely no progress. The question of food and transport became increasingly difficult and local conflicts became more frequent every day.

THE GOVERNMENT HESITATES

The Socialist Ministers asked the masses to wait. All urgent decisions and measures, notably the question of the Constituent Assembly, were deferred. The irresolution of the Government was obvious. There were only two possible solutions—either the bourgeoisie must be expelled from power and the revolution must go on, or else, by severe reprisals, the popular masses must be muzzled. Kerensky and Tseretelli backed and filled between these two extremes and only confused the situation more.

When the Cadets, who were the shrewdest and most penetrating members of the Coalition Government, saw that the failure of the offensive of June might deal a fatal blow, not only to the revolution, but also to the directing parties, they hastened to withdraw, throwing as they did so all responsibilities on the shoulders of their associates of the Left.

On July 2 occurred the Ministerial crisis, the direct cause of which was the question of the Ukraine. From all points of view this was a moment of extreme political tension. From different parts of the front thronged delegations and isolated representatives to describe the chaos which reigned in the army following the offensive. The "Governmental" press demanded stern reprisals. Similar demands became more and more frequent in the columns of the "Socialist" press.

Kerensky drew nearer, or rather publicly nearer, to the Cadet Party and the Cadet generals, and he showed publicly not only all the hatred which he had for the Bolsheviki, but also his aversion for all revolutionary parties in general. Meanwhile the Entente diplomats exerted pressure on the Government, and demanded the re-establishment of discipline and the continuation of the offensive. In Governmental circles the greatest heedlessness prevailed. In the breast of the working masses an accumulation of anger awaited impatiently the moment of explosion. * * *

THE COALITION DISSOLVED

I remember the meeting of the Executive Committee of July 2. The Socialist Ministers had come to report on the new Governmental crisis. * * * The spokesman was Tseretelli. He explained at length to the Executive Committee that the concessions which he and Terestchenko had made to the Kiev Rada were far from signifying the dismemberment of Russia, and were consequently not a sufficient motive for the Cadets' withdrawal from the Cabinet. Tseretelli reproached the Cadet leaders with their centralizing doctrinarianism, their inability to grasp the necessity of a compromise with the Ukraine, &c.

From all the previous experiences of the coalition only one issue seemed possible—to break with the Cadets and to constitute a Soviet Government. The equilibrium of forces in the Soviets was then such that the Government of the Soviets, from the point of view of party policy, would have come into the hands of the revolutionary Socialists and the Mensheviks. We boldly defended this policy. But even after the Ministerial crisis of July 2 Tseretelli and his associates did not renounce their idea of the "coalition." They declared to the Executive Committee that though the Cadet leaders were infected with doctrinarianism, and even with counter-revolutionary tendencies, there were in the provinces numerous bourgeois elements which could still act harmoniously with the Revolutionary Democracy, and that to obtain their collaboration representatives of the upper bourgeoisie must be admitted into the new Government.

The announcement that the coalition was dissolved, only to be succeeded by a new coalition, spread immediately through Petrograd and aroused a storm of indignation in the workmen's quarters. Thus was laid the foundation for the events of July 3, 4, and 5.

THE DAYS OF JULY

The Executive Committee of All-Russia, created by the July Congress and supported by the unprogressive provinces, relegated the Petrograd Soviet further and further to the background, and even seized control of affairs in Petrograd. A conflict was inevitable. The workmen and soldiers expressed violent dissatisfaction with the official policy of the Soviets and demanded more energetic action on our part. The position of our party in relation to the movement of July 3, 4, and 5 was clearly drawn. The agitators of the party, distributed through the lower strata of the population, went with the mass and fomented an agitation based on no half measures.

The Central Executive Committee was in session at the Tauride Palace when the palace was invested by tumultuous bands of workmen and soldiers bearing arms. These elements (including anarchists, "Black Hundreds," and paid agents) demanded the arrest of Tschernov and Tseretelli, the dispersal of the Executive Committee, &c. They even tried to seize Tschernov. The bourgeois press represented the whole movement as a pogromist and counter-revolutionary as well as a Bolshevik exploit, the immediate object of which was to seize the Government and to do violence to the Central Executive Committee.

All the strategy of Tseretelli, Tschernov, and others on July 3 was to try to gain time and thus give Kerensky the possibility to bring "safe" troops to Petrograd. In the hall of the Tauride Palace, which was surrounded by a large crowd of armed people, deputation after deputation arrived, demanding an immediate break with the upper bourgeoisie, absolute social reforms, and the opening of overtures of peace. We, the Bolsheviks, received each new detachment in the street or in the courtyard, and exhorted them to be calm, expressing our certainty that in view of the attitude of the masses the party of the Centre would not succeed in forming a new Coalition Government. The most excited were the militant ones who had come from Kronstadt, and we had great difficulty in keeping them in bounds.

On July 4 the demonstration assumed even greater proportions, already under the immediate direction of our party. The Soviet leaders were lacking in decision, their words were evasive; the replies that "Ulysses" Tseretelli made the delegations were void of any political import. It was clear that all the official leaders were in a state of expectation.

On the night of the 4th the first "safe" troops arrived from the front. During the session of the Executive Committee there resounded from within the walls of the palace the strains of a brass band playing the "Marseillaise." The faces of the members of the committee were immediately transformed. The self-assurance which they had lost during the last few days returned to them. It was the Volhynian regiment which was entering the Tauride Palace, the same regiment which, a few months later, marched under our flags in the vanguard of the October revolution.

This event changed the aspect of everything. The Executive Committee threw off all restraint in replying to the delegations of workmen and soldiers and to the representatives of the Baltic fleet. From the balcony of the committee came words referring to armed rioting, which "troops faithful to the Government" had just repressed. The Bolsheviks were declared a counter-revolutionary party. The anguish of the upper bourgeoisie during the last two days of armed demonstration now gave way to an intense hatred, not only in the columns of the papers, but also in the streets of Petrograd, and especially on the Nevsky Prospekt, where the workmen and soldiers who were arrested in the act of "criminal agitation" received a frightful beating. Ensigns, officers, shock troops, Knights of St. George, remained the masters of the situation. At their head stood the uncompromising counter-revolutionaries. In the city the offensive against the labor organizations and the institutions of our party was pitilessly pursued. Arrests, domicile visits, bastonnades and assassinations occurred on every hand.

During the night of the 4th the Minister of Justice, M. Pereversev, gave out for publication "documents" which purported to show that the leaders of the Bolshevik Party were paid German agents. The leaders of the Socialist-Revolutionist Party and of the Mensheviks had known us too long and too intimately to believe these charges; but they were too much interested in having them believed to repudiate them openly. To this day we cannot think without disgust of those orgies of falsehood overflowing the pages of all the bourgeois and moderate press.

Our own papers were stifled. The Petrograd revolutionists felt that the province and the army were far from being in their favor. In the workmen's quarters there was a short period of disorder. Repressive measures began in the garrison against disbanded regiments, and various units were disarmed, while the leaders of the Soviet "manufactured" a new Ministry, including the representatives of the landholding bourgeois parties, who were not only incapable of supporting the Government in any way, but could only take from it the last iota of revolutionary initiative.

MILITARY COLLAPSE

And at the front events merely followed their course. The organism of the army was shaken through and through. The soldiers had convinced themselves that the majority of the officers who at the beginning of the revolution, with a view to personal protection, had displayed the red cockade were hostile to the new régime. At the main headquarters counter-revolutionary elements were openly chosen. The Bolshevik publications, meanwhile, were relentlessly pursued.

The offensive was soon transformed into a tragic retreat. The bourgeois press overflowed in furious calumnies against the army; and, though on the eve of the offensive, the directing parties had told us that we were a completely negligible quantity, that the army knew nothing about us, and wanted to know nothing about us, now, that the opening of the offensive had come to such a tragic end, these same individuals and parties sought to throw all the responsibility for this failure upon our shoulders.

The prisons were packed with workmen and soldier revolutionists. The Magistrates of the former courts of the Czaristic period were charged to investigate the events of July 3, 4 and 5. It was under these conditions that the Socialist-Revolutionist Party and the Mensheviks invited Lenin, Zinoviev and our other comrades to give themselves up voluntarily into the hands of "Justice."

AFTER THE DAYS OF JULY

The period of disorder in the workmen's quarter lasted but a short time, and was succeeded by great revolutionary activity, not only among the proletariat, but also in the Petrograd garrison. The moderates lost all influence, the stream of Bolshevism began to overflow from the urban centres over the whole country, and, overcoming all obstacles, invaded the army.

The new Coalition Government, headed by Kerensky, openly began reprisals. The Ministry re-established the penalty of death for offenses committed by soldiers. Our papers were stifled and our agitators imprisoned, but this only strengthened our influence. Despite all the impediments put in the way of reelection to the Soviet of Petrograd, the balance of forces had been so shifted that in some important questions we already had a majority. It was the same with the Moscow Soviet.

At this time I, myself, together with many other comrades, was detained in the Kresty Prison "for agitation and organization of armed revolt on July 3, 4 and 5, at the instigation of the German Government, and with the intention of furthering the war aims of the Hohenzollerns." The examining Judge of the Czarist régime, Alexandrov, who was no nonentity, and who had numerous trials of revolutionists to his credit, received instructions to defend the republic against the counter-revolutionary Bolsheviks.

Under the old régime political and criminal prisoners were distinguished. This distinction was succeeded by a new terminology: the common law criminals and the Bolsheviks.

The majority of the soldiers who had been arrested were perplexed. They were young boys from the country who had previously known nothing about politics, and who had believed that the revolution had brought them freedom once and for all. But now they were amazed to find themselves behind bolted doors and grated windows. During the daily exercise they asked me each time with great anxiety what it all means and how it would end. I consoled them by assuring them that the ultimate victory would be for us.

THE KORNILOV AFFAIR

[M. Trotsky at this point takes up the Kornilov affair in some detail. He represents it as an attempt of the bourgeois class, including Kerensky and others, to give the Bolshevik revolutionary elements a lesson, and explains Kornilov's subsequent abandonment as due to fear of the consequences of the latter's success. Kornilov's defeat he ascribes to the thoroughness of the Bolshevik propaganda, which turned the revolutionary masses against him as an exponent of imperialism. Despite the favorable outcome of the Kornilov revolt no immediate political transformation could occur, because of the still existing effects of the repression of the July revolts, which had made the revolutionary masses and their leaders much more prudent. One tangible accomplishment, however, was the gaining of a Bolshevik preponderance in both the Petrograd and the Moscow Soviets, and the steady falling into line of the provincial Soviets under the same system. Confident of a majority in the approaching second Soviet Congress, the Bolsheviks favored it in opposition to the plan of a "Democratic Congress." This project was advocated vigorously by the Socialist-Revolutionists as a weapon to be used both against the Bolsheviks and against Kerensky, who had reached an extreme stage of arbitrary irresponsibility, though in reality his belief in his own power was mostly pure delusion. Kerensky, in fact, had become one of those "personal factors" whose elimination it would be the duty of the coming Democratic Congress, composed of Soviet representatives, diplomatic councils, zemstvos, trade bodies, and labor unions, to effectuate.

This Democratic Congress was convened in the middle of September by Tseretelli and his associates. M. Trotsky characterizes it as "a combination of Soviets and autonomous organs, 'dosed' in such a way as to assure the predominance of the moderate parties." It was, he asserts, a miserable fiasco. The bourgeois landholders, fearing dispossession, showed extreme hostility; the revolutionist proletariat and the peasant and soldier masses condemned the illicit methods employed for the convocation of the Assembly. The voting on the question of a Coalition Government showed extreme inconsistency; the project of coalition with the bourgeoisie obtaining only a few more votes than the contrary tendency. Coalition with the Cadets was rejected, but secret negotiations ultimately led to their inclusion as—social workers! The Soviet, eliminated from the Democratic Conference, was to be completed by representatives of the landholding class: this pre-parliament would function until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. The whole result of the conference was a victory of the landholding bourgeois element over the lower middle class. The study of M. Trotsky continues as follows:]

The inner situation, however, became more and more complicated and difficult. The war dragged on, purposeless, meaningless, and hopeless. The new Coalition Government did nothing to escape from this vicious circle. It was at this time that the ridiculous plan was formed of sending to Paris the Menshevik Skobelev to influence the Entente imperialists. But no sensible man took this plan seriously.

Petrograd was threatened, but the bourgeois elements showed a malicious joy, all too obvious, before the danger. The former President of the Duma, M. Rodzianko, declared openly that the capture by the Germans of a centre of corruption like Petrograd would be no great misfortune. He cited the case of Riga, where, after the entrance of the Germans, the Soviet had been abolished and public order restored by the police organization of the old régime. "The Baltic fleet is lost; but this fleet is gangrened by revolutionary propaganda, and consequently the loss of the fleet deserves no great amount of lamentation," he said. This cynicism of a verbose grand seigneur expressed the secret thoughts of the bourgeois circles.

The Kerensky Government had no intention of seriously defending the city; on the contrary, it prepared public opinion for an eventual capitulation. The various branches of the Government had already been transferred to Moscow and to other cities. It was at this juncture that the group of soldiers of the Petrograd Soviet assembled. The state of mind was tense and disquieted. "The Government is unable to defend Petrograd? Then let it make peace! And if it cannot make peace, let it fall and be damned!"

This point of view expressed the opinion of the soldier group. The day of the October revolution was already dawning. At the front the situation was steadily growing worse. Autumn was approaching with its cold, its rain and mire. A fourth Winter of war was imminent. The food was becoming worse every day. The rear had forgotten the front; there were neither relief forces, reinforcements, nor the warm garments required for the regiments. Desertions multiplied. The old Soldier Committees, which had been elected during the first period of the revolution, continued to function and supported the policy of Kerensky. No re-election was authorized. Between the committees and the mass of soldiers an abyss was being created. The soldiers finally reached a point where they felt nothing but hatred for the committees. More and more frequently delegates from the trenches came to Petrograd, and at all the sessions of the Petrograd Soviet they asked the same insistent question: "What is to be done? Through whom and how is the war to be ended? Why does the Petrograd Soviet remain silent?"

STRUGGLE FOR POWER

But the Petrograd Soviet did not remain silent. It demanded the immediate delivery to the Soviets of all the central and local power, as well as the immediate handing over of the land to the peasants; the control of production by labor and the immediate opening of peace negotiations. As long as we were merely an opposition party, our rallying cry and the slogan of our propaganda was "All power to the Soviets." But as soon as we had a majority in all the principal Soviets, this rallying cry imposed on us the necessity of beginning a direct and immediate struggle to obtain this power.

In the country districts the situation was extremely confused and complex. The revolution had promised lands to the peasants, but the directing parties forbade the peasants from touching those lands before the convening of the Constituent. At first the peasants waited patiently. When they began to lose patience the Coalition Ministry adopted violent measures.

The convening of the Constituent Assembly, meanwhile, was constantly deferred. The upper middle class did not wish to convene the Constituent until after the conclusion of peace. The peasant masses lost patience more and more. What we had predicted at the beginning of the revolution began to be fulfilled—the peasants seized the land on their own account. Reprisals by the Government were intensified; one after the other the peasant revolutionary committees were arrested. In some districts Kerensky had proclaimed martial law.

Rural deputations thronged to the Petrograd Soviet. They complained at the arrest of the peasants for having, in accordance with the program of the Petrograd Soviet, transferred the landed estates to the peasant committees. The peasants counted on our protection. We replied to them that we could protect them only if we were in power. The conclusion was that if the Soviets did not wish to be mere talking bodies they must gain possession of the Governmental power.

Our neighbors of the Right told us that it was an act of folly to begin a struggle to obtain power for the Soviets within a month and a half of the convening of the Constituent. But we were by no means infected with the Constituent fetich, all the less so as we had no guarantee that it would really be convoked.

The demoralization of the army, the wholesale desertions, the food distress, the agrarian revolts, had all created an unfavorable situation for elections to the Constituent. The eventual surrender of Petrograd to the Germans threatened, moreover, to wipe the question of elections from Governmental discussion. And then, even if the Constituent Assembly should meet under the authority of the old parties, and on the basis of the old electoral lists, it would become only a mask and a means of justification for the Coalition Government. Neither the Socialist-Revolutionists nor the Mensheviks would be able to take over power without the assistance of the upper bourgeoisie.

Allenby—Victor of Jerusalem

Career of the Famous British General, Culminating in Honors
Paid Him by the City of London

FIELD-MARSHAL SIR EDMUND ALLENBY, Commander in Chief of the British Army in Egypt and Palestine, received the freedom of the City of London on Oct. 7, 1919, and was presented with a sword of honor commemorating the victories gained by him against the Germans and Turks in the Levant, culminating in the capture of Jerusalem. At a brilliant ceremony in the venerable Guildhall, which was hung with many flags and colorful with the uniforms of distinguished soldiers, in the presence of the greatest personages of the British realm, a laudatory speech on Marshal Allenby's exploits was delivered by the City Chamberlain, Sir Adrian Pollock; the freedom of the city was presented, and the sword of honor, a richly decorated gift, supplied by the Goldsmiths and Silversmiths Company, was formally conferred. In reply, General Allenby reviewed his historic campaign. Later, at an elaborate luncheon at the Mansion House, speeches were made by the Lord Mayor of London, Mr. Winston Churchill, Mr. Lloyd George, and Sir Douglas Haig, to all of which General Allenby made a suitable reply.

In a number of these speeches, which marked the crowning point of General Allenby's long career, the chief facts of his life were brought out. He had not originally intended to enter the British Army. From Haileybury, where he was educated, he attempted to pass the difficult examination for the Indian Civil Service, and failed. This failure led him to change his plans and enter the army. He joined the 6th Inniskilling Dragoons in 1882, and had his first fighting experience in the Bechuanaland expedition of 1884. In 1888 he served in the operations in Zululand. Subsequently he went through the Staff College course, where his remarkable abilities and strong personality attracted much attention.

Like many of the foremost British Generals in the European war, Allenby served with distinction in the South African war, taking part in the relief of Kimberley, the operations at Paardeburg, and many subsequent actions. He was three times mentioned in dispatches for distinguished services, and received the brevet rank of Colonel, the Queen's medal with six clasps, and the King's medal with two. In 1902 he was in command of the 5th Lancers, and was subsequently appointed to command the 4th Cavalry Brigade. Afterward he became Inspector of Cavalry; this important post he held until the outbreak of the war.

Sir Edmund went to France as a corps commander under Lord French, and took a notable share in the magnificent but unequal struggle sustained by the "Old Contemptibles." In command of the Cavalry Corps in the Expeditionary Force, he covered the British front until the Germans launched their great attack through Mons. His cavalry again played a brilliant part at Le Cateau, and in the subsequent retreat, where the critical work of rearguard fell to Allenby and his men.

At the second battle of Ypres, the Field Marshal took up the command of the 5th Corps, and defended the Ypres salient successfully through the Summer of 1915. He was then appointed to the command of the now famous Third Army, which, among other exploits, fought the battle of Arras under his orders on Easter Monday, 1917. In this battle the Vimy Ridge was stormed and 16,000 prisoners and 150 guns were taken.

CAMPAIGN IN THE EAST

In 1918, soon after these exploits, General Allenby was appointed to head the campaign against the Germans and the Turks in the East, a campaign which the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons was "the last and most triumphant of the Crusades, the completion of an enterprise which absorbed the chivalry of Europe for centuries." The character of that victory and the generalship which secured it appealed universally to the imagination of the British people.

Despite the fact that, before his offensive began, his army had been reduced from a total strength of 316,000 to under 293,000 between March and August, 1918, Lord Allenby carried through in six weeks, between Sept. 19 and Oct. 30, one of the most brilliant campaigns in the history of the British Army. In this short time the army of Syria, operating in a rugged country and under extraordinarily complicated difficulties of supply as regards food, water, and munitions, attacked and completely defeated the Turkish Army, which was well intrenched and skillfully led, captured 75,000 prisoners and 350 guns, advanced a distance of over 300 miles, from Samara to Aleppo, and compelled the Turkish Government, owing to the utter destruction of its army, to ask for a cessation of hostilities.

It is not too much to say that these brilliant results were achieved owing to Lord Allenby's skillful use of resources which, so far from being excessive, might, on the contrary, be regarded as barely adequate for the task in hand, and that these resources were only the residue of what was left him after all the needs of the British Army on the main front in the west had been fully supplied.

ALLENBY'S OWN STORY

The detailed record of this campaign has been given by General Allenby in his official dispatches, which have been printed from time to time in CURRENT HISTORY. The following intimate summary, however, embodied in his reply to the City Chamberlain at the Guildhall ceremony, is well worthy of being added to the record:

As regards my campaign in Palestine and Syria, I should like to say how indebted I am to the London Division under Sir John Shea. He was with me in the Third Army in France. He did not take part in the Arras battle because the 60th Division was transferred to Saloniki; but before I began my campaign in Palestine and Syria, the 60th Division joined me from Saloniki, with Sir Edward Bulfin, who handed over the division to Sir John Shea, who commanded in Palestine and Syria. That division took a very leading part in the capture of Beersheba. Further, it was the division which eventually accepted the surrender of Jerusalem. When I say accepted the surrender, the general officer commanding that division had orders and took the greatest pains to preserve Jerusalem from any sort of injury. The capture of the city was delayed, for several days owing to the necessity of avoiding damage to the city itself. It was gradually surrounded, and the city itself surrendered to him without a shot being fired in the neighborhood of it. Subsequently, the 60th Division fought in the Jordan Valley in the Spring and Summer of last year, 1,300 feet below the level of the sea, in intense heat and every sort of physical discomfort. They fought there the whole of the early part of the Summer and took part, or practically carried out, with the help of the cavalry, the Australian Light Horse, and the New Zealand mounted troops, two great raids on the Hedjaz railway.

The first raid was at the end of March last year. The 60th Division got to Es Salt, and supported the New Zealanders right up to the hills, but the weather was atrocious, coming from the heat of the Jordan Valley to the bitter cold, snow, rain, and sleet of 5,000 to 6,000 feet above the sea, which meant about 6,000 to 7,000 feet above the Jordan, and they were unable to hold what they had so gallantly won. The second raid was made at the end of April or the beginning of May last year, with the same objective. All my mounted troops took part in it. The London Division again supported them, and had terrible fighting in the hills, trying to break their way through to open a second road to join up with the cavalry and mounted troops, who had already arrived there. The troops of his Royal Highness the Emir Faisal co-operated gallantly from south of Amman. The Turks were too strong for us, and again we had to withdraw. The result of this was that we applied a blister to that part of the Turkish front, which drew a whole Turkish Army over there, and there they remained. The effect of that action of the London troops and our Arab allies, with the mounted troops and cavalry of the Dominions and India, enabled us to proceed with our preparations for an attack on the other flank, without any fear for our right flank.

IN THE JORDAN VALLEY

From the headquarters of Liman von Sanders we found that the enemy staff expected an attack along the Jordan Valley. I do not know why, but I suppose they thought that we could not attack them along the seacoast, because they thought that the necessity of keeping in touch with the Arabs would prevent me from moving anywhere else. I knew that his Royal Highness Emir Faisal would recover that flank for us, and I kept sufficient mounted troops—I kept the whole Anzac mounted division—in that valley the whole Summer. I was told by all the textbooks and authorities that no troops could be kept in the valley during the Summer, 1,300 feet below sea level, and in a heat which could be hardly named, and under frightful conditions of malaria. But we attacked the mosquito, drained the swamps, burned the bush, canalized the streams, and oiled the pools, and we were able to stay there. After we crossed the Turkish lines, we tumbled into it, and got sickness very bad. In six weeks from Sept. 19, when I attacked, I lost three times as many men by disease—malaria and influenza—as by wounds in battle. That was not in our own ground, but when we had reached the Turkish area, where they had not taken precautions for attacking malaria.

The London Division, after all its good work in the mountains throughout the Spring and Summer of last year, was called upon again to make the first hole in the attack on Sept. 19. The 60th Division was not the old London Division now. The call for trrops in Europe prevented Londoners being sent out to keep it up to the old London establishments, and, although there was a nucleus of two battalions left in the division, the rest was composed of Indian troops, and many of those were quite raw and had to be trained during the few weeks that remained between May and the end of August. They had to be trained to war and made efficient fighting soldiers, and that was done. The old spirit of the London Division remained in the cadre and animated it as it had in the past. That 60th Division in the attack of Sept. 19 attacked right on the coastline, and its mission was to break a hole for the cavalry to go through, and it carried out that mission splendidly. I was up there at 5:30 in the morning, when the division was ready to attack. By 6:15 three divisions of cavalry began to pour through the gap made. They were told to go right away through the Turkish Army. The 60th Division went on fighting throughout the whole of the hostilities, and continued to take as leading a part as it had done before.

ATTRACTIVE "LADIES"

There is one little point which shows the spirit of that division. Before it attacked at Beersheba it was exercising so hard to keep fit that the general officer commanding ordered the men to eat and drink more and not to do so much work. They were wrestling and taking every possible exercise, and they also kept up the very best theatrical musical comedy company I have ever seen in my life. Later that entertaining company went down to Cairo, stayed there about a month, and cut out every other entertainment in the place. There were two "ladies" in that company, who broke the hearts of all the youths in Cairo, who swarmed around the stage door, but never saw the "ladies" come out. The "ladies" never did come out. I do not want to be too discursive, but I thought you would like to know something about the London Division which did so well.

When I mention the London Division I do not want to depreciate any other. They all did well. I had an army such as a man has seldom commanded. In spite of its number of different units—there were ten or twelve nationalities—they all worked together and worked for one aim. I should like to refer again to the loyal work done by our gallant allies in the East. A commander was never more loyally supported by allies than I was by the Emir Faisal, who is one of my greatest friends, and I am glad to see him sitting here today. I thank you again for the reception you have given me, for the sword of honor which I have received, and for the inestimable privilege of being numbered among the freemen of this great city in this ancient hall. It is an honor which falls to few people, and it is an honor which no one can prize more than I do. In accepting this sword of honor, I shall look upon it as a gage of honor to remind me of my duties to London, to my country, and to my King.

The Straits of Constantinople

By DR. J. F. SCHELTEMA

ONE of the curious developments of the war, which presented so many strange aspects, was the effort of a British fleet, aided by the French Navy and a strong army operating on land, to open the Straits of Constantinople for the relief, in the first place, of—Russia. British warships had been up those Straits on earlier errands, in 1807, even as on this occasion, to comply with the obligations of a short-lived Russian alliance, but then guided by a different policy based on considerations of an exactly opposite character, though always in keeping with Britain's traditional attitude toward the chronic Eastern question. When her course, if not her aims, gradually veered round, as indicated by her treaties and agreements of 1904 and 1907, which were followed by the frightful conflagration that flamed up in 1914 from long-smoldering animosities, the world was notified of what would have seemed impossible a few years, nay, only a few months, before.

In reply to a question put to him in the House of Commons, Sir Edward Grey, British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, announced on Feb. 25, 1915, Britain's consent to Russia's free egress from and ingress into the Black Sea. True, this concession was prudently hedged; nevertheless, it denoted the passing away of a phase of British diplomacy worn out since the opening of the Suez Canal, a fortiori since the stipulations of the entente cordiale concerning Egypt versus Morocco.

Diplomatic squabbles and armed conflicts for the possession of Constantinople are of much older birth than the city's comparatively modern name. Its advantageous position as a bridgehead between Orient and Occident has drawn on it and on its successive occupants, last but not least on the Sultans of the house of Othman, the bone-breaker, that long series of encroachments which crystallized into the disgraceful scramble characteristic especially of the more recent stages of the Eastern question. Thus far absolutely insolvable, thanks to international rivalries, the problem involved touches primarily the Dardanelles and Bosphorus, those narrow inlets and outlets of the Sea of Marmora, intended by nature for a double gate of entrance to the Black Sea and the wealth of Asia beyond.

MEDIAEVAL FORTIFICATIONS

Blazing a path for the European conquests of his descendants, the Emir Orchan, son of the founder of the Ottoman dynasty, had already made himself felt in the waters of the classic ox ford and the Sea of Helle, notorious pools of dissension between East and West from the most remote antiquity on. Masters, after Mohamed II., of the northern as of the southern coastline, his successors did not delay tightening their hold by means of the two strongholds which became famous under the name of the "old castles," Rumely Hissar on the European and Anatoly Hissar on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus. In 1642, under Sultan Ibrahim, Saddul-Bahr, the sea-barrier, and Chanaq Qaleh, or fortress of the potteries, were built to remain for a while the sole works of defense on the western waterfront, which unpreparedness gave, in 1649, the Venetians an opportunity to enter the Dardanelles and anchor off Gallipoli, from where, however, Derwis Pasha obliged them to retire. Two more castles or fortresses were then erected, facing each other across the water on the hills of Yeni Sihr and Baba Yusoof, according to plans outlined by the spirited Sultane Validé, the mother of Mohamed IV. But, though the battle of Lepanto and naval engagements of a younger date had demonstrated the urgent necessity of taking the Dardanelles still further in hand, it was not before the Grand Vizier Mohamed Kiuprilli's firm rule that Qoom Qaleh, or fortress of the sands, and Kilid Bahr, the key to the sea, were constructed at their mouth, while nine other fortifications and eight batteries completed his system of defense between 1678 and 1700.

After a new period of inaction the diligent Baron de Tott, one of the numerous agents sent to Turkey by the Duke of Choiseul to assist the Sublime Porte against Catherine II. for the benefit of France and greater glory of Louis XV., saw to it that the Dardanelles had again their due amount of care, fully aware as he was of their strategic value.

HEAVY MOSLEM GUNS

A good deal has been said by old historians and travelers about the big guns mounted on the shores of Bosphorus and Dardanelles in those and earlier days. It is well known that the Turks in their conquest of European lands, which they began to invade under the leadership of Orchan's son Solyman, and particularly in their final investment of Constantinople, made a clever use of artillery, far surpassing their Christian foes by their skill in the manufacture and manipulation of ordnance. Mohamed II. had, moreover, a certain Urban in his service, a Hungarian renegade and a worker in metals by trade, who founded a cannon described as the biggest ever seen. This monster gun threw enormous balls of stone and sank as its first victim a Venetian blockade runner, which exploit commended it so highly to the Sultan that he had it transported to his camp before the walls of Constantinople. Seven hundred men were required to bring it in position, and it needed three hours of rest to cool off after every discharge, while to its right and left two pieces of smaller calibre kept up the task of widening with twenty-two-pound balls the breach it had made. When these engines of destruction had been wheeled to one of the town gates, which showed signs of weakening, and the prime-holes of the trio were touched with the fuse to finish the job by bringing the bridge tower down, Urban directing the fire, a tremendous crash startled the besieging army and besieged garrison alike. Not the barbican had come to grief, though, but Urban's giant cannon, blowing up and killing him with a score of the Padi-shah's artillerists on the spot.

PROPERTY OF THE SULTANS

From 1453 on the Ottoman Sultans held the Bosphorus and Dardanelles and Sea of Marmora, like the Black Sea, to be their exclusive property. According to Dmitry Galitzin, Peter the Great's envoy to the Sublime Porte, they considered especially the latter their private domain, where nobody was allowed to penetrate, Mustapha comparing its status to that of a virgin reserved for fine disport in his harem, and "he would rather have war than permit any one to navigate it." Peter's taking of Azov changed the situation. Catherine II., extending her empire, continued that work of southern expansion. Potemkin's victories, the formal annexation of the Crimea, the Peace of Jassy, Jan. 9, 1792, established Russia as Turkey's neighbor on the Euxine.

None the less, that maiden once unapproachable, save as it might please the Grand Seigneur, could yet be isolated by closing the double door of Bosphorus and Dardanelles until Britain succeeded in gaining a joint control of the key to her favors, which feat greatly agitated her lover on the Neva, too, the more so since the occupation of the classic Taurus had brought him, the White Czar, a wide step forward on his way to Byzantium. To cite Danilewsky: "Russia's right to let her warships pass from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean is nothing but the right to pass from her inner court to the outside world; the (alleged) right of other powers to let their warships enter the Black Sea at their will is the (alleged) right to invade our inner court for the sake of pillage."

IN NAPOLEON'S DAY

One of the results of Bonaparte's expedition to Egypt, which, for a moment, united Sultan and Czar in their common apprehension of his ultimate purpose, was free access for the Russian Navy to the Mediterranean through Bosphorus and Dardanelles. Thereupon the Peace of Tilsit introduced a different combination—the two Emperors thought that they could pool their covetings to mutual advantage. But Alexander I. asked too much. Napoleon hesitated. "Constantinople," he was heard to mutter, "Constantinople, never! The possession of Constantinople means world dominion." Accordingly, the negotiations between Paris and St. Petersburg failed, and Sébastiani, Napoleon's envoy to the Sublime Porte, became so unpleasantly active that the English Ambassador Arbuthnot demanding his dismissal and the instant co-operation of Turkey with England and Russia against France. No reply being vouchsafed, Admiral Duckworth, in command of a fleet off Tenedos, received instructions to proceed to Constantinople and prepare for a bombardment of that town. Though the Turkish fleet in the Sea of Marmora was destroyed, Admiral Duckworth had to withdraw and sustained severe losses on his return voyage. Sébastiani having made it his business to equip the fortifications of the Dardanelles for that emergency. By the Treaty of Jan. 5, 1809, the Sultan engaged himself to keep the Straits closed, and England declared that from her no further attempts to force them were to be feared if he saw to it that all the other powers respected the compact. This was intended as a blow for Russia, and the antagonism displayed furnished the sick man of Stamboul with a handy trump card in the diplomatic game which he learned to play with consummate skill.

IN THE VICTORIAN EPOCH

On Oct. 20, 1827, the combined squadrons of Britain, Russia, and France defeated the Turco-Egyptian fleet in the Bay of Navarino. In 1833 Russia was on the side of Turkey against her rebellious vassal and obtained in reward of her services the Sultan's signature to the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessy, which annulled that of Jan. 5, 1809, and established a Russian protectorate in the guise of a defensive alliance. The second Turco-Egyptian unpleasantness gave Lord Palmerston an opportunity to resuscitate British predominance, and Article 4 of the Convention of London, July 15, 1840, laid down the closure of the Dardanelles as a principle of international policy, binding in still wider sense when France rejoined the European concert by her adhesion to the agreement of July 13, 1841. Henceforth it was the Sultan's duty to keep the Straits closed sans phrase, and the insistence on his renunciation of the right to open them at his will implied a curtailment of his sovereignty, guaranteed by the powers themselves, that humbled him. Yet, during the Crimean War, his British and French allies sent, as a matter of course, their battleships and troopships through the gate which they were so anxious to lock and bar against their rivals.

The Treaty of Paris, concluded on March 30, 1856, which, by the way, admitted Turkey "to participate in the advantages of the public law and system of Europe," and guaranteed besides "the independence and territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire," (Article 7,) added to the stipulations of 1840 and 1841 this other one that the Black Sea should be neutralized, its waters and its ports thrown open to the mercantile marine of every nation, but formally and in perpetuity interdicted to the flag of war of the powers possessing its coasts or of any other power. (Article 11.) Russia was forbidden to have there any military-maritime arsenal or any kind of navy except a small number of lightly armed vessels for the coast service. A century and a half after Peter the Great secured for her an outlet to the south, she had lost more in that quarter than she had won, and she felt terribly aggrieved.

Small wonder that, when the Franco-Prussian war changed the international outlook, Prince Gortschakov, notified by his circular dispatch of Oct. 31, 1870, the co-signatory Governments of his imperial master's decision to renounce the Treaty of Paris, repudiating in particular the obligations derogatory to Russia's rights in the Black Sea. The protocol which embodied the result of the Conference of London, in the course of the next year, accepted the Czar's defection, Article 2 authorizing the Sultan to open the Dardanelles and Bosphorus "in time of peace to vessels of war of friendly and allied powers, in case the Sublime Porte should judge it necessary to secure the execution of the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris." The Congress of Berlin, held in 1878, from which British diplomacy, personified in Lord Beaconsfield, could carry home the glad assurance of "peace with honor," simply confirmed the status of the Straits as successively defined in 1841, 1856, and 1871. But, says M. René Pinon, in one of his brilliant discussions on international problems, Lord Beaconsfield, elated by his success, presumed too much on the future, believing that he could count upon the uninterrupted continuity of preponderant British influence at Constantinople.

CONCESSIONS TO RUSSIA

At the occasion of the Armenian disturbance of 1895 the powers asked and obtained permission to station each a second warship off Galata. In 1897 Russia was allowed to dispatch troopships through the Straits on the same footing as, before and after that date, the ships of her so-called volunteer fleet. But when in 1902 she wished to reinforce her Black Sea squadron with four torpedo-boat destroyers from Kronstadt, Sultan Abdul Hamil II. seemed inclined to refuse. As usual there was much mining and countermining in the diplomatic circles of Stamboul, but at last the advice to yield, whispered from Berlin, if rumor did not err, silenced the arguments of the obstructionists, and the imperial assent was given by an irade which had no sooner been signed at Yildiz Kiosk than the four destroyers left for their destination. This, however, did not end the affair. Three months afterward, Jan. 6, 1903, Sir Nicholas O'Connor, Ambassador of the Court of St. James's to the Sublime Porte, presented a note wherein he stated that his Government, apprised of the passage of Russian warships through the Straits, would not hesitate to avail itself of this precedent whenever it saw fit to claim the same privilege for British warships.

And so, by the irony of fate, Russia and Britain, playing at chassé-croisé, interchanged the diametrically opposite views of the question of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles defended in 1878 by their respective plenipotentiaries at Berlin as in 1840 at London and in 1856 at Paris, trimming their ideas of international equity to make them agree with their shifting interests.

MORE RECENT INCIDENTS

When it was thought at St. Petersburg that a prompt display of naval strength in the Far East might materially affect the issue of the war with Japan, the best squadron Russia boasted had to stay in the Black Sea, bottled up by treaties and agreements of which Japan's well-wishers in Europe supervised the desired interpretation. Instead, the Baltic fleet was ordered to go under command of Admiral Rozhdestvensky, who enlivened its roundabout voyage with the Dogger Bank episode and finally met crushing defeat off Tsushima.

The movements of the volunteer fleet that left Odessa to supply the Russian Navy in eastern seas with coal and provisions, or to harass foreign merchantmen chartered by the enemy, were greatly hampered by all sorts of regulations. Turco-Russian antipathy, adroitly exploited by third parties, militated worse than in any period of the past against the Black Sea remaining the Sultan's or becoming the Czar's, while the former's lordship over the Dardanelles and Bosphorus, even over the Istanbul Bosphorus, the channel between Constantinople and Scutari, was disregarded whenever it suited the leader of the moment in the Western European concert.

The incident of the Russian ironclad whose mutinous crew, after an insane cruise, appeared with her before Burgas and Constantza, at last ingloriously to surrender to the Rumanian authorities, proved likewise, if proof had been necessary, that besides Russians and Turks, other nationalities were astir in the Black Sea to dispute the pretensions of either of them. Both Rumania and Bulgaria, ignoring the question whether they had a right to any warships at all, seized upon the short but wild career of the Knavaz Potemkin as a pretext to increase the embryonic navies which they had quietly acquired, and to put their harbors in a better state of defense.

MODERN FORTIFICATIONS

As regards the defenses of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, the work commenced by Sultan Mohamed II. and recommended by Mohamed Kiuprili had been continued with the fits and starts and indolent delays characteristic of Turkish endeavor. There was a renewal of vigilant display in 1827 when Admiral Cochrane, having entered the Greek service, menaced Constantinople without, however, substantiating that threat. At the example of de Tott and Sébastiani, General von Moltke and General von der Goltz gave successively their attention to the Straits, followed, also in this respect, by General Liman von Sanders, as the Franco-British fleet hammering at the forts between Qoom Qaleh and Gallipoli experienced to its cost without effecting an entrance to the Golden Horn. Neither did the Black Sea squadron, steaming up to its eastern approach, accomplish the capture of Constantinople.

Alexander II. pledged on Nov. 2, 1876, his sacred word to Lord Loftus, then British Ambassador in St. Petersburg, that he had no intention of acquiring Constantinople or identifying himself with the aims of Peter the Great and Catherine II., the stories of whose ambitious schemes were, moreover, largely a figment of the imagination. Not seventeen months later came the Treaty of San Stefano to show that no Russian Czar, whatever his assertions to the contrary, could resist the fascination of "the precious jewel of the Thracian Chersonese, contrived to clasp two continents."

FATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Assigned to Russia under the régime now defunct by an agreement among the Allies, principally due to the persistence of M. Sazonov when Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, and announced to the Duma on Dec. 2, 1916, by the Russian Premier, Trepov, its award fell in abeyance owing to the Brest-Litovsk arrangement and Bolshevik reign of terror. As Mr. Lloyd George gave to understand in the House of Commons on Dec. 20, 1917, improving upon Sir Edward Grey's reservation of Feb. 25, 1915, "the fact that Russia entered into separate negotiations disposes of all questions about Constantinople"—i. e., with respect to Russian aspirations in that quarter. Lucky, perhaps, for Russia, because, apart from Bismarck's hypothetical forecast, Constantinople has always been a source of danger to its overlords. With the Allies in possession, we may also expect another prophecy to reach fulfillment.

When, according to the legend, Mo-handed II. entered St. Sophia on horseback after his troops had forced the town gates and scaled the ramparts, and made the imprint of his bloody hand on the inner wall in token of his appropriating the Christian Church for Moslem uses, a priest was celebrating mass at the high altar, surrounded by the wives and daughters of the sanctuary's defenders, who, praying and wailing, counted upon a miracle to save it and themselves from Turkish lordship and violence. But, no miracle stemming the tide of Mohamed's onslaught, the priest suspended his holy office and, gathering together the sacred vessels, carried them in solemn procession toward the sacristy. Brandishing their scimitars and heading him off, the invaders had almost attained him and his flock when, lo! he vanished from their sight. At first they thought that he had escaped through a secret passage, but wherever they tested the masonry of the solid walls, it gave no sign of sliding panels or masked doors. And it is said that up to this day, on every anniversary of Mohamed's capture of the City of Constantine, near the mark of his hand a faint sound is heard as of psalms and canticles being chanted in some hidden recess; that at the moment of St. Sophia's restoration to Christian worship, the wall will open in that place and the priest will step forth to finish his mass so rudely interrupted more than four and a half centuries ago.

Managing 200,000 Coolies in France

By CAPTAIN HARRY L. GILCHRIESE

WHEN the post-war tourist debarks in one of the polyglot ports of France he now sees among the stevedores a colorful sprinkling of coolies from the Far Eastern countries. Predominant among these are Chinese, Indo-Chinese, and Siamese, fused in the cosmopolite melting pot with Turk and Moroccan, Senegalese, and Prussian—all contributing their efforts, willingly or otherwise, to restore to France what four years of chaos destroyed.

These Chinese and their slant-eyed kindred are the outposts of a large army working in every port of France, and on the scenes of the recent world conflict. More than 120,000 of them are engaged in clearing the battlefields preparatory to the colossal scheme of restoration designed for war-ravaged France. This force, working under contract with the British and French Governments, is being continually augmented by new drafts from the Orient. It represents China's contribution to the war. Since 1916 it has been steadily increasing, the bulk coming chiefly from the northern provinces of Chihli and Shantung. It reached its greatest height just prior to the signing of the armistice, when it numbered almost 200,000. With the British the coolies are engaged for three years, contracts terminable at the option of the Government any time after the first year. The French hold them unreservedly for five years, but retain the right to sublet their services.

During the war the coolie went about his business of laboring in true hero fashion, impassively, and with outward contempt for danger. Frequently air raids, long-range artillery, and poisonous gas resulted fatally for him. Even now he is beset by dangers, the kind that strike him in the dark. Unexploded mines, grenades, "duds," and bombs have increased the already swollen casualty list of the Chinese laborers. But these accidents are always met by coolies with the stoicism so characteristic of the race.

Long before China's doors were open to modernism, church missionaries and representatives of the Y. M. C. A. had gained entrance and were working into the interior of the world's greatest empire. Now 200,000 Chinese have come into personal contact with our Christian civilization. What are their thoughts,

"THEY WERE TAUGHT BOXING AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR KNIFING"

[© By the American painter, Harry B. Lachman] and how will these thoughts be expressed upon their return home?

FIRST IMPRESSIONS

Arriving from China after a voyage filled with heretofore unknown terrors, a voyage lasting weeks and resulting in strange maladies of the stomach, they were herded together in wire inclosures. English and French officers were placed in immediate command of the labor battalions into which the coolies were grouped, and noncommissioned officers, whose limit of Chinese knowledge was confined to "Chink" and its French equivalent, were assigned as gang foremen. Their charges, willing enough to work, were timorous, bewildered by strange sights, and, perhaps, a little super-sensitive. Gruff commands were misunderstood for insults, and the coolies refused to work.

For example, the English word "go" has a sound which in Chinese is similar to the expression for "dog." The phraseology of the "Tommie" unfortunately is bountifully besprinkled with terms in which "go" is salient. Interpreters were not only difficult but almost impossible to obtain. Much valuable language was wasted on both sides, and more misunderstandings resulted. Strikes, and even riots, occurred with alarming frequency, and many uncomplimentary things were said by both the party of the first part and the party of the second part.

From the Chinese viewpoint everything was topsy-turvy in this new land of grotesquely dressed people, impossible languages, and peculiar customs. Darkness is the coolie's most dreaded enemy, and it was only natural for him to resent having his customary candle snuffed out. What did he know of air raids and the direful consequences of illuminating the way for "Fritzie"? The sight of the first battleplane surrounded by tiny white puffs of smoke, silhouetted against an azure sky, held him fascinated, astounded; then, at Calais, an air bomb fell in one of the camps, killing twenty Chinese. After that he not only gave them a wire berth, but showed uncommon eagerness to find shelter when a Hun appeared.

AVERTING A CRISIS

Conditions were rapidly approaching a crisis in the British labor camps, where the coolies were held in rigid military discipline, when the Y. M. C. A., with a knowledge bred of many years' experience in the Orient, volunteered its services. For several months the "Y" had been urging a program of welfare, pointing out that with adequate interpreters and men who understood Chinese customs the chief source of difficulty would be removed. The British authorities demurred at first, fearing that Chinese-speaking workers in camp might react to the prejudice of military discipline, but this attitude soon underwent a perceptible change. The French had already accepted the Red Triangle as necessary to the successful accomplishment of work by the Chinese.

In 1918 the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. of North America began recruiting secretaries for this new phase of army welfare work. It was required that these secretaries be familiar with Mandarin, the only written language of China. The co-operation of the Chinese branch of the "Y" therefore was enlisted, and for the first time in the history of the world, China sent missionaries abroad. Today, in addition to American and British secretaries, there are more than eighty Christian Chinese students, representatives of universities in America, England, and China, serving the coolie labor battalions in France. They come from fourteen provinces and forty-six cities of China.

SUCCESS OF THE EXPERIMENT

Difficulties over orders began to disappear at once. The coolies were overjoyed to find a means of transmitting their desires and needs to their officers. Some one was taking a personal interest in them for the first time in their tempestuous careers on foreign soil. They had wished to write letters home. Practically no one had been able to do this, and, as a result, relatives in China had not heard from them in six months.

Letter-writing soon became more popular than gambling. Under capable instructors they were taught boxing as a substitute for knifing, (this had been one of their favorite pastimes,) and many a quarrel was settled in the ring before a Y. M. C. A. referee. Baseball and Chinese chess, of which they are very fond, soon replaced idleness and vice. Entertainments in which the performers were attired in their native costumes and provided with weird Chinese musical instruments drew them from the estaminet. So great has been the progress in reading and writing at the night schools in the camps that recently the "Y" started a newspaper printed in Chinese script.

Although the moving pictures and Chinese plays are by far the most popular features of this welfare work, the most beneficial service the "Y" is giving these unlearned Celestials is along educational and vocational lines. These men will exert a great influence on China when they return, and it is imperative that they understand not only the fundamentals upon which Christianity is based, but that they carry home with them an undistorted conception of modern civilization.

The illiteracy of the coolies is the basis of many amusing tales. During a heated discussion among laborers in one of the camps, the theory was advanced that the United States entered the war because the Crown Prince of America had become engaged to a Princess of France, and we were thus bound to support the cause of our newly acquired ally. A favorite subject, often discussed, is the phenomenon whereby so many Chinese came to be assembled in France when some of them went east and some west from China. Many versions of this remarkable discovery have been rendered, in which the sun, the moon, and the stars have been accused of straggling on their respective "beats."

EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS

These childish ideas are rapidly being dispelled in the elementary classes conducted by the Y. M. C. A., and the vision of the coolie is broadening. His war experience has contributed, in some measure, to this metamorphosis. When understanding first began to replace ignorance in his credulous heart, he worked, and even fought, for his officers when opportunity afforded. In one company two Chinese were awarded the British Distinguished Service Medal for conspicuous bravery. They went through a barrage three times to get food for their company when its supply had been cut off by enemy fire.

"THE PERFORMERS WERE PROVIDED WITH WEIRD CHINESE MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS"

The work of the labor battalions did not often take them into advanced positions, but during the onrush of the German horde they were sometimes swept into the maelstrom of battle. Nor did they flinch. One company almost refused to leave the field, begging for helmets and a chance to show their allies the spirit with which the Chinese could fight. During the fiercest fighting in Picardy a British officer commanding a Chinese labor unit was caught in a sudden advance by the enemy and badly gassed.

Although they were hard pressed, the coolies grouped around him and fought with their crude weapons until relief arrived. They might have run and escaped, with a few casualties, but they didn't.

ETHICS AND BOMBS

The coolie's methods of warfare did not always follow the ethics of international law. When some German prisoners in a wire inclosure shouted derisively at a gang of passing coolies the insults were taken without show of the slightest emotion. The following day, having purchased some Mills bombs (at 10 francs per bomb) from the willing "Tommys," the coolies proceeded to "mop up" the inclosure, forgetting, however, to pull the magic firing pins which ignite the fuses. The Germans knew how to meet this emergency, and without a moment's delay picked up the bombs, pulled the pins, and hurled them back. The result was disastrous to the coolie brigade. But by the time they had learned their lesson the guards had taken the situation in charge, and there was no more bombing that day.

These children of the Far East are effacing the scars of war. Their contracts are neither remunerative nor easy. They have agreed to work ten hours daily and seven days a week, but they are never held strictly to this agreement. The British give them 1 franc a day, and send a small monthly allowance to their families in China. The French omit this latter ceremony, but pay a trifle more. Both Governments make provision for the laborer's family in case of death or disablement. The Chinese are contented with their contracts—in fact, from their point of view the terms are very liberal. They go about their daily business of digging and carrying quite cheerfully, and with a vigor that bids well for the future of new China. It is the duty of the rest of the world to see that, when they finally take leave of the West, they take with them the message that our modern Christian world is worthy of emulation.

China and Japan

Aftermath of the Shantung Settlement — Contemporary Events in Both Countries

[PERIOD ENDED NOV. 10, 1919]

THE resentment of the Chinese over the Shantung provisions of the Peace Treaty with Germany continued to find expression during September and October, and the parallel Japanese insistence on the correctness of its intentions underwent no abatement. The discussion of the Shantung award in the United States Senate was closely followed in China, and at the end of July the Shantung Provincial Assembly sent a telegram addressed to "The President, American Senate, Washington," voicing the gratitude of the Chinese for the sympathy of the Senate. The telegram read as follows:

Tsinanfu, China, July 30, 1919.

The President, American Senate, Washington:

The people of China, and particularly of Shantung, are extremely grateful for the sympathetic understanding of international justice shown by the American Senate concerning the Shantung clauses in the Peace Treaty with Germany. All Sino-German treaties became null and void on China's entry into the war as one of the Allies, and Japan has no right to claim that she is heir to the concessions and privileges taken forcibly from China by Germany.

The treaty of 1915 containing twenty-one demands was forced on China by Japan: the Kiao-Tsi railway agreement, the Kuantung-Hsuechow and Shantung-Tsinan railway agreements were negotiated by Chinese traitors, and have not been sanctioned by the national Parliament. Chinese people cannot recognize such treaties and agreements, and will oppose them with the sacrifice of life if necessary.

Sino-American friendship has always been ideal, and to perpetuate this friendship and to maintain everlasting peace in the Far East we, the representatives of the Shantung people, address the American people through the American Senate in the hope that profound consideration will be given to the Shantung question and that America will continue her aid toward maintaining the integrity of Chinese sovereignty. We extend our heartfelt thanks.

(Signed)

SHANTUNG PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

NARRATIVE OF A DELEGATE

All through July and August the Chinese attacks on the Shantung provisions and the official deprecations of the Japanese succeeded one another in rapid succession, linked with arguments pro and contra. At the beginning of September a number of the Chinese peace delegates arrived in Shanghai. One of these, Kung Hsiang-ko, a Shantung delegate who traces his ancestry in a direct line through seventy-four generations from Confucius, returned after a short stay in Shanghai to his ancestral home at Kufow, in the Shantung Peninsula, to prepare for the Provincial Assembly the formal report of China's activities in the Peace Conference. Kufow, famed throughout China as the place where the tomb of Confucius stands, felt more keenly than any other city the grief which the Shantung award to Japan brought to the Chinese Nation; for it is in a sense the very heart of the nation. After recounting the efforts of Dr. Wellington Koo and Dr. C. T. Wang to combat the pro-Japanese campaign which had hampered the work of the delegates at every turn, Kung Hsiang-ko stated his belief that one of the important reasons why China was defeated was because the Fiume question had received precedence at the conference. In this regard Mr. Kung said:

President Wilson was fully determined to support the Chinese cause. If the Shantung question had been brought up first it would, perhaps, have been disposed of to the satisfaction of the Chinese.

THE TREATY OF TOKIO

But the blow under which the Chinese delegates were crushed, said Mr. Kung, was the disclosure of the so-called "Tokio-Treaty," of which they had never heard until the Japanese produced it at the conference. This was a document of agreement concluded with Japan by the former Chinese Minister to Tokio, Chiang Chung-hsiang, one of the officials against whom the wrath of the students was turned in June when the Minister was deposed. Chiang Chung-hsiang, the Shantung delegate explained, acted with the power of a plenipotentiary in concluding this secret treaty, by the terms of which the German holdings in Shantung and, in particular, the railway concessions, were given to Japan. When Dr. Koo and Dr. Wang, protesting against the twenty-one demands, contended that they had been signed under threat of war, the Japanese produced the Treaty of Tokio, of the existence of which the Chinese envoys were ignorant. Mr. Kung commented further as follows:

When this treaty was produced it closed the mouths of all of China's delegates and none of them knew exactly what to do.

When the Chinese delegates learned that the decision on Shantung had been reached all the smaller nations protested and the Chinese took vigorous action. At a conference a delegate asked who had made the decision. Speaking for the Big Five, M. Clemenceau answered: "We did it." When he was asked how the Big Five could decide a question like that he replied, saying: "We have suffered more than others."

We trusted Mr. Wilson entirely too much. We sent a note to him asking him how he could reconcile assurances he had given to China before she entered the war with the decision. He sent a representative to us expressing his sorrow and suggested that he would help us when the League of Nations was formed.

When the conference was concluded the Chinese divided on the question whether to sign the treaty with Germany. It was the students and Chinese statesmen in Paris who swayed those who were disposed to sign.

On the morning of the day set for the signing of the treaty, after China had been refused the right of signing with reservations, crowds of students patrolled in front of the hotel of Lu Chen-hsiang, our chief delegate, who had been suffering from ill-health and was confined to his bed. The question of signing had not been decided when the delegates gathered in his room. He was asked for the last time if he would consent to sign, and he replied with tears streaming from his eyes:

"I signed the twenty-one demands. Can I, must I, also sign this?"

It was the only answer he gave and the delegates understood. That is why, when the conference was called to order, the seats of the Chinese were vacant.

MARTIAL LAW IN KOREA

In Korea the condition of unrest continued. Since the attempt made on Sept. 2 to assassinate Baron Saito, the new Japanese Governor General, in Seoul, every part of that city was occupied by Japanese troops, and the place was virtually in a state of siege. The bomb-thrower was still at large, although a number of persons suspected of being implicated in the plot were under arrest. Baron Saito, on the day following the attack, which injured twenty-nine persons, summoned the Councilors and, apparently unperturbed, explained the keynote of his policy as Governor General along the lines of abolishment of discrimination and non-interference with freedom of speech or publication so far as consistent with public safety. Answering visitors who congratulated him on his escape, he replied that he was ready to sacrifice his life, if necessary, in the cause for which he came to Korea.

PEACE WITH GERMANY

Parliament having agreed that the state of war between China and Germany should be ended, a Presidential mandate to that effect was issued on Sept. 15. The document contained the following statement:

Although, owing to our disapproval of the three articles concerning Shantung, we have refused to sign the treaty with Germany, yet we recognize all the other articles as our allies do. Now that the war is ended, we, as one of the allied nations, shall consequently regard ourselves as in the same position as our allies.

But though finally at peace with Germany, China was not at peace within her own boundaries, and the clashing factions of the north and south continued the civil war which has so long disorganized the country. The Chinese peace delegation at Paris had been advised on Aug. 28 that Wong-i-Tong, representing the Northern Government, had begun negotiations with Tang Shao-yi of the Southern Government looking to reconciliation. On Sept. 29, however, further advices reported that southern representatives had refused to treat with Wong-i-Tong; hostilities between the two Governments were resumed by Oct. 7, with the departure of numerous troops from Amoy for action against the southern forces stationed at Changchow.

Serious disorders meantime continued through the metropolitan province as the result of acts of brigandage committed by roving bands of outlaws, whose suppression could not be undertaken because the military Governor did not possess the necessary funds to move the troops against them. The attitude of the troops themselves was a matter of very serious concern. A large number of these were superfluous, but regular disbandment involved the payment of arrears, amounting to $50,000,000, which the depleted Chinese Treasury, reduced to such disastrous expedients as the discount of Treasury bills at a loss of 46 per cent. on the transaction, found it impossible to provide. Fears of a mutiny of these unpaid troops were entertained.

The National Government, nevertheless, sought to reduce its outlay for military purposes. Keen interest was aroused in Peking on Oct. 30 by the action of Parliament in making a reduction of the military budget from $250,000,000 to $160,000,000. As it was uncertain whether the Tuchuns would comply, General Ni Ssu-chung, Tuchun of Amhui, who advocated the reduction, began an exchange of telegrams with other Tuchuns recommending an immediate 30 per cent. reduction.

OUTER MONGOLIA'S PETITION

An event of considerable importance was the receipt of a petition signed by the chieftans of the "Mongolian Banners" and forwarded by the Chinese Ambassador at Urga, capital of Outer Mongolia, asking China to take this province back under her protection. Outer Mongolia had declared itself autonomous shortly after the outbreak of the Chinese revolution. On Nov. 3, 1912, by a protocol signed at Urga, the province was placed under the protection of Russia, and Chinese colonization and the presence of Chinese troops were forbidden. Later an agreement was reached between Russia and China whereby Russia recognized Inner Mongolia as part of Chinese territory under Chinese suzerainty, and China recognized the autonomy of Outer Mongolia.

The petition set forth that the original declaration of autonomy had been due to intriguers, that the Russians had treated the autonomous province with a high hand, and that the province regretted the loss of favorable treatment by the Chinese Government which the Princes and chieftans of Inner Mongolia still received. It also expressed a desire to cancel the declaration of autonomy, and return to the protection of the mother country. The petitioners further asked that China should redeem the 2,000,000 ruble loan which the Urga Government had contracted with Russia in October, 1913, and requested that the salaries or allowances of the Princes and chieftans be paid by the Central Government.

The Peking Government sent a telegraphic message to the Ambassador at Urga accepting the offer and promising to pay the salaries and allowances; $800,000 was voted for this purpose.

On Nov. 2 Captain Frederick F. Moore of the Intelligence Department of the American Expeditionary Force in Siberia, declared that the attempt of Outer Mongolia to cancel her autonomy and to return under the protection of China was due to the rapidly increasing control of the Japanese in Mongolia and Manchuria through acquirement of mines, public utilities, and concessions of all kinds, supported by a considerable strengthening of Japanese armed forces in Siberia and Northern China.

Another recalcitrant province, Szechuan, over whose boundary with Thibet a dispute had arisen, and which withdrew from the control of the Chinese Government in 1917, when it broke the three-year armistice following the Conference of Simla by an attack upon the Thibetans, was stated on Sept. 18 to be again seeking the advice of Peking in regard to the campaign it was waging, chiefly as the result of having been chastened by defeat. The Chinese Government on its part had proposed the resumption of the negotiations which had been broken off in India in 1914.

STATEMENT OF DR. REINSCH

On Sept. 14 Dr. Paul S. Reinsch, after handing in his resignation as United States Minister to China because of his inability to approve the Shantung settlement, left Peking on Sept. 13. American, British, and Chinese guards of honor were drawn up about the station, while the members of the Diplomatic Corps and of the Chinese Cabinet, as well as a number of students just returned from America, bade him farewell. On his arrival at San Francisco on Oct. 9 the former Ambassador made the following public comment on the situation in China:

There is a strong undercurrent of feeling in Japan that the best interests of the country will be served by making a liberal settlement of the Shantung question.

Few persons have any conception of the thoroughness of the Chinese boycott. So efficiently is it maintained, there is no question that Japanese interests are losing vastly. As an instance, one of the Japanese concerns with a capital of 150,000,000 yen constructed palatial steamships to carry freight and passengers up and down the Chinese rivers. The only competition consisted of old and undesirable British vessels. The latter are carrying all the Chinese passengers and all the native freight, while the Japanese line is plying nearly empty and is losing a million yen each month.

Americans in China are not anti-Japanese because they must oppose whatever Japan may attempt, but in the matter of Shantung they are looking at the question in the full knowledge they have of the situation and an appreciation of the fact that the pledge to restore to China the sovereignty of the province means only the return of the shell, and in this they sympathize with the Chinese, just as the other foreigners in China.

They appreciate, too, the fact that Japan holds a wonderful trump card if she will only play it, which is the return to China of those things wrung from her by Germany, retaining only her privilege of entering Shantung on equal terms with the rest of the world.

If Japan could only see it, that would be her reply to all the charges that have been brought against her, a reply that would at once convert sentiment in China from a probable lasting hatred into a feeling of grateful friendship and something that would be appreciated by the Americans in China equally with the Japanese. It would also be something that would disarm every critic of Japan in America and elsewhere throughout the world and pay Japan materially much more than she can possibly gain by pushing the advantage the treaty gives her in Shantung.

JAPANESE ATTITUDE ON PEACE

The feeling of Japan on the issues involved at the Peace Conference was one of satisfaction over the Shantung award, combined with chagrin over the failure of the proposal to incorporate a clause of racial equality in the peace treaty with Germany. On Sept. 8 Marquis Saionji, head of the Japanese Peace Delegation at Paris, in response to an address of welcome made on behalf of the City of Tokio at a banquet given in celebration of his return, reviewed the situation in the following terms:

Japan clearly understands her responsibility in aiding and promoting the usefulness of the League of Nations—that great international organization, which, if whole-heartedly and effectively administered, is destined to insure the world against the menace of war.

The Marquis pointed out that Japan had gained a reputation as a militarist and aggressive nation, which was due partly to sinister propaganda by interested parties, and partly because she had prosecuted two successful wars since she opened her doors to foreign intercourse. He added:

That Japan should be made the object of distrust and misunderstanding is immensely injurious to Japan, and not less unfortunate to the foreign nations whose policy in the Far East is influenced by this erroneous estimate. It is of paramount importance that Japan should correct this mistaken judgment abroad, while the people of Japan should exercise the utmost care in all their domestic and international undertakings to demonstrate the real national ideals of Japan, which are entirely opposed to militarism or aggression.

Marquis Saionji outlined the rapid demand which had arisen in Japan for armaments in consequence of the peculiar changes of the last half century. He pointed out, however, that military excellence was not the only thing to be desired, but now that the empire was consolidated and Japan was co-operating in a world movement to secure a durable peace, all the people should exert themselves to develop along the paths of science, art, literature, and industry. He ended as follows:

I feel confident that the time is coming when those who misrepresent and misunderstand us today will appreciate our sincerity in laboring toward international peace and credit us with success in the sphere of pacific undertakings. Then, alone, will Japan's position be made lastingly secure and unassailable.

STATEMENT BY DR. IYENAGA

Another semi-official utterance on the question was contained in an address delivered Oct. 4 before the Twentieth Century Club of Boston by Dr. T. Iyenaga, the head of the Japanese Bureau of Information. Dr. Iyenaga deplored what he termed "the campaign of misrepresentation, abuse and slander" directed against Japan since July, 1919, which, he declared, had produced "a gross misunderstanding among the American people regarding the Shantung question." His interpretation of the whole situation from the Japanese viewpoint was in part as follows:

When we study the Shantung settlement by the light of the Portsmouth Treaty we at once observe a very marked difference between the provisions of the two agreements. The difference, however, is all to the advantage of China. By the Shantung adjustment—that is to say, in observance of the China-Japan agreements of 1915 and 1918, and the assurances given by Japan's peace envoys to President Wilson and Premiers Lloyd George and Clemenceau, reinforced by the repeated declarations of the Japanese Government—the Kiaochow leasehold is to be given up, the Tsingtao-Tsinanfu Railroad brought under joint Sino-Japanese management, the road policed by Chinese police, the military occupation wiped out by the complete withdrawal of Japanese troops, and the exercise of full sovereignty over Shantung, which was infringed upon by Germany, restored to China. In this way, Shantung will come to attain the same status as that in other provinces of China.

What Japan obtains are simply the economic rights and concessions in Shantung similar to those enjoyed by other powers in other parts of China, and the establishment of such a settlement at Tsingtao as the foreign settlements that exist at Shanghai, Tientsin, and Hankow. The Shantung settlement, therefore, far from impairing the territorial integrity or independence of China, rather serves to restore her sovereignty, which Germany had, in fact, overridden at Kiaochow by the treaty of 1898.

Such being the actual outcome, I am unable to understand what ground there is for the abuse that has been heaped upon the Japanese Nation on account of the Shantung disposition of the treaty. To restore the exercise of full sovereignty over Shantung to its owner—is this what you call "Japan's rape of China"? To develop, in conjunction with China, the resources of her potentially rich province, which, left alone to the Chinese, would long remain a hidden treasure—is this what you call an act of "burglary"? To contribute to the education, sanitation, and physical well-being of the inhabitants of Shantung, as Japan will doubtless strive to do along the railroad in whose management she has a share—is this what you call "the enslaving of 36,000,000 in Shantung"? Were these acts to be properly styled "rape," "burglary," and "enslavement," we would ask for the immediate and thorough revision of Anglo-American dictionaries to prevent our disastrous blunders in understanding the English language. * * *

A BITTER EXPERIENCE

Every experience which Japan has gained is a priceless lesson to her. In 1895 she tasted the bitter cup of being deprived of the best fruits of victory in the costly war with China through the machinations of certain European powers, and not long after of witnessing those fruits slip from China's grasp and fall into European hands.

Is it difficult, then, to understand that, in order to forestall a repetition of this experience at the Peace Conference, which was to settle the world war, Japan felt it necessary to assure herself of the support of her allies by her allies at the peace table? This will explain the agreements entered into in 1917 between Japan on the one hand and Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia on the other, as well as the China-Japan agreements of 1915 and 1918.

These agreements are the basis of Articles 156, 157, and 158 of the Versailles Treaty. The terms of the latter treaty are substantially the same as those specified in the former. So long, therefore, as these treaties stand, so long will the Shantung clause of the Versailles Treaty stand. Consequently, Chinese advocates are consistent, at least, when, in trying to annul the Shantung decision, they advocate the abrogation of the China-Japan Treaty of 1915. This, however, is out of the question. Great Britain, France, and Italy stand upon their honor. Nor will Japan ever consent to be a party to the abrogation of the Treaty of 1915. Moreover, in adopting such a grave course, China must be prepared to turn into "scraps of paper" many of the treaties she has concluded with other powers.

AWAITS EUROPE'S EXAMPLE

I dare say that Japan will follow the suit of other powers, if they decide to give up the leaseholds and settlements they maintain in China: if they return to her the rights and concessions they have secured therein, and withdraw their troops now quartered at Peking, Tientsin, and other places, and, further, if China sufficiently demonstrates her ability to defend herself and maintain her integrity by her own arms, instead of shifting the burden to Japan to stand in the Far East as a bulwark against outside aggression. Then Japan is safe, China free, and she will have attained all that she is clamoring for today.

Among the Great Five, the United States is the only disinterested power, free from the web which history has woven. This, if I am not mistaken, is the reason why

China, backed by scores of foreign advisers, is moving heaven and earth to persuade America to come to her own views, and is putting to a test the talent of intrigue and persuasion, which she has inherited through centuries, against hard realities. I am, however, inclined to think that the American people, who, however idealistic, hold as their first principle the doctrine of independence and "self-help," will first see, before they commit themselves and take upon themselves the burden of China, what she has done to help herself. The history of the past few decades is a sad commentary upon China's lack of "self-help." In fact, the genius of intrigue and wrangling, with which the Chinese are so strikingly endowed, is rending the country into factions and leading it to disintegration and disaster.

Such being the situation, is it not most urgent for our neighbors across the Yellow Sea to compose their factional quarrels, put their house in order, and exert themselves to uplift the country, so that their goal of the abolition of foreign settlements and of the system of extra-territoriality and the recovery of tariff autonomy may successfully be attained? The savior of China is found in her own self, and, as President Wilson said, in the League of Nations.

JAPANESE DISSATISFIED

It was stated that the Japanese Privy Council on Oct. 30 had suggested the impeachment of the Ministry of Premier Hara and the Versailles Peace Delegation for the "unsatisfactory" peace terms. At a meeting of the council on Oct. 27 Viscount Kiyoura, head of the special committee of the council which examined the German Peace Treaty, had declared that Japan made a mistake in raising the racial issue at the Peace Conference, and had criticised the Government for the failures he asserted had been scored by Japan at the conference.

In respect to the racial issue, Viscount Kiyoura stated that, though the Government had negotiated on this question beforehand with the American delegation, it had not consulted the representatives of Great Britain, Japan's ally, and its proposal of the racial issue had been both untimely and inadvisable, while the proposal's enforced withdrawal had produced an awkward situation, in which the distinction between the Japanese and the negro race had been ignored. He also regretted that the Japanese delegation had failed to insist on Japanese occupation of the South Sea Islands. The League of Nations had recognized the American Monroe Doctrine, he pointed out, and it was a matter of regret that the delegates had made no effort to secure recognition of Japan's special position in the Far East. He also declared that the Japanese delegation should have protested against the proposal to try the German Emperor.

After reviewing the entire navy in an imposing display, the Emperor on Oct. 28 issued a message to the fleet congratulating it upon its showing in strict discipline, martial spirit, and marked improvement in tactical ability.

Kijuro Shidehara, the new Japanese Ambassador to the United States, made his first visit to Secretary Lansing at the State Department in Washington on Nov. 3, pending the presentation of his credentials to President Wilson personally as soon as the President should be able to receive him.

Tacna and Arica

The Powder Kegs of South America

By WILLIS KNAPP JONES

TACNA and Arica, the Alsace-Lorraine of America!" "Chile, the South American Germany!" These are catch phrases bandied about through Peru and Bolivia from the high altitudes of La Paz and Cochabamba to the lowlands of Lima and Mollendo. During a six weeks' trip through these countries I have heard the expressions from Indian and Senator, on seacoast and altiplano. Discussions of the topic fill the pages of the daily papers, once dedicated to European war news, and books on all phases of it are legion.

To get to the first beginnings of the trouble now involving Chile, Bolivia, and Peru, it is necessary to go back to the period of Spanish settlement when the country was divided between various colonies and ruled by various officials, all under the Viceroy in Peru. The exact boundaries were never carefully laid out, for a few leagues more or less meant nothing to the colony. The Spaniards did not attempt to delineate boundaries, except for their own farms. When the nineteenth century began and the yoke of Spain was thrown off, the new nations had too much to do to regulate such unimportant problems. No treaties were made over the geographical lines of any of the nations.

Bolivia and Chile were separated by a barren region, the desert of Atacama, where no one lived and where nothing grew. Consequently, neither Chile nor Bolivia cared much about it, although the governing officials and the almost negligible customs revenue were Bolivian. Thus there was peace until 1841.
